PREFACE.

In publishing a second volume of Parliamentary Reports, the Editor begs leave to express his gratitude for the very favourable reception which his former undertaking experienced from the Members of both Houses, and from the Public in general. The rapid sale of that volume, and the approbation which several distinguished persons were pleased to express of the plan and arrangement of the work, encouraged the Editor not only to persevere in his labours, but also to endeavour to render them more worthy of patronage and protection. In soliciting attention to the present volume, he ventures to hope that considerable improvements will be found in it. He feels great pleasure in offering his acknowledgments to several Members for the facility of communication which they allowed him during the last Session, and for the trouble which they took in revising the notes of their speeches on some important occasions. Such great advantages cannot fail to render his work more valuable, as they must certainly make it more complete and authentic. At the same time he begs to observe, that he has never availed himself of any assistance, without exercising the utmost impartiality on his part; and, accordingly, no attempt will be found to perfect a speech by extending the line of argument. The success of a work like this must depend on the fidelity with which it is executed. Its authority, and, of course, its utility, must cease, as soon as any subject is placed in a different view from that in which it appeared at the time of discussion.

The Editor regrets that his labours have not been presented to the Public at an earlier period; but, when the extent of the work, the importance of its contents, and his desire to render it as accurate and as full as his exertions would allow, are taken into consideration, he ventures to hope that the delay will be found to have been more advantageous than a more speedy publication of the volume, which he might have accomplished, had he been less careful of the interest of the reader. Far from being satisfied with having attended one or other of the Houses during the whole sitting of Parliament, he has since employed himself in perusing every Bill, Report, Petition, and Paper of any importance, that came before them; and the interval has afforded him the additional advantage of completing the history of the Session, by the introduction of several matters consequent upon its proceedings. He has now given the names of the persons appointed under the several Commissions for inquiring into the state of Charities in England for the Education of the Poor—for ascertaining the Parishes and Places in which additional Churches are most required—for considering the best means of preventing Forgery on the Bank of England; and, in the shape of Notes, he has added many facts and observations, explanatory of the Debates, and connecting them with previous and subsequent transactions. The Appendix contains a variety of important documents, and a complete abstract of the proceedings under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act. In attending to these and similar points, he has been anxious that his work should be not merely acceptable at the present day; it has been also his aim to render it useful, and even necessary, for reference in time to come. Great pains have been taken to save the reader the trouble of resorting to other authorities; and, as the Indexes are very copious, the work may be consulted with ease on every occasion.

The next volume will contain the names of all the Members returned to the new Parliament, with the alterations occasioned by death and otherwise; and also a complete List of all the Parliaments that have been holden (as far as can be ascertained), from the origin of the House of Commons to the present day. The latter account will be carefully compiled from the Original Writs, the Rolls and Journals of Parliament, and such other Records as are in existence; considerable progress has already been made in framing it. In short, while the patronage of the Public is continued to this work, no endeavour shall be wanting on the part of the Editor to make it more perfect every year.

PARLIAMENTARY R[illegible]TS

During the SIXTH SESSION of the FIFTH PARLIAMENT of the United Kingdom of GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND, appointed to meet at Westminster, the Twenty-seventh day of January, One thousand eight hundred and eighteen, in the Fifty-eighth year of the reign of His Majesty King GEORGE the THIRD.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, January 27, 1818.

THIS day being appointed for the meeting of Parliament, the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, the Lord President of the Privy Council, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Master of the Horse, as Lords Commissioners, came down to the house at three o'clock, and took their seats upon the woolsack. Shortly afterwards, the Commons, attended by their Speaker, appeared at the bar, when the Lord Chancellor stated, that it not being convenient for his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to be personally present, a Commission had been issued under his Majesty's Great Seal to certain lords therein named, to open the session; which Commission they should hear read. The Commission was then read by the clerk at the table; after which, the Lord Chancellor read the following speech to both houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to inform you, that it is with great concern that he is obliged to announce to you the continuance of his Majesty's lamented indisposition.

"The Prince Regent is persuaded that you will deeply participate in the affliction with which his Royal Highness has been visited, by the calamitous and untimely death of his beloved and only child the Princess Charlotte *.

"Under this awful dispensation of Providence, it has been a soothing consolation to the Prince Regent's heart, to receive from all descriptions of his Majesty's subjects the most cordial assurances, both of their just sense of the loss which they have sustained, and of their sympathy with his parental sorrow: and amidst his own sufferings, his Royal Highness has not been unmindful of the effect which this sad event must have on the interests and future prospects of the kingdom.

"We are commanded to acquaint you, that the Prince Regent continues to receive from Foreign Powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country, and of their desire to maintain the general tranquillity.

"His Royal Highness has the satisfaction of being able to assure you, that the confidence which he has invariably felt in the stability of the great sources of our national prosperity has not been disappointed.

"The improvement which has taken place in the course of the last year in almost every branch of our domestic industry, and the present state of public credit, afford abundant proof that the difficulties under which the country was labouring, were chiefly to be ascribed to temporary causes.

"So important a change could not fail to withdraw from the disaffected the principal means of which they had availed themselves for the purpose of fomenting a spirit of discontent, which unhappily led to acts of insurrection and treason: and his Royal Highness entertains the most confident expectation, that the state of peace and tranquillity to which the country is now restored, will be maintained against all attempts to disturb it, by the persevering vigilance of the magistracy, and by the loyalty and good sense of the people.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Prince Regent has directed the estimates for the current year to be laid before you.

"His Royal Highness recommends to your continued attention the state of the public income and expenditure of the country; and he is most happy in being able to acquaint you, that, since you were last assembled in Parliament, the revenue has been in a state of progressive improvement in its most important branches.

* Her Royal Highness died at her residence at Claremont, on the 6th of November, 1817, a few hours after the birth of a still-born male child. She was born on the 7th of January, 1796, and was married on the 2d of May, 1816, to his Serene Highness Leopold George Frederick, Prince of Saxe Coburg of Saalfeld. The bodies of her Royal Highness and of her infant were embalmed, and the heart of the Princess was placed in an urn. On the night of the 18th of November, the body of the infant, and the urn, were deposited in the royal cemetery at Windsor; and, on the following night, the funeral service was performed over the remains of the lamented Princess, by the Dean of Windsor, his Serene Highness Prince Leopold attending as chief mourner.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by the Prince Regent to inform you, that he has concluded treaties with the Courts of Spain and Portugal, on the important subject of the abolition of the Slave Trade.

"His Royal Highness has directed that a copy of the former treaty should be immediately laid before you; and he will order a similar communication to be made of the latter treaty, as soon as the ratification of it shall have been exchanged.

"In these negociations it has been his Royal Highness's endeavour, as far as circumstances would permit, to give effect to the recommendations contained in the joint addresses of the two Houses of Parliament: and his Royal Highness has a full reliance on your readiness to adopt such measures as may be necessary for fulfilling the engagements into which he has entered for that purpose.

"The Prince Regent has commanded us to direct your particular attention to the deficiency which has so long existed in the number of places of public worship belonging to the established Church, when compared with the increased and increasing population of the country.

"His Royal Highness most earnestly recommends this important subject to your early consideration, deeply impressed, as he has no doubt you are, with the just sense of the many blessings which this country by the favour of Divine Providence has enjoyed; and with the conviction, that the religious and moral habits of the people are the most sure and firm foundation of national prosperity."

The Commons then withdrew, after which the house was cleared of strangers, and prayers were read by the Bishop of Landaff.

The doors being re-opened, Earl Whitworth was introduced by the Earl De Lawarr and the Earl of Verulam. His patent of creation having been read at the table, his lordship took the oaths and his seat. The house then adjourned during pleasure.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT.] At five o'clock the house resumed, when the Earl of Liverpool presented the usual bill for the better regulation of Select Vestries, and moved that it be read a first time.

Lord Holland immediately rose, and addressed the house as follows:—"My lords, I do not rise to object to this bill, of which, on the contrary, I approve; nor do I wish to interrupt the expression of that condolence which it becomes our distressing duty to offer upon the calamitous event which has been mentioned in the speech: on that topic, there can be but one opinion amongst all men, either in this house or in the country; but there is one thing which I consider of the utmost importance in relation to the liberties of the kingdom, and that is, the repeal of the act passed in the last session of parliament for suspending the act of habeas corpus. Satisfied that not a moment ought to be lost in restoring those invaluable privileges, of which the people of England have been so long and so unnecessarily deprived, I have prepared a bill for that purpose; but I refrained from presenting it when your lordships reassembled, from the hope that his Majesty's ministers themselves might be induced to repair the wrong which they have done, and that they would immediately restore that great bulwark of the constitution, the trial by jury. I was unwilling, therefore, to deprive them of that act of grace; but as the noble earl has not alluded to the subject, I take the present opportunity of asking him, whether it is the intention of himself, or of any of his colleagues, to introduce a bill for the repeal of the habeas corpus suspension act, and, whether, in such case, it is intended to bring under the consideration of your lordships the standing orders of the house, that the bill may proceed with the greatest rapidity? If no such intention is intimated, I beg leave to give your lordships notice, that I shall, without delay, present the bill which I now hold in my hand."

The Earl of Liverpool.—"If the noble lord had waited until after the determination of the house on the consideration of the speech which has been delivered by the lords commissioners, he would have heard my noble friend (Lord Sidmouth), to whom, from his official situation, the duty devolves, give notice of his intention to introduce a bill for the repeal of the act of the last session; and, with a view to facilitate its progress, to move that the standing orders of the house be to-morrow taken into consideration."

The Select Vestries Bill was then read a first time.

ADDRESS TO THE PRINCE REGENT.] The Lord Chancellor read from the woolsack the speech delivered by the lords commissioners, which was again read by the reading clerk at the table.

The Earl of Aylesford then rose to move an address to the Prince Regent. Their lordships, he observed, had been accustomed to hear considerable eloquence on similar occasions, but he hoped they would make allowances for his inexperience in public speaking. Upon the melancholy topics which had been mentioned in the opening of the speech, there could be but one opinion. Every heart must participate in the concern of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent on the continuance of the unfortunate indisposition of his Majesty, and sympathise in the feelings which his Royal Highness had expressed at the awful dispensation with which Providence had been pleased to visit him. It was a melancholy reflection that we had been so unexpectedly deprived of so great an ornament as her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte was to the country. When their lordships considered how amiable her Royal Highness had been in the fulfilment of the duties of private life; when they considered with what greatness of mind and what sweetness of disposition she had been endowed, they would feel the extent of the loss which they had to deplore; and their grief would be still more poignant, when they recollected the situation which she filled, and the affections which she united. On her decease, addresses of condolence poured in to his Royal Highness from every part of the country, evincing the deep affliction of the people; and their lordships could now, by their expression of sympathy, complete the picture of national grief.—But, overwhelmed as they were with sorrow at the contemplation of this calamitous and untimely event, it was a high satisfaction to be informed that the state of the country had considerably improved in the course of the last year. The revenue had been constantly increasing, commerce had revived, and internal peace and tranquillity were restored. It was but fair to attribute some part of this happy change to the wise measures of parliament, which had counteracted the schemes of the disaffected.—In reviewing our relations with foreign powers, there were no circumstances of greater interest than the treaties which had been concluded with the courts of Spain and Portugal for the abolition of the slave trade. The exertions of this country with respect to that point had been exemplary; but the interests of humanity required their completion, which the present treaties were likely to effect. He had no doubt, therefore, that they would meet with the concurrence of their lordships.—The only topic in the speech which remained for him to notice, was the lamentable deficiency of places of public worship in the country, compared with the increase of population. To this subject it became the house to lend their early attention. In former reigns, money had been voted for the erection of churches in the service of the established religion; and when the importance of the subject was considered, he felt confident that parliament would not, in the present day, be found less willing to contribute to such a work than on any former occasion.—The noble earl concluded by moving an address to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, which was, as usual, an echo of the speech.

Lord Selsey, in rising to second the address, said, that he should occupy the attention of their lordships but for a short period, feeling that, after the speech which they had just heard, he should have the less occasion to dwell on the topics before the house. He was persuaded that on that part of the speech which expressed his Royal Highness's conviction that parliament would participate in his grief at the melancholy loss that had occurred, there could be no difference of opinion: so deplorable an event demanded all their warmest sympathies. Only a few weeks had rolled away since all classes of society had looked forward with hope and joy to the birth of a prince, who would perpetuate the line of the illustrious family which now swayed the destinies of the empire. This hope and this joy had suddenly given way to the deepest affliction; and who that considered the merits, the eminent endowments of that amiable princess, did not feel that as long as virtue continues to hold a place in the estimation of mankind, the loss of the Princess Charlotte would be deeply, warmly, and sincerely lamented? For his own part, he felt a sad and solemn satisfaction in thus publicly offering up an humble tribute of sorrow at the melancholy catastrophe which had blighted the fair rose of the state, and untimely withered the best hopes of the nation.—But, turning from this distressing subject, it afforded him the utmost satisfaction to observe, that the state of the country presented abundant cause of congratulation, and particularly when he contrasted it with what it had been when their lordships were last assembled. At that time, a large part of this opulent kingdom had been menaced with all the horrors of anarchy, and even with the subversion or extinction of social order. Tumult and faction seemed on every side to advance and augment in proportion to the sufferings and difficulties of the country. Our commerce, almost annihilated by the long continuance of an arduous and momentous contest against the most insatiable and unprincipled ambition that ever attempted the conquest of the world, had ceased to find a field for exertion, and whole fleets of merchantmen were laid up as almost useless. To this, however, a triumph had succeeded, a triumph not indeed illustrated by all the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of war," but one wherein wisdom and moderation had counteracted the desolating spirit of revolution, and crushed the seeds of anarchy. We now saw peace and confidence, employment and enterprise, restored to us. Our commerce, foreign and domestic, was rapidly improving; our revenue was increasing, and public credit stood again on the most satisfactory and unshaken basis. For this happy change of circumstances we were indebted in no small degree to those wise and precautionary measures which the vigilance of his Majesty's ministers had adopted.—But if the state of our domestic affairs was thus consolatory, there was no less cause for exultation in reviewing our relations with foreign states. Alluding to the treaties for the suppression of the slave trade, concluded with Spain and Portugal, the noble lord commended the personal exertions made by the illustrious person at the head of the government in attaining that object, and in terminating a traffic alike revolting to the feelings of humanity, and disgraceful to any state professing the pure doctrines of Christianity.—With respect to the deficiency in the number of places of public worship, the fact was too notorious to require explanation, and in the urgent necessity of correcting that evil, it was useless for him to offer any argument. Many parts of the kingdom, he lamented to say, were devoid of any means of acquiring religious and moral instruction, which, as had been well observed in the speech, are the most sure and firm foundation of national prosperity.

Earl Stanhope then rose, and addressed the house as follows:—"My lords, in rising to express my sentiments on the present state of the country, nothing is farther from my mind than to object to the address; but as the speech from the throne on these occasions is usually understood to be a general exposition of the state of public affairs, the debate on it naturally affords a good opportunity of delivering an opinion on the political condition of the empire. My lords, I have not enlisted under the banners of the executive, nor am I disposed to receive or adopt with implicit faith every statement that ministers may choose to make; in public life, I have no other object than the happiness and prosperity of my country. But if I was ever unwilling to consider the narrow interests, or serve the purposes of a party, I should at the present moment, more than ever, condemn a systematic opposition to government, when principles are making hourly progress which threaten the extinction of social order. Whatever opinion may have been entertained at a former period respecting the measures that have been pursued for the suppression of this spirit of anarchy and insubordination, let us at length be open to conviction; let us admit that under the present administration, these principles, so dangerous to society, have been more effectually opposed than ever. Let us admit that their measures have ensured the peace and happiness, the tranquillity and security of the country. Let us admit that his Majesty's ministers have steered the vessel of state in safety through a storm unparalleled in difficulty and danger. But, though the political ocean is in some measure tranquillized, the horizon is far from being clear; the troubled waves of faction still continue to roll, and dangers are yet to be apprehended. This I feel it necessary to state, in consequence of reports that have reached me from various quarters. If it be true that the King of France reigns in the hearts of his subjects, as much as some have represented, what evil could ensue from setting at liberty the state prisoner at St. Helena? But his confinement there, is, in truth, a tacit admission that the affections of the French for their king cannot be depended on, and that the liberation of Buonaparté would but consolidate the power of democracy. If this is true, it is clear that the government of France, as far as it can rely on its own means for support, does not rest on any solid foundation. I do not speak with reference to the present administration of that country, the measures they are pursuing, or the opinions they may entertain; I speak of facts notorious to the whole world. It is notorious that Louis XVIII. has been placed on his throne by the bayonets of foreign armies; that he has twice entered his capital in the rear of troops who conquered the country he is destined to govern, and that he now only retains his throne by the protection of the sword. On this head we have been told that we have no right to interfere with the internal government of another nation; but I shall contend, that they who have a right to the greater, have also a right to the less. France has been twice conquered, and the allies have, therefore, a right to dispose of her in what manner they please. The safest policy they could have pursued would have been to have partitioned France, not for the sake of adding to their own dominions, but of erecting new and separate dynasties. The best mode of division would have been that which is stated in Julius Cæsar's Commentaries—a division into three parts. But, if any individual was to be placed on the throne of the country as it stood, certainly the allies could not have made a more judicious choice than Louis XVIII., not to weaken the power of the French, or to deprive them of the means of defence, but to "abate their pride, assuage their malice, and confound their devices:" at the same time to inflict a sort of chastisement for their crimes, and afford something like a security to the rest of Europe. The very reasons which rendered Louis XVIII. unacceptable to France, were those of all others which ought to have weighed with the allies, and rendered him acceptable to them; he was obliged to the allies for his throne, and depended on them almost entirely for support; common gratitude, therefore, would prevent him from making any attack on their peace, or on the system which they deemed it expedient to maintain. That peace they had nobly conquered, and of that peace the best guarantee was Louis XVIII. It must be felt, then, that his government cannot be destroyed without striking at the roots of social order in every surrounding nation. A revolution in France would not only be attended with calamity to the family of the Bourbons, but to every part of Europe; and it is quite as impossible to predict what the extent of its effect might be as it was in the year 1793. It is obvious, that in the event of a war, the man who by force or fraud should attempt to gain the sway of the French people, must endeavour to effect his purpose by proposing that which is dearest to the heart of every Frenchman—foreign conquest and foreign dominion; and we should then see their armies again devastating the face of Europe, and pursuing the same course of rapine and aggression that marked their progress during the last twenty years. Have your lordships sufficiently considered the character of that people?—a people the most unprincipled on the globe—a people who have pursued the career of slaves and robbers, and are now the most abject of the human race. If the calamities of the last twenty years are to be renewed from the same quarter, and to the same degree, for what purpose have we fought and bled?—for what purpose have we triumphed?—what is the object of all our toils, and all the privations occasioned by the burdens of war? The laurels we have reaped will but wither on our brow, and all our battles have been fought in vain. I do not presume to obtrude my own crude opinions on your lordships' attention; the opinions I have advanced are those of persons the best qualified to form a judgment on the subject; I have the authority of a man who has a better opportunity than any other of knowing, and of knowing officially the character of the French people; a man whose eagle eye has searched from one end of France to the other—I mean the Duke of Otranto, better known by the name of Fouché. It is my opinion, that the liberation of Buonaparté would be immediately followed by the fall of the Bourbons; the fall of that family will ensure a war against the rest of Europe, from motives of ambition or vengeance; and the renewal of such a contest as that we have lately been engaged in must be attended with inevitable destruction to this country. The renewal of the contest will bring on hostilities not similar to those which have been unexampled in glory by all that history can produce, which have raised this nation to a pitch of splendour it never attained before—I mean the hostilities that ended with the battle of Waterloo: this country still continues to feel exhausted with the gigantic efforts she made in that contest, and it will be now utterly impossible for her to renew it with any hope of success. But the more I feel convinced that peace is necessary to the existence of this country, the more I wish that all possible means should be resorted to for securing that desirable object. Those means are already in our own hands; we have only to retain in France all the forces that now occupy the country; at all events for the whole period stipulated by treaty, and, if necessary, even for a longer period. I am not indeed ignorant of the precise and imperative terms of that treaty; but I shall contend, that every treaty ought to be executed according to its intention and spirit, and not according to the letter. Thus the noble lord opposite (Lord Liverpool) when he held the seals of the foreign department, justly and properly refused to deliver up Malta, in conformity with the letter of the treaty of Amiens, because, to make such a surrender, would have been directly contrary to the spirit of that treaty. Now, the clear spirit of the treaty in question was, first, that France should not be evacuated before the contributions were all paid; secondly, that time should be allowed to erect a barrier of fortresses in the Netherlands and on the Rhine; and thirdly, that a guarantee should be secured to Europe against the return of those calamities that had been so repeatedly inflicted on us, by the unprincipled aggression and ambition of the country we had succeeded in conquering. Nothing but the most perfect security against such an occurrence can, in my opinion, justify the removal of the army of occupation. I am aware that this country must follow the line of politics adopted by the allies, but I hope that they will be alive to the dangers of relinquishing too hastily, the security they now hold. It has been said, indeed, that the government of Louis XVIII. cannot be sustained under the unpopularity occasioned by the presence of a foreign army; but the answer is, that the government of Louis XVIII. is only the means, the tranquillity of Europe the end of all our precautions. I entreat his Majesty's ministers to weigh well the consequences of withdrawing the army of occupation. The first event, after any political change in France, would be an irruption into Belgium; and I conjure your lordships to consider what you will lose, and what the enemy will gain, by the line of fortresses which will thus fall into their hands. We should next be required to give up Buonaparté, an event that could not but be attended with the utter ruin of this country. I forbear to touch on any other topic; but I trust the Prince Regent, in whose wisdom I have the highest confidence, will avert the evils I so much apprehend. No man can be a warmer advocate of economy than myself; but we can have no economy, unless we are at peace; and retrenchments that endanger our security, cannot be called economy: indeed, no word is so ill understood. In the language of many, it implies retrenchment of all, even the most necessary expences; and reform, a change of every thing, even the fundamentals of government. I entreat your lordships, before you relinquish the security you already possess in France, to turn your attention to the improvements in the internal situation of the country, and the measures that may be necessary for the future. I am happy to hear that there is no further necessity for the suspension of the habeas corpus act; but I beg not to be understood as throwing any doubt on the propriety of that measure, to the firm adoption of which I attribute the tranquillity that now prevails. The best proof of the necessity of the measures which his Majesty's ministers have adopted, is afforded by the experience of what has been the situation of the country. I shall have the honour, when the question comes regularly before the house, to state the grounds and reasons which induce me to differ on this subject from many of those who are near me, as well as to dissent from all those chimeras of parliamentary reform, which have been made pretexts for disturbing the tranquillity of the country."

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he should not enter at length into the various topics suggested by the address, as well as by the speech of the noble lord who had just sat down. Some topics, however, it was impossible to pass over. There were others upon which there could be but one feeling, and there was one in particular upon which it was painful to speak, but on which it would be worse than indifference to be silent. He did not mean to attach any blame to the noble lords who had moved and seconded the address, nor to those at whose suggestion that address was framed, according to the usual mode; but it would have been much more gratifying to his feelings, if it had been possible to separate the subject of condolence from any other. He should have thought, that the great calamity which in this powerful, busy, and commercial country, had weight enough to affect all ranks and classes, and to suspend the active stream of life in the metropolis itself, might have been deemed of sufficient importance to entitle it to a separate consideration within the walls of that house, casting, as it did, so deep a shade, not only over the present, but the future prospects of the nation. In the condolence which they were now called upon to express, they could only follow the feelings of the people at large—feelings which had done them infinite honour; for if ever there was an occasion upon which the unanimous feeling of the country had found language and a voice, it was that melancholy occasion which had carried them to the foot of the throne, where they sought to administer, and to the altar, where they sought to derive consolation. Their conduct furnished the most striking proof, had any proof been wanting, of the sincere, warm, and unfeigned attachment of the people of this nation to the principles of the act of settlement, by which the illustrious House of Brunswick was placed on the throne, to the constitutional monarchy of the country, and to the order of succession which had been established. Having said this much, it was unnecessary for him to assure their lordships, that to that part of the address which related to the melancholy event that had occasioned such universal sorrow, he gave his decided approbation. He would separate, as far as the orders of the house would permit him, this topic from the others. He would, indeed, notice but very shortly the remaining parts of the address, especially as the answer of the noble earl to his noble friend, with respect to the suspension of the habeas corpus act, had rendered any protracted discussion unnecessary. But, though he rejoiced to find, that there was no intention of continuing those obnoxious measures which had been adopted in the last session of parliament, it was impossible to pass over that part of the address, which, while it expressed a confidence in the zeal of the magistrates, and the ordinary laws of the country, to preserve tranquillity at the present moment, seemed at the same time to imply a doubt whether, in the first instance, that tranquillity could have been sustained without an interruption of those laws, and a temporary suspension of the constitution. They were bound to ask themselves now, upon all that had, and all that had not appeared, for they should take the negative, as well as the affirmative case, whether there was a conspiracy so formidable in its nature and means, as the existing laws of the country were incompetent to meet? They were bound to ask themselves whether, from the result of all the trials, which in one instance only had disclosed any thing in the shape of treason, they could infer such danger to the country as the power and activity of the regular tribunals were incapable of controlling? For his own part, he thought not, and he should be glad if those who differed from him in opinion, would state where it was that the conspiracy appeared. It had been all along said, that the danger did not arise from the rank and respectability of the leaders, but from the number of the persons engaged in the design. If that was indeed the case, how did it happen that ministers had not succeeded in producing one tittle of evidence to support their assertions? To advert particularly to the trials which ended in the just condemnation, he would call it, of the unhappy individuals at Derby; where was the proof of a conspiracy so extensive and alarming? It was the business, and the particular wish of the attorney-general to prove that the discontented there had a correspondence with others in different quarters: but he had established no connexion between them and any other body, except the contemptible one at Nottingham, which was put down by 18 dragoons. Such was the only importance in point of extent, which that able officer of the crown could succeed in attaching to their undertakings. Nothing could more decidedly demonstrate the absurdity of this conspiracy, than the evidence of what had been declared by the leader, or Nottingham captain-general, as he was called, who had been described to have told his followers, that France, England and Ireland, and clouds from the north, would assist them in their insurrection; but, after all, the insurrection required no force to meet it, and might have been suppressed by a few parish constables. It was not the suspension of the habeas corpus act that put down the insurrection, or the conspiracy, whichever it might be called: it had been extinguished by the due administration of the law—by apprehending and bringing the persons accused to trial; it was overthrown by the 25th of Edward III. and by a constitutional jury; and the same law could have been applied with equal efficiency, though the habeas corpus act had remained in force. At the same time it was to be observed, that there was no proof of any conspiracy hostile to the institutions of the country. The whole disturbance sprung from partial discontent, with which the great body of the population of the place where it broke out were untainted. Even in the very villages through which the insurgents passed, the people ran away from them; and in no part of the country was there any trace to be found of the existence of a conspiracy to alter the King's government. He must therefore continue to maintain, that the grounds on which the suspension of the habeas corpus act was called for by ministers were entirely unfounded, and that the measure was altogether unnecessary. With regard to what he had that night heard of the prosperity of the country, he was ready and happy to admit that it had experienced some increase. That it might continue to increase must be the wish of all, but that it would advance to that degree which would enable the people to bear the great burthens under which they laboured, was a matter rather of hope than of expectation. It would be the duty of their lordships to persevere in the prosecution of those measures which were necessary to promote the trade and commerce of the country. As to the other topics, the present was not the time to discuss them; it was only to that part of the address which, by inference, approved of the grounds upon which the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, that he felt it his duty to object. He should not, however, go to the extent of opposing its adoption, for reasons of which their lordships were sufficiently aware, and which rendered their unanimous concurrence desirable.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he was gratified with the manner in which the noble marquis had expressed his concurrence with one part of the address, and, were this the proper time for entering into a consideration of the other topics, he should be ready to maintain and prove, that the precautionary measures which ministers had proposed, were called for by the necessity of the case. The reports which had been made by committees, chosen by their lordships, and facts subsequently disclosed, shewed that the state of the country was such as to require the adoption of extraordinary measures. In a case which involved the tranquillity and safety of the country, it would ill become their lordships to calculate how much danger and risk ought to be incurred, before they employed the means of security which they held in their hands. With regard to the address, he must frankly confess, that it had been the wish of ministers, without giving any opinion on disputable points themselves, or calling for any such opinion on the part of others, that it might be so framed as to obtain the unanimous approbation of the house. In fact, the address did nothing more than state, that the improved situation of the country had taken from the disaffected some of the principal means on which they relied for accomplishing their seditious or treasonable ends. This had no reference to the question of the propriety of suspending the habeas corpus act, in the last session. The noble marquis thought there was no necessity for that measure; he, on the contrary, thought there was; but whether the opinion of the noble marquis, or that which he opposed to it was the right one, had nothing to do with the present address. He must now say a word or two on what had fallen from a noble friend of his in a speech of great ability, which he had addressed to their lordships. In his noble friend's peculiar situation, it appeared that he considered himself called upon to state his sentiments, and he approved of the feeling on which he acted. He thought it necessary, however, to remark, that the observations of his noble friend were not of that kind on which it would be fitting for him to dwell. All he wished to say was, that the great policy of this country was to maintain the present peace, so important to ourselves and to Europe: and that it would be the object of his Majesty's government to preserve that peace, by pursuing the course most likely to secure it—namely, a strict adherence to the engagements into which the country had entered, which was the best means of securing the fidelity of the other contracting parties in their engagements. He must also observe that he could not partake in the opinion which the noble earl had expressed respecting the feelings of the people of France towards the sovereign of that country. He had, indeed, a strong impression of a contrary nature. This much he would also say, that neither the state of that country, nor of any other part of the continent of Europe, exhibited, in his opinion, any appearances calculated to excite the apprehensions which his noble friend entertained. The well known disposition of all the continental powers, afforded the best augury for the preservation of peace. He should say nothing further on this subject; and he hoped that what he had previously stated, would have the effect of removing the objections of the noble marquis.

The address was then agreed to, nemine dissentiente, and was ordered to be presented by the Lords with White Staves.

Message of Condolence to the Queen.] The Earl of Liverpool then moved, that a message of condolence be sent to her Majesty, on the death of the Princess Charlotte. The motion being agreed to, Lord St. Helens and Lord Arden were ordered to carry the message.

Message of Condolence to Prince Leopold.] The Earl of Liverpool moved, that a message of condolence be sent to Prince Leopold, on the melancholy event of the death of his Serene Highness's Consort, her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte.—The motion being agreed to, the Earl De Lawarr and Lord Amherst were ordered to carry the message.

Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.] Lord Sidmouth gave notice that he would present a bill to-morrow for repealing the habeas corpus suspension act, and also, that he would move for the suspension of the standing orders, so as to pass the bill in the course of to-morrow.

Clerk of the Parliaments.] The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the office of Clerk of the Parliaments having become vacant by the death* of the gentleman (Mr. Rose), who held that office, it was vested by reversion in his son, who, being at present out of the country, could not appear before them to take the oaths. In order to obviate the inconvenience which might result from his absence, the noble earl moved that Henry Cowper, Esq. should be authorized to affix his signature in the mean while to those proceedings of their lordships, which required the signature of the clerk of the parliaments.

Lord Holland regretted the situation in which the house was placed, and intimated his intention of moving for a committee to inquire into the state of the clerks of the house. There was evidently something that required to be remedied, in order to protect them against such an occurrence. Perhaps it might turn out, upon investigation, that the present clerk held situations which he was not authorized to hold without the direct permission of the house. At all events they owed it to their own dignity to inquire into the case, and, therefore, he should move for inquiry.

The Earl of Liverpool suggested that the regular course would be to move for a copy of the instrument by which the appointment was made, if any such existed. He believed there were resolutions on the journals, prohibiting persons from holding certain offices who acted in the capacity of clerk of the parliaments.

The Lord Chancellor concurred in the propriety of the course recommended by the noble earl. He, as Chancellor, was Speaker of their lordships' house. Other speakers had been appointed by letters patent in the absence of the Chancellor, but if they had been absent also, the house must surely have a power to supply their place. The same reasoning would apply to their clerk. When this matter came to be investigated, his lordship thought that it would be proper to inquire into the nature of the business which the clerks of the house had to discharge. There were three days in the week, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, on which they were engaged in law proceedings, from ten in the morning until four in the evening, besides being under the necessity of continuing on those days, as well as on the other days of the week, as long as their lordships might think fit to sit. In consequence of the constant demands thus made on the industry of the clerks, he thought it might be expedient to increase their number, and also so to divide their duties, that those who were employed in the forenoon on judicial proceedings, might not be liable to be called upon to remain all night in the house. He concluded by expressing his opinion, that their lordships should have a copy of the instrument under which the appointment was made, in order to know whether there was any body who had a title to the office, and should provide in the mean time, as the noble earl recommended, for the discharge of its duties.

After a few words from Lord Holland and the Earl of Liverpool, the motion for granting a copy of the letters patent under which the appointment was held, and that for authorizing the signature of Mr. Cowper, were agreed to.

Chairman of the Committees.] On the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Shaftesbury was appointed chairman of the committees of the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, Jan. 27, 1818.

The house met at a quarter before three o'clock, and on a message from the lords, Mr. Speaker and several members attended to hear the speech of the lords commissioners read by the Lord Chancellor. On their return Mr. Speaker took the chair, and new writs were ordered for the borough of Rippon, in the room of the right hon. Frederick Robinson, who had accepted the offices of president of the board of trade and treasurer of the navy (the latter being vacant on the death of the right hon. George Rose); and for Cockermouth, in the room of the right hon. Thomas Wallace, who was appointed vice-president of the board of trade. The right hon. Nicholas Vansittart, chancellor of the consolidated exchequer of England and Ireland, (see vol. I. p. 1827.) took the oaths, and his seat for Harwich.

Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.] The Clandestine Outlawry bill, was, as usual on the opening of the session, presented, and read a first time. On the second reading being moved,

Lord Althorp rose, and spoke as follows: "Sir, I wish to avail myself of the earliest opportunity of calling the attention of the house to a subject of the utmost importance. In the last session of parliament an act was passed to suspend the act of habeas corpus; and being satisfied that no time should be lost in restoring to the people those inestimable privileges which they enjoyed under the original law, I now rise to ask, whether it is the intention of his Majesty's ministers to bring in a bill for that purpose? At such a moment as this, when another subject must necessarily be considered, I am unwilling to make any observation that might produce a difference of opinion: but if I do not receive a satisfactory answer to my question, I beg to give notice, that I shall move to-morrow for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the habeas corpus suspension act." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Arbuthnot—"I am sorry that the noble lord did not defer his question until some of his Majesty's ministers were present. The noble lord will probably hear something very soon which may render his notice of motion unnecessary." (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh soon afterwards entered the house, and Lord Althorp repeated his question.

Lord Castlereagh replied as follows:—"It is certainly the intention of his Majesty's ministers, in the course of the present evening, to give notice of a motion for the immediate repeal of the suspension act, in the place where that measure originated." (Meaning the house of lords.) "The noble lord, therefore, will perceive that it is unnecessary for him to make the motion which he had in contemplation." (Hear, hear.)

Scotch State Prisoners.] Lord Archibald Hamilton gave notice, that, on that day fortnight, he would call the attention of the house to the recent proceedings in Scotland, concerning state prisoners. (Hear, hear.)

Address to the Prince Regent.] Mr. Speaker stated, that the house had been in the house of lords, when the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, as one of the commissioners of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, had delivered a speech to both houses of parliament, of which he had, for greater convenience, procured a copy, and which, with the leave of the house, he would then read to them. The speech being read accordingly, (for which see page 1.)

Mr. Wodehouse rose to move an address to the Prince Regent. He said, that he should ill discharge his duty to the house, to the country, and to the Prince Regent, if he did not in the first instance notice that unexpected calamity which was so afflicting to his Royal Highness, and which had unhappily overthrown the fairest hopes of the nation. We had lived so many years in a state of war, and our attention had been so much occupied by the succession of wonderful events to which that state gave rise, that our minds appeared to have been diverted, in some degree, from many important considerations at home. But when the pleasing times of peace returned to us, we naturally looked more to domestic affairs and prospects; and the whole country hailed the promising life of an excellent and virtuous Princess, whose qualities and endowments so justly excited the most sanguine hopes and expectations. The extinction of such bright hopes and prospects, by the premature death of that illustrious Princess, naturally afflicted all who felt a love of their country and its dearest interests. It was a great and lamented public loss, and was mournfully accompanied with all the bitterness of private woe. It would be useless for him, it would even indeed be a kind of mockery in him, before such an assembly as he was then addressing, to attempt a portrait of the departed princess. Much might be left to the memory of all, and he could not wish to obtrude on those feelings which were at present deeply afflicted, but he might say confidently, that the house sympathized fully with his Royal Highness, and associated themselves with all his paternal feelings in the deprivation of his best hopes, both in a private and a public view. The knowledge of the sentiments of parliament in such an event must be regarded with universal interest. It would afford an eminent proof of the indelible attachment of the nation to the illustrious family on the throne. After all our great and splendid exertions, this sentiment, he trusted, would be found a striking feature among all those great moral energies which so highly distinguished the people of this land.—In the speech, a variety of topics was introduced, all of them the fit and important subjects of future discussion. Upon these different points, he should not trespass on the time of the house, by entering into details. They had heard of our amity with foreign states, our prosperity and tranquillity at home, the stability of our credit, and the improvement of our revenue. The picture, he believed, was not too highly coloured. It was consolatory to know that there were such abundant proofs of the happy change which had taken place in the condition of our fellow-subjects. In presenting this view of our affairs, he did not speak the language of flattery or delusion. Whether we turned our attention to the state of our agriculture, or to the various branches of our trade, manufactures, and commerce, there no longer appeared that stagnant languor and dejection, that feeling among men that they were struggling for existence without any hope of advancement. The scene, fortunately, was now changed: instead of the former depression, there existed every where that vigour and elasticity which furnished the most satisfactory evidence of a real and substantial prosperity.—The restoration of our internal tranquillity was a subject on which the imagination loved to dwell. There was now a general feeling of content, and the hated spirit of disaffection was banished from the land.—With respect to our foreign relations, the treaties concluded with Spain and Portugal for the abolition of the slave trade, formed a peculiar topic of congratulation. If any thing could add to the importance of these arrangements, it was the consolation to be derived from the consideration of the narrow limits within which that trade was now carried on—affording a reasonable hope that it would soon cease to exist. It was a proud triumph to Great Britain, that an end to this most detestable and iniquitous traffic—the existence of which was regretted by the unanimous feeling of Christendom—was accomplished by the merciful interposition of her influence and authority. This noble achievement crowned all the other glories which the perseverance and resources of the country had obtained; and future ages would bless the kingdom by whose means it had been effected.—The recommendation in the speech respecting the increase of places of public worship deserved the most serious consideration. The diffusion of religious instruction throughout the country, would be the most sure and firm foundation of national prosperity; and he trusted that parliament would devote its early attention to this important subject.—Feeling it unnecessary to occupy the time of the house any longer, the hon. gentleman concluded with moving an address to the Prince Regent, which was, as usual, an echo of the speech.

Mr. Windham Quin, in rising to second the motion, bespoke the indulgence of the house, while he should shortly advert to some of the leading topics which had been brought before them. There was nothing in the address which would provoke much discussion, or disturb the unanimity which, he hoped, would prevail on an occasion in some respects so mournful. In the recollection of the calamitous event which they lamented, he trusted that they would derive all the consolation which unity of feeling could afford. Two years had not yet elapsed since the presumptive heir of Great Britain was wedded to a prince of an ancient and illustrious house, himself illustrious, by being eminently good. On that occasion every heart was filled with joy. But now they had to look at a very different scene. It had pleased God to call away that virtuous and accomplished Princess who was the pride and hope of the nation; and never was sympathy more purely personal than that which her untimely death excited. Sorrow darkened every countenance in every direction, and one general feeling of calamity prevailed. It had pleased Providence to take her in the bloom and promise of her youth, but her name would remain for ever enthroned in the hearts of an affectionate people. Let the more immediate sufferer reflect on this consolation, and know that he carried with him in the bosom of his retirement, the blessings of every man who had a head to think, or a heart to feel. (Hear, hear.) In turning from this painful topic, the first subject to which he should call their attention was, the recommendation in the speech which related to the number of places of worship. This was a point which deserved their most serious consideration, for the experience of the last twenty-five years, and of the convulsions which had shaken Europe, had shewn how intimate a connexion existed between the stability of thrones and empires, and the protection of morals and religion. With respect to our relations with foreign states, it was most gratifying to hear of the friendly disposition which prevailed; for though he trusted that Great Britain would never be found unwilling or unable to vindicate her just rights by arms, it must not be forgotten that the only legitimate object of war was honourable, firm, and permanent peace.—The view that had been given of our domestic situation was not less pleasing and consolatory. He should not enter into any detailed statement in support of the assertions of the speech which related to our finances and commerce. It was enough to say, that the revenue of the last quarter, compared with that of the corresponding quarter in the last year, furnished evidence of considerable improvement, and held out a hope of greater and progressive advancement. But it was not in the revenue alone that the improvement of our circumstances was to be seen:—in our manufactures, in our exports, in the state of the funds, and in the value of lands, it was obvious to the most casual observer, and greater than that which even the most sanguine had anticipated. They could not go into any part of the country without seeing the signs of this improvement. In the last year, in every street, able-bodied men were pining for want of employment; but the wages of labour of every kind had now been raised. The iron works in the last year had been almost entirely stopped; they were now in full employ, and iron had risen in price from 9*l.* to 14*l.* per ton. The linen manufactory was no less active. In fact, the country felt in every part an increased circulation. Twelve months ago, the funds, which had been called the pulse of the nation, were at 63; they were now at 80: money could be procured at 4½ per cent., and every thing indicated the public belief in the stability of the financial resources of the country. Merchants, manufacturers and farmers not only felt that better days had arrived, but were confident that they were likely to continue.—There was one source of national prosperity which could not be exhibited in a tangible shape, but which was not less important—he meant internal tranquillity. The scenes which had disgraced the metropolis and other parts of the country in the last year were no longer witnessed, and it was shewn that the precautionary measures which had been adopted had not been unavailing.—The Prince Regent had assured them that the interests of the country, as it regarded the succession, had occupied his serious attention. On this point he should beg to observe, that the interests of the country were closely connected with the succession of the family on the throne. Under the auspices of that family, the country had advanced in arts and arms, in civilization, commerce and agriculture; and although no immediate danger was to be apprehended of a failure of the heirs of the Princess Sophia, as there was so long a line of foreign princes, yet was it unimportant to the nation that the British branch of this family should be preserved, and that our kings should continue to be Englishmen by birth, principles and habits? The treaties which had been concluded with Spain and Portugal had been well described as shewing the noble spirit of our country. It would be recorded hereafter, that in the hour of our distress, at the time when we were struggling for our existence, we were not unmindful of the interests of humanity; and now, in the time of reviving prosperity, we attended not only to our own happiness, but to that of the whole human race.—But in speaking of national improvement, was it fair to confine the comparison to the state of our affairs in the present year and the last? They should pause for a moment, and consider where the country would have been, if a different line of policy had been pursued from that which had been happily followed—if they had made peace with the former ruler of France, a hollow, insecure and treacherous peace as that must have been. They now might reap the fruit of those efforts in which they had so nobly persevered. They had not only secured their own liberty, but destroyed the most tremendous tyranny which had ever lowered over human kind. Great Britain now stood on the highest pinnacle of glory, and was the object of the admiration, perhaps of the envy of the world. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The address having been read from the chair,

Lord Althorp said, that he did not rise to oppose it, as he should be extremely sorry if any observation were to escape from his lips that might be calculated to produce a difference of opinion, at a time when they had to offer their condolence to the throne. Much doubt and considerable difference must indeed exist as to that part of the address which ascribed the present tranquillity of the country to the measures that were passed in the last session of parliament; but upon that subject he should not enter at present. There was one topic, however, to which he felt himself bound to call the attention of the house. He did not mean to found any specific motion upon it, and therefore adverted to it now, because the present was the only opportunity of offering observations on a subject, without accompanying them with a corresponding motion. He alluded to the late three successive trials of Mr. Hone *. It was a topic of great delicacy, because no man could justify the professed cause of those prosecutions, the publication of parodies on sacred subjects. He strongly disapproved of those parodies; yet he, in common with the bulk of the nation, rejoiced that an individual, without any support, had triumphed over the extraordinary severity of his prosecutors. (Hear, hear.) In his view of this case, the hon. and learned gentleman (the Attorney-General) should not have prosecuted ex-officio: it was a case in which there was no urgency, and therefore, the regular mode of going with a charge before a grand jury, ought to have been adopted. But why was the prosecution continued, after a jury had pronounced a verdict of acquittal? (Hear, hear.) A jury was the only competent tribunal to say what was or was not a libel: the judge might give his opinion, but the jury alone could decide. (Hear, hear.) He did not mean to say any thing disrespectful to the hon. and learned gentleman, but he was, by his official character, the least to be trusted in declaring what was libel and what was not. Yet he, after a jury had found that the subject of prosecution was not libel, proceeded to a second, and then to a third trial. As the trials ended, no evil was done; but if it had turned out otherwise, if a conviction had been obtained on the third trial, it was manifest, from the nature of the proceedings, that the punishment would have been as great as if a conviction had been obtained for the whole. Much as he disapproved of publications of this nature, the injury which could be done by them was not to be compared with the evil of destroying the confidence of the country in the trial by jury. (Hear, hear, hear.) He had stated this, because the present was the only opportunity of adverting to the subject.—In every part of the address he willingly acquiesced, and he hoped there would be but one sentiment on the occasion.

* The first trial of Mr. Hone on an ex-officio information, for publishing a parody on the catechism, under the title of "the late John Wilkes's Catechism of a Ministerial Member," came on before Mr. Justice Abbot, and a special jury, at Guildhall, London, December 18th, 1817. The jury returned a verdict—not guilty. On the 19th, Mr. Hone was tried before Lord Ellenborough, and a special jury, for publishing a parody on the Litany, called "The Political Litany," on which a similar verdict was returned. On the 20th, he was tried before Lord Ellenborough and a special jury, for publishing a parody on the Athanasian Creed, entitled, "The Sinecurist's Creed," and was again acquitted.—On these several trials, the Attorney General contended, that Christianity was part of the common law of England, and that no man could read these parodies without seeing that their necessary and obvious consequences must be, to bring the Christian religion and the liturgy of the church of England into contempt. He insisted therefore, that the defendant had published a most impious and profane libel, and the judges pronounced the same opinion.—On the other hand, Mr. Hone, who pleaded his own cause, maintained, that the parodies were written and published solely for political purposes, and not with the intention of exciting impiety, or degrading the christian religion The jury, he observed, and not the Attorney-General, or the judge, were to decide on what was, or was not, libel: and he called upon them to return a verdict, not upon the effect which the publication of these parodies might have produced out of doors, but on the intention with which they were written and published. He then proceeded to shew, that works of a similar nature had been published in all ages; that Martin Luther, and some of the most eminent divines of the church of England—Lord Somers, Mr. Burke, and several other distinguished lawyers and statesmen—had published and written parodies on various parts of the scriptures, not with an impious and profane intention, but to serve their own particular views; and none of these persons had ever been brought before a jury. He then cited the speech of Earl Grey, (as reported in the first volume of these Reports, page 1056), to shew that one of the present members of the cabinet (the right hon. George Canning), had written a parody in the Anti-Jacobin, for which he had not been prosecuted, and contended, that it would be gross injustice to punish him, and to suffer that gentleman to escape unpunished. In conclusion, he called evidence to prove, that, as soon as he found that the parodies were disapproved by some persons, he stopped the sale of them; and that one person, previously intimate with him, had renounced his acquaintance, because he would not furnish him with copies. This was long before they were prosecuted, and having done this to satisfy the objections of respectable persons to publications which he considered to be perfectly lawful, he left it to the jury to say, whether it was clear from the works themselves, and from his actions—having those great examples which he had adduced—that his intention was not to ridicule the ministerial members, but to produce impiety, and to bring religion into contempt.—The verdicts were received with shouts of applause, and the sum of nearly 3000*l.* was afterwards raised by public subscription, for the purpose of re-establishing Mr. Hone in his business of a bookseller. It is not in the province of the editor of these Reports to offer any opinion on this subject; and, therefore, he shall merely add, for the sake of completing the history of these prosecutions, that, on the 23d of December, Mr. Hone addressed the following letter to the conductors of the principal London journals: "Sir,—Information has this moment been given me, that bills have been posted to-day, announcing the republication of the parodies upon which I have been tried. Permit me to assure the public, through the medium of your paper, that I am much disgusted, and may perhaps be much injured in public estimation, by this procedure; and that I have no intention of republishing these works in any other shape than in the report of my trials, which I am preparing for the press, and wherein their appearance is indispensable, as constituting the ground of the prosecutions upon which I was acquitted. I disclaim all knowledge whatever of those bills; and I desire to add, that if I did not think it necessary that a complete and accurate report of my trials should be upon record, I would not republish the parodies at all. I shall never write any work of the same tendency again; and when I come to publish that report, I shall feel it my duty most earnestly to exhort all my fellow-citizens to abstain from parodying any part of the holy writ, or the service of the church of England."—The trials have since been published, and Mr. Hone, in the preface, has expressed himself glad to find, that the intimation contained in the above letter has had the effect he wished.

The Attorney-General said, he had not intended to trouble the house on the question before them, but he might be excused if he made some observations on that part of the noble lord's speech which referred to the prosecutions which he had conducted. As he had not distinctly heard the noble lord, he did not know whether he disapproved of any of the writings which had been prosecuted. Those who thought that no prosecution ought to have been instituted, must of course think that it was wrong to continue them. But if the prosecution originally was right, he could not conceive how any man should suppose it wrong to persist, notwithstanding the verdict of acquittal in the first case. He felt it his duty to prosecute the first, and on the same principle he felt it his duty to prosecute all. The prosecution had not been instituted from resentment to the individual prosecuted, but in so far as any criminal might be said to be prosecuted from the resentment which his crime had excited. If there had been only one libel, he would have been prosecuted for one. If that were right, could it be said that these publications should only be prosecuted once, because they had proceeded from the same individual? The object of the prosecution was not punishment, but the prevention of the circulation of the writings prosecuted. If some of them deserved prosecution, and others did not deserve it, the course persisted in was wrong; but if all were such as amounted to libel, he would ask upon what principle he should have withdrawn the prosecution against any one of them? What inference must the public have drawn if he had prosecuted for one, and not for others? They were all libels upon sacred subjects of the church service. The one was prosecuted because it was thought profane; the others were not noticed because they were perfectly innocent. He asked whether that was not the inference that must have been drawn? But all the publications were equally offensive, and therefore the author was prosecuted for all.— The objection now was, that after the first verdict of acquittal, the trials ought to have been given up. (Hear, hear.) It was matter of serious deliberation with him—so far as a man's mind could seriously deliberate on such a subject, between the termination of one trial and the commencement of another—whether he should proceed with the trials after the first acquittal. It was his deliberate opinion—whether right or wrong was for others to judge—that he was bound to proceed, unless he were convinced by the verdict of not guilty in the one trial, that the defendant was not guilty of the other two libels. He was not so convinced, and therefore he proceeded. He was sorry to allude in that house to verdicts in any courts of justice; yet although the jury had a right to find a verdict of guilty or not guilty, and God forbid that he should dispute that right, every man was entitled to exercise his judgment in matters of libel; and his opinion had been, that it was his bounden duty to prosecute for the second, unless something had occurred in the course of the first trial to convince him that he had been originally in an error. Three prosecutions had been entered on the record: unless he had felt that because the defendant had been acquitted of one libel, he was not guilty of the other two, was he to withdraw any one of the prosecutions from the record? What would have been said, had he prosecuted a second time merely because he had obtained a conviction on the first trial? Yet what was it but the same thing in principle, as forbearing to prosecute a second time because the verdict in the first case acquitted? If it could be shewn, or if it could be traced, that he had continued to prosecute from severity, it was matter of charge against him: but if that was not stated, to have discontinued the two trials because there was an acquittal on the first, would have been a confession that the first trial was wrong, unless the party had expressed contrition and regret for the ground of prosecution. Upon the whole, he conceived, that if he had discontinued the trials he would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty, he would have shewn an apprehension and fear unbecoming his situation, and injurious to the administration of justice.

Sir Samuel Romilly said, he agreed to every syllable of the address, and should be extremely sorry to say any thing that might interrupt the harmony of the house. There was one subject which should cause harmony to prevail on the present occasion, if any occurrence could have that effect. If ever there was an event of distress and calamity, it was the loss of the illustrious Princess who had engrossed the affections, and engaged the hopes of the nation. But it was the privilege of members to introduce on that occasion matters which had happened during the recess, and especially if they proceeded from measures sanctioned by themselves; therefore the noble lord (Althorp) was perfectly in order when he animadverted on the late trials. Those prosecutions were of the utmost importance, as part of the system of government now exercised. (Hear, hear, hear.) They threw great light on the extraordinary act which deprived us of the more valuable part of our constitution. The house had been called together under a public calamity; for what else was it to be called together under the suspension of the best parts of the constitution? He would not now say any thing of the promise of the immediate repeal of that measure. He only adverted to occurrences which threw light on the grounds on which the suspension was passed. On that measure they had proceeded in a great degree in the dark. The committees in that house and in the other house, for the lords' report had been communicated to them, had given their reason why they could not then disclose all the facts on which they had founded their judgment. Some of the facts, they had said, would compromise the safety of individuals who had communicated them, and others might have an undue influence on judicial proceedings which were in progress. But facts had now occurred which had thrown light upon the general assertions of those reports. He alluded to the proceedings at Manchester, at Derby, and in Scotland. All the evidence in all the transactions which had been made the subject of judicial inquiry, had tended to destroy the evidence on which they had acted in the last session. (Hear, hear.) The proceedings at Manchester, it would be remembered, occupied a large portion of the last report of the secret committees. It was stated in both the reports, that a treasonable conspiracy of the most atrocious kind, had existed at Manchester—that it had been in agitation to attack the barracks and to burn the manufactories, solely for the purpose of destroying the means of work, and adding by general distress to the numbers of those who would engage in desperate plans. In the lords' report the phrase was, to make Manchester a Moscow. It was stated in those reports, that some of the conspirators were in custody, and he had then suggested that they should be immediately brought to trial. But they were not indicted for a capital offence; and the causes were removed by certiorari into the Court of King's Bench, to prevent the disclosure of the facts by immediate trial. At the next assizes what occurred? The learned gentleman (Mr. Topping) who acted for the Attorney-General, said that he had no evidence to produce against any one of them. (Hear, hear.) It was stated, that the prosecutions were discontinued, because every thing was tranquil, and the ministers were willing to shew their clemency. (See vol. I. p. 1671. note.) Government knew from the beginning that no evidence could be brought against them by which they could be convicted, and therefore, turning the advantage they had gained against the people, for it was so, to their own account, they took credit for clemency, because they did not produce evidence which had never existed. (Much and continued cheering). If there had been evidence, was that an occasion for clemency? (Hear, hear.) Clemency was exercised on the ground of perfect tranquillity having been restored. What! were persons guilty of conspiring to burn factories, attack barracks, and create a revolution, to be therefore discharged without trial, and without punishment? These men were discharged early in September, yet other persons never charged with such atrocious intentions were still kept in prison. Those against whom stronger charges were made were liberated; those charged with slighter offences were kept in confinement. The next transactions that threw light upon the suspension were those in Scotland; but of those he would now say nothing, as the noble lord (Hamilton) behind him would introduce them particularly to their notice. The house would not forget the impression which had been made by the oath read to them by the learned Lord Advocate of Scotland. The person charged with having administered that oath was acquitted. (See vol. I. p. 1698, note) He would now say nothing of the extraordinary, unprecedented—unprecedented he was confident in England, and he believed even in Scotland—the unprecedented attempts to prevail upon another prisoner to give evidence against the accused. (Hear, hear, hear.) The next transactions to which he would call their attention were those at Derby. (See vol. I. Addenda, iv.) At present, he did not intend to enter into the question whether the persons prosecuted there were properly convicted. The law of high treason was discussed and explained with great ability by the counsel for the prisoners; and he did not see how the force of their arguments could be eluded. But, all the prisoners were guilty of capital offences; one had been guilty of murder, and the others, as aiding and abetting, were in law equally guilty. The proceedings on that trial pronounced a full condemnation on the suspension of the habeas corpus act. (Hear, hear.) In the first place, that act had been suspended five months, yet it did not prevent the commission of those crimes. It was evident, too, how much care was taken on those trials to conceal the truth. (Hear, hear). The Attorney-General, in his opening speech on those trials, had said, that he could prove that Brandreth had meetings with the conspirators previous to the 8th of June, and, if so, it was his duty to have given evidence respecting them. It was not merely the guilt or innocence of the individuals accused, that was at stake, but the character of the house, and the credit due to the government. Yet no evidence respecting those previous meetings was given. There was from this circumstance a strong presumption, and in his conscience he believed, from the information he had received, that the whole of that insurrection was the work of the persons sent by the government—not indeed for that specific purpose—but as emissaries of sedition from clubs that had never existed. The crown lawyers, in making out their case, took care that it should not be ascertained how far this information was correct. The Attorney-General was called on by the counsel for the prisoners to produce that evidence, on the first, on the second, and on the third trial; yet he persevered in the course which he had at first adopted, of leaving all the previous proceedings in obscurity. It had been often asked, when the suspension was proposed, what use was to be made of the extraordinary powers which ministers required? The invariable answer was, that when a conspiracy was detected, and an insurrection foreseen, the leaders could be apprehended, and all the mischief prevented. Now the ministers had previous information of Brandreth's designs, yet they did not seize him; they suffered him to go on; and thus, at the only time when this power might have been of use, it was not exerted. (Hear, hear.) The next subject to which he should advert, regarding the general conduct of administration since the last session, was the prosecutions carried on against Mr. Hone, to which his noble friend (Lord Althorp) had alluded. He did this the more willingly, as they made part of a connected system, and as the publications which they were instituted to suppress composed part of the evidence on which the liberties of the country were suspended. The house would remember that the late Attorney-General (Sir William Garrow) had stated that he had received a copy of one of those terrible parodies. He declared that it was monstrously blasphemous; and when some one had begged him to read it, he declared that he would not ever consent to any thing so horrible, as to read in the House of Commons such a production; (a laugh) that he would seal it up and lay it on the table, and if any one had curiosity enough to break the seal, the consequence should be on his head. Yet, notwithstanding this delicacy and regard to public morals, his hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General had proceeded in his endeavours to protect religion and morality, and had multiplied copies of these parodies by thousands, and scattered them in profusion over all parts of the country. (Hear, hear.) Before he commenced his prosecution, they had entirely disappeared—they had been suppressed by their author, and withdrawn altogether from circulation. It was stated by a witness on the trial of Mr. Hone, that he could not procure a copy by the most diligent search; and that a guinea was offered in vain for a work that had originally been published at two-pence. These parodies, therefore, had been completely withdrawn, and had disappeared from public notice, when his hon. and learned friend thought proper to publish a new edition of them (hear, and a laugh); and what was stronger still, on the pretence of preventing their publication. (Hear, hear.) He had given them a permanent place in the history of the country, he had made them a part of its judicial annals, he had given occasion to collect all the parodies that had been published in former ages, to print them in one convenient little volume, and to hand them down to posterity. (Hear, hear, hear.) And why was this done? Why were the prosecutions of Mr. Hone persisted in, if, according to the language held regarding the prisoners at Lancaster, the evil was stopped in September, and the state of the country had become so tranquil, and so satisfactory, as to enable administration to exercise with safety the royal clemency? His hon. and learned friend, it would appear from this proceeding, took credit for a clemency when he could not get a conviction, and when he could get a conviction was willing to shew no clemency. (Hear, hear.) He (Sir S. Romilly) did not mean to defend the publications in question; they were most offensive and reprehensible, though they did not amount to blasphemy, as they had been said to do elsewhere, though not on the prosecution. They were said to have been composed for a political object, and not for the purpose of attacking religion; but whatever was their object, their composition was most offensive and indefensible. To treat with levity the religion of the country, to hold up sacred subjects to ridicule by employing their language to promote political objects, and to inspire the minds of the people with a disrespect or contempt for those doctrines which should be respected for their importance to public morals by those even who did not believe them, was conduct that deserved the highest reprehension. He was willing to believe that his hon. and learned friend was not stimulated to such prosecutions by vindictive motives, but he could scarcely otherwise explain his conduct. If the prosecutions were not vindictive, why were they undertaken? Were they for prevention? And if so, had they prevented the circulation? But the publications themselves were stopped before he attempted to suppress them. This injudicious attempt brought them again into public notice, and gave them infinitely greater currency than they could have obtained in their original state, with a great mass of concealed, forgotten, and unknown parodies attached to them. He could not believe that his hon. and learned friend could have contemplated this consequence, and yet how could it have escaped him? Should he not have known, that on the trial, those parodies which had been before little known, or altogether forgotten, would be brought forward and circulated to an infinitely greater extent than if they had never been mixed with the proceedings of a court of justice? But, notwithstanding this natural anticipation, his hon. and learned friend had proceeded as if he could not give them currency enough; and after having seen the effect of one prosecution in bringing forward long forgotten parodies, went on with the other two, as if with the intention of procuring an accession of others. Why was the second prosecution persisted in by his hon. and learned friend, after he had failed in obtaining a verdict on the first? Because, said he, the second parody was as much a libel as the first, and to have relinquished the prosecution would have been a dereliction of his public duty. But was it the duty of an Attorney-General to prosecute every thing that was prosecutable? If this was the case, he was imposing upon himself more extensive obligations than he was probably aware of, and might be led to carry his prosecutions to other quarters. If this was the case, it became his hon. and learned friend to look about him. (hear, hear.) But, instead of three prosecutions, would not one have been sufficient; and should not at least the verdicts given in the two former have taught him what was to be expected on the third? In the third, however, he proceeded, although the Court of King's Bench, in a trial connected with the same publication, had considered it as less offensive than the two former publications, and had been induced to award a less severe penalty, because the defendant had shewn himself sensible of his error, and thrown himself on the tender mercies of the Attorney-General. (Hear, hear.)* The least criminal of the parodies was the last prosecuted, and the prosecution was persevered in after a double failing, according to the explanation of his hon. and learned friend himself, because he thought it would have manifested weakness in him to have relinquished it. (Hear, and a laugh.) He (Sir. S.) meant nothing personal to the Attorney-General. He was an agent of government, and doubtless acted on their views and by their instigation in bringing on the third trial. He was unwilling to believe that government themselves acted on any vindictive principles, but they must have had some reason for such extraordinary conduct. In searching after this reason, he was led to the discovery of an object, in which he hoped they were for ever defeated. He believed in his conscience that ministers, by urging these prosecutions in the face of repeated failures, wished to bring the trial by jury, that great safeguard of our rights, into discredit and contempt, that they might, by the assistance of a religious cry, be enabled, with less opposition, to lay restraints upon the press. He could not forget that in those vehicles of public opinion under the control of government, such a project was broached, and he was convinced that the destruction of that confidence generally reposed in juries was a preparatory part of the plan. If this was their object, it was happily defeated by the firmness of the juries, combined with the good sense, public spirit, and active vigilance of the country. The trial by jury was one of the great bulwarks of our rights, and he could scarcely have believed it possible that any ministers could have entertained the idea or the wish to bring it into discredit with the nation, unless he had remembered other transactions and attempts which seemed consistent with such an object. He could not have attributed to them such a design, if he did not know that the ministers composed the same government that issued directions to the magistrates how they were to act in the discharge of the duty which the constitution assigned them, and promulgated laws never before understood, on the authority of the legal advisers of the crown: if he did not know that they were the same administration that suspended the habeas corpus in time of peace; if he did not know that they were the same administration that presumed to say that the names of those imprisoned under it were not to be revealed, and that the royal prerogative should be interposed, contrary to law, between them and the visiting magistrates; if he did not know that they were the same government, who, after confining men for several months in prison without a charge, dismissed them without a trial, requiring them first to give security for their conduct, and when they refused such security, allowing them to depart without it† (hear, hear); trusting to a bill of indemnity to cover their conduct, which bill of indemnity he would oppose, whatever hopes they had of obtaining it. (Hear, hear, hear.) He could not, in fine, forget that they were the same government who, conscious that they had exposed themselves to be called to a severe account by the country, had endeavoured to excuse their own acts by requiring these prisoners to confess that they had done wrong, by giving security for the peace. If their object, in the repeated prosecutions of Mr. Hone, was what

* In 1817, two informations were filed against James Williams, a bookseller and stationer at Portsea, for printing and publishing two parodies; one on the Litany, the other on the Athanasian Creed. He suffered judgment to go by default; and on the 25th of November was brought into the Court of King's Bench to receive sentence, which was, that for the first libel, he should be imprisoned in Winchester gaol for eight calendar months, pay a fine of 100*l.* and give security for five years, himself in 300*l.* and two sureties in 150*l.* each; and for the second libel, that he should be imprisoned four calendar months.

† The persons who were liberated, without entering into the recognizances which were proposed to them respectively, as a condition of their freedom, were, William Benbow, Thomas Evans the elder, and Thomas Evans the younger. Their cases are fully set forth in the petitions which they presented to the house on the 31st of Jan. and the 13th of Feb. (See the proceedings on those days.)

he had stated, and what the whole tenour of their conduct justified him in believing, he was happy to see that they were defeated by the good sense and public principles of the people. If such plans had been formed, they had now proved abortive, and the religious cry by which the ministers had got into office had not, on this occasion, turned to their advantage.—The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by saying, that he thought it incumbent upon him to take the earliest opportunity of calling the attention of the house to the subjects to which he had shortly adverted, and that he should have reckoned silence on the present occasion a great dereliction of his public duty. (Hear, hear.)

The Solicitor-General said, he was surprised at the strange manner in which the noble lord and his hon. and learned friend had endeavoured to bring about that unanimity which they professed to desire. The speeches which they had delivered could not have been expected from them on the present occasion, as notice had been given of a motion on a subject directly involving the consideration of these transactions, which would afford them abundant opportunity of delivering their sentiments. His hon. and learned friend had entered into the discussion of the habeas corpus suspension act, and had stated, that subsequent evidence had destroyed the grounds on which it was passed. He had argued, that this act was not necessary, because the trials which had occurred since its enactment had removed the plea of danger on which it rested. But what were the grounds on which he proceeded in condemning the conduct of ministry and this act of the legislature? He had gone first to the trials at Lancaster, and the clemency of government to the disturbers of the public peace at Manchester. But his hon. and learned friend had not argued fairly this question, and by confounding two circumstances essentially distinct, had misrepresented facts. He had assumed that the men confined at Lancaster for engaging in what was called the blanketeer expedition, were the same as those alluded to in the report of the secret committee, as having formed a conspiracy for the destruction of Manchester. Nothing, however, could be more distinct than the case of these two classes of men. The individuals who were confined at Lancaster were imprisoned for a misdemeanour only, and were not implicated in a charge of treasonable conspiracy. Against them bills had been found by the grand jury, and they shared the royal clemency, because, though they might be instruments in the hands of other more guilty and designing men, it did not appear that they themselves had formed any such atrocious designs as the secret committee in its report alluded to; and government, taking into consideration the imprisonment they had suffered, were induced to discharge them, sensible as they appeared to be of their own culpability. His hon. and learned friend had then come to the trials at Derby, and he (the Solicitor-General) must say that he did not expect to hear any remarks on them. A more satisfactory judicial investigation had not occurred, he believed, in the annals of the country, nor had there been any instance in which the royal clemency had been more strikingly displayed. (Hear, hear.) His hon. and learned friend had accused the Attorney-General of alluding, on the trial of the men who were there convicted, to evidence of their criminal plots and proceedings, previous to the commission of those acts of treason for which they were indicted, and for not bringing forward that evidence at their trial. But surely nothing was more ungrounded than such a charge. The Attorney-General had heard of meetings among these men of a criminal nature, before the final meeting at Pentridge; but it was not incumbent upon him to produce all the evidence in his possession, when what he did produce was, in his opinion, sufficient. If that evidence would have availed the prisoners in their defence, it should have been called for by them or their learned counsel; but it was not the duty of the prosecution to produce it, when its production was thought unnecessary or superfluous. Government was called upon to go into a long history, when they could bring forward sufficient proofs of their charge without protracting the proceedings of the court. An argument like that of his hon. and learned friend would go to establish this principle, that satisfactory testimony was not to be received, because superfluous evidence was not produced. (Hear.) The absence of such testimony did not impeach the proceeding, and he was surprised to hear his hon. and learned friend reasoning as if it did. If the prisoners did not bring forward what was necessary for their defence, was government to prove matters irrelevant to their conviction? His hon. and learned friend had then followed the noble lord into Mr. Hone's case, and argued in a manner that equally surprised him. They both allowed that the publications in question were most reprehensible, but they reasoned as if an impolitic conduct and a vindictive spirit had been shewn in prosecuting the author. Their argument was, that the prosecution of such libels contributed to extend their circulation, and that therefore they ought not to have been prosecuted at all. The conclusion to which such an argument must lead would be, that the more atrocious the libel the greater would be its chance of impunity, because a prosecution would only give it additional currency. Such reasoning proved too much, and, therefore, proved nothing but the unfounded nature of the maxim it would establish. But then, said the noble lord, inasmuch as you persevered in the successive trials against Mr. Hone, you evinced an intention to appeal from the verdict of one jury to that of another. There might be some foundation for that charge, if the successive trials had reference to identical libels, but that was not the case. They constituted different offences. If a man committed three different murders on one night in the same house, would the acquittal on one murder constitute an argument against the further prosecution on the other indictments? That difference existed in the case of Mr. Hone; the offences were to be proved by distinct evidence. He was prepared to assert, that if a man sold three libels in the same shop, he might be prosecuted on an indictment which comprehended all the libellous publications. Yet if such a course had been pursued by the Attorney-General, it would no doubt have been considered as extremely severe, and calculated to embarrass and confuse the defence of the party. But what said his hon. and learned friend (Sir S. Romilly)? He met the objection of the noble lord; he asserted that the second libel for which Mr. Hone was arraigned was much more improper than the first; he said, that if it belonged to him to prosecute he would have selected the second publication as the one on which he would have proceeded. This view of the case might attach want of management to the Attorney-General—it might impute to him the error of selecting the weakest case for his first effort, but it decidedly disproved the assertion of the noble lord, that the same offence was, after one acquittal, again pertinaciously subjected to the decision of another jury. (Hear, hear, from the ministerial benches, and an observation from the opposition, What, as to the third publication?) The third publication had been admitted by the gentlemen opposite to be also improper; it constituted, in the opinion of his hon. and learned friend, only a lesser offence; that, however, was only his opinion, and, ex concessis, he had a right to assume that, as his hon. and learned friend would have tried Mr. Hone on the second publication. The objection of their being identical publications altogether failed, and the prosecutors of the crown were bound in duty to submit each of the indictments to the verdict of a jury. On those verdicts it did not become him to offer any observations—they were not called for by the present discussion. But his hon. and learned friend had said, that none of the prosecutions ought to have been tried, because, before the trial, the publication was suppressed. This would be a weak argument for abstaining from prosecution, even on the supposition that the suppression was complete; but here there was no such thing. Did not his hon. and learned friend know, that the libels had been circulated through the whole country, that they were republished in many places, and that almost immediately before, Williams had been punished for having printed what this defendant composed? Various prosecutions had been instituted. The libels were spreading in every direction, and therefore he could not allow it to go out to the public uncontradicted, that they had been completely suppressed by the voluntary exertion of their author. (Hear, hear.) He could not see on what ground the noble lord and his hon. friend could condemn the libels without approving of their prosecution. They were admitted on all hands to be wicked, reprehensible, and dangerous; and the officers of the crown would have abandoned their duty, if they had not endeavoured to stop their circulation, and to prevent the repetition of similar offences, by bringing their author to trial. No just ground of censure had been alleged against the conduct of his learned friend, the Attorney-General, and he therefore could not see the necessity of the observations in which his hon. and learned friend, preceded by the noble lord, had indulged.

The Lord Advocate said, that when the proper time arrived for discussing the state prosecutions in Scotland, and more particularly the case of M'Kinlay, he would shew that there was no incapacity in drawing up the indictment, nor any oppression exercised in the prosecution. He would produce, in his vindication, what was said by the judge to the prisoner after the trial, the verdict of the jury, and the evidence on which it proceeded. It would then appear, that the atrocity of the oath which he had the honour of reading to the house in the last session, was fully made out by the legal proceedings. With regard to what had been said about tampering with a witness, he would shew, when the proper time came, that nothing was done, nothing was promised, inconsistent with the strict duty of the officer concerned. He only begged that the opinion of the house might be suspended till the necessary explanations should appear.

Lord Archibald Hamilton wished to make only one or two observations. He had no desire to discuss the capacity or incapacity of the learned lord. If the prosecutions in England were improper, much more were they so in Scotland. The statements which the learned lord had made last year turned out to be erroneous. He had declared that hundreds of persons were involved in criminal proceedings; but if this was the case, why had no more than one been brought to trial? With regard to tampering with a witness, he still believed the learned lord involved in the charge, though not solely or chiefly. He only now protested against relying on such explanations as those of the learned lord till the proper time for the discussion arrived.

Lord Folkestone observed, that he was always reluctant to protract the attention of a house which shewed symptoms of weariness or impatience; but he held it to be inconsistent with his duty, to overlook the inadequacy of the proposed address, as descriptive of the conduct of his Majesty's ministers during the recess. After what had been said, he should not advert to the proceedings of the great law officers in Scotland, because that subject was to be formally brought under the notice of the house. He should forbear, therefore, from all discussion at present, and content himself with saying, that to those who were satisfied with the answer of the Solicitor-General to the speech of his hon. and learned friend, (Sir S. Romilly) with regard to the proceedings in the trials of Mr. Hone, he should despair of offering any argument, however convincing it might appear. His hon. and learned friend had been equally successful in shewing that the persons apprehended at Manchester were the same persons accused of a design to fire the town, upon the authority of a parliamentary report, which report, and the secret evidence upon which it was founded, formed in all probability, the sole reason for the subsequent apprehension of those persons.—With regard to the trials at Derby, he was not in a situation to say that the evidence was not sufficient to support the convictions: but he believed it to be impossible for any man attentively to examine the progress of those trials, without being persuaded that the cause and subject of them were as much the production of Oliver as any of the other transactions which had been already traced to his management and instigation. If this was the truth, and that it was he could himself entertain no doubt, he did not envy the feelings of those who, aware of all the circumstances, could be satisfied to find a sort of justification for their own previous measures, by consigning three wretched individuals to the last punishment of the laws*. In alluding to the different prosecutions against Mr. Hone, it appeared to him indisputable that they either originated in a spirit of persecution, or manifested a complete imbecility in directing the administration of justice. What, however, he most complained of, was the degradation to which courts of law had been subjected by this impolitic, if not unjust, perseverance in a hopeless prosecution. (Hear, hear.) Never before had the dignity and respectability of our criminal tribunals been so dangerously compromised. (Hear, hear.) Who was there who would deny that a deeper mischief had been planted, as respected those tribunals, than would have resulted to the interests of religion by declining to prosecute Mr. Hone? (Hear, hear.) He agreed with his hon. and learned friend, that a double motive was betrayed by his Majesty's ministers on that occasion; and that they contemplated either by a conviction to justify the outcry they had raised in the preceding session, or, in case of failure, a disposition on the part of the public to submit to some innovations in the law respecting trial by jury, which would have equally well answered their wishes and expectations. This, indeed, appeared to have been pretty satisfactorily proved by Mr. Hone himself in the Court of King's Bench, and it was a subject that would well merit investigation hereafter. There was another topic upon which he was desirous of saying a few words, because it was one in which he had himself taken a personal interest, namely, the imprisonment and solitary confinement of certain persons in a neighbouring county. (See Vol. I. p. 1432. Addenda, p. xxvii.) He mentioned it at present, however, only for the purpose of supporting the proposition that he had already submitted, which was, that the measures and conduct of ministers had a direct tendency to lessen the respect due to courts of law; and without which, their authority could never be effectually maintained. The court of quarter sessions was a court whose extensive jurisdiction was undisputed; but its authority had been openly questioned and resisted by the agents of a Secretary of State. When he considered the present address as committing the house to a vote of approbation of all the conduct to which he had thus referred, (cries of No, No, from the Treasury Bench,) he had intended to say he could not suppress the objections which he entertained to such a vote; but as he found that he had misapprehended the true construction of the address as to this point, he should confine his observations to this statement—that the address was utterly deficient in that feeling which it became a British House of Commons to express at a moment when the liberties of the country lay prostrate, and at the mercy of the executive government. (Hear, hear, hear.) It had been said by the hon. seconder of the address, that it contained nothing against which a just exception might be taken. This character of an address to the throne did not satisfy him. His notion of the speech itself was, that it contained an extorted exposition of the real or pretended condition of the country, and he knew that it was but very recently that the addresses in answer had become mere echoes, and had degenerated into those wishy washy compositions which it was now the custom to propose to them. During the reign of King William, and it would be allowed that that was one of the good times of the constitution, it was the practice, after receiving the speech from the throne, to return an address two or three days afterwards, the intermediate period being passed in deliberating upon the nature and truth of those political representations which the speech contained. This was a practice which appeared to him to have some sense in it, and it was curious to observe how it had been eaten out. The custom of making the address a sort of answer, or, as it was called, echo of each particular subject that was touched upon, was gradually introduced: formerly the members on each side of the house assembled in the cockpit the day before the meeting of Parliament, when the speech was read, and those who heard it were so far enabled to prepare themselves for a mature consideration of it. Although not very old, he could himself remember the existence of this rule. Now, according to the reasoning of the hon. seconder, they ought to concur unanimously in the address, because it contained nothing to which an exception could be taken, or, in other words, because it contained just nothing. But surely a separate address with regard to the death of her Royal Highness would be more respectful to her memory, and, as it was adopted on the occasion of the decease of the Duke of Gloucester, would be most conformable to precedent in such cases. In adverting to that calamity which all men deplored, he joined the more readily in that expression of feeling which it had called forth, because he saw a right hon. gentleman in his place, who had, on a former occasion, thought proper to represent him as an enemy to the house of Brunswick. (Hear, hear.) He was naturally anxious, if it were only on that account, to mingle his regret with the universal sorrow which a calamity so hazardous to that illustrious family had inspired. It was most important also, in his opinion, to mark that universal sorrow, because it must satisfy every reasonable mind of the fallacy of those assertions which imputed disaffection to the people. (Hear, hear.) A more heart-felt mourning, a deeper consciousness of calamity was not displayed, when in the last and greatest of the Egyptian plagues, every parent suddenly found that he was deprived of his first-born child. (Hear, hear.) The grief occasioned by this sad event had been universal, and the people, in their addresses to the throne, had stated their reason for feeling so acutely on the occasion. They lamented the loss of that bright promise of a virtuous and beneficent sovereign, which they had so long contemplated with feelings of delight. (Hear, hear.) Every one of their addresses mentioned the private and public virtues of that amiable Princess—every one of them eulogized the exemplary manner in which she had discharged the various duties of her station, during her short but honourable life. (Hear, hear.) If any persons believed that there were enemies to the house of Brunswick—if any persons thought that disaffection towards it existed—they must be taught by the uniform conduct of the people on this melancholy occasion, that it was not directed against that part of it which was dignified by virtue. (Hear, hear.) If there was any hostility to any part of that house—and he did not believe that there was, let those who were the objects of it, attribute it to themselves, and not to any base feeling of the popular mind. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh declared, that desirous as he was of meeting the objections and animadversions which had been brought forward, not only with regard to the address immediately under consideration, but as respected the conduct of ministers during the recess of Parliament, yet as he was aware of the numerous opportunities that would soon present themselves for discussing them separately and in detail, he should reserve himself for those occasions, when he trusted that a satisfactory explanation would be furnished. It appeared to him to be quite foreign to the question, and calculated unnecessarily to disturb the unanimity which the deep and irreparable loss that had been sustained rendered so desirable, to agitate subjects which in themselves formed distinct objects of inquiry, before any regular information was adduced. There were, indeed, observations in the course of the noble lord's speech against which he must immediately protest, and particularly against the statement which represented the trials at Derby to have arisen out of the proceedings of a spy employed by the government. He now undertook most fully to disprove such an assertion whenever the proper time of investigation should arrive. It was enough for the present to remark, that not a scintilla of evidence had appeared during the trials to shew the slightest foundation for this belief. He could not conceive what part of the conduct of administration had induced the hon. and learned gentleman to conclude that his Majesty's ministers had it in contemplation to propose new measures restrictive of the liberty of the subject. He was not conscious that they had manifested any disposition of such a nature; and he was happy to assure the house, that he should, on an early day, be prepared to communicate information with regard to all that had been passing in the country since the last session. (Hear, hear.) He believed sincerely, that this information would satisfy, not only the hon. members opposite, but would satisfy the house and the public, that the measures adopted during the last session, had been founded not merely on prudential considerations, but on a strict necessity, and that it was to them that we were indebted for the internal tranquillity which had been restored. The energy of Parliament had not only provided the Suspension Act, but had ensured its speedy termination. His Majesty's ministers, who had been placed in a situation of great difficulty, would not shrink from the most rigid scrutiny into their conduct, and would be found, he confidently hoped, to have faithfully discharged the trust confided to them; to have administered justice duly tempered with mercy; and to have contended successfully against the danger with which the country had been threatened. The greatest of those dangers he believed had passed by: but he would not lull Parliament into a belief that perfect security was restored. It gave him, however, sincere satisfaction to congratulate the house on the unprecedented rapidity with which the country had passed from a state of depression to one of progressive prosperity, which there was every reason to believe would continue. In the earnest hope, therefore, that the present discussion would terminate, so as to be most expressive of that unanimity which was due to the melancholy event recorded in the speech, he should only repeat the assurance, that there would be ample opportunity afforded for the consideration of all the points to which the attention of the house had been now prematurely drawn.

Mr. Bennet expressed his entire concurrence with the noble lord (Folkestone) as to the conduct of his Majesty's ministers, for he could assure the house, that he was prepared to prove, upon the proper occasion, that notwithstanding those confident assertions by which ministers contrived to persuade some gentlemen to agree to their measures of restriction upon the liberty of the subject, the greater part, if not the whole, of the disaffection which formed the groundwork of their proposition, was created by emissaries employed and paid by ministers themselves. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham most willingly agreed to that part of the address which related to an event upon which there was but one feeling throughout the empire. The unanimity which the noble secretary of state anticipated, was, he thought, not likely to be disturbed by the reference that had been made to the history of the country, since the first report of the committee upon which the habeas corpus act was suspended. On the contrary, the house must derive considerable satisfaction from the statement of the noble lord, that it was the intention of ministers at length to produce some evidence of the grounds upon which that suspension was proposed. He was glad to learn that it was at last intended to submit this evidence to a committee, which should have the power of examining persons as well as the documents prepared by his Majesty's ministers, for thus an opportunity would be afforded of inquiring not only into the communications which ministers might think proper to make, but also into such evidence as the hon. member for Shrewsbury and others were enabled to bring forward. With this impression of the proceeding which it was intended should take place, he concurred in the opinion that any further discussion at the present moment would be useless and premature. His own opinions, undoubtedly, remained as they were during the last session, with regard to the evidence, or rather want of evidence, upon which the suspension act rested, and he had only to hope, that he might be at length convinced, that the constitution had not been suspended without adequate cause.

Lord Castlereagh rose to explain: he disclaimed any intention of proposing a new committee of inquiry, of the nature alluded to by the hon. and learned gentleman.

Mr. Brougham expressed his regret, if he had misunderstood the noble lord, for he could not apprehend that any satisfaction was likely to be felt by the house and the country, should the committee to be appointed be furnished only with a green bag full of documents, prepared by ministers themselves.

Lord Cochrane thought the address extremely dissatisfactory, for it held out no promise even of economy or retrenchment. How different was this composition from the speech of the American President, which had lately appeared in the public journals. In that speech, from the chief ruler of a nation which our ministers threatened and sought to destroy in the late war, there was a distinct recital of evidence to prove its growing and general improvement. In the speech before the house there was no doubt a confident assertion of national prosperity, but no specific instance of that prosperity was even alluded to. The reason, however, was obvious, for no specific instance could be cited. That indeed was impossible amidst the misery that universally prevailed, while the revenue was notoriously deficient, while the workhouses were crowded with paupers, while the streets were thronged with starving seamen, and the poor rates had increased beyond any former precedent. And what had ministers presented in atonement for their delinquency? Why, truly, a recommendation to build churches. This, however, was not a new expedient, for it was the practice of sinners in all ages to build churches. If, indeed, ministers had proposed to enlarge the gaols or the alms-houses, where at least the inmates were saved from starving, or to do any thing for the solid benefit of the public, they might have some claim to praise. But their allegation of prosperity, and their proposition of improvement, really mocked the public understanding. It was obviously impossible that any country could go on in the state in which England was at present, with a falling revenue and a starving people—with a greater degree of misery among the population, than was to be found under any arbitrary government which the British ministers might desire to imitate. For in no nation in Europe, not even in Spain, Italy, or Portugal, could such mendicity and wretchedness be found, as were at present daily witnessed in the public streets of this great metropolis. For the reasons he had mentioned, he could not hesitate to pronounce this address a direct insult to the feelings and the understanding of the country.

The motion was then unanimously agreed to, and a committee was appointed to draw up the address.

Lord Castlereagh then gave notice, that he should to-morrow move an address of condolence to her Majesty, and a similar address to his Serene Highness Prince Leopold, on the afflicting death of her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, Jan. 28.

The Duke of Northumberland and the Bishop of Kildare took the oaths and their seats.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] The Earl of Liverpool laid on the table the following copy of the treaty between his Britannic Majesty, and his Catholic Majesty, for preventing their subjects from engaging in any illicit traffic in Slaves. Signed at Madrid, the 23d of September, 1817.

"In the Name of the Most Holy Trinity.

It having been stated in the second additional article of the treaty, signed at Madrid on the 5th day of July of the year 1814, between his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and his Majesty the King of Spain and the Indies, that "his Catholic Majesty concurs, in the fullest manner, in the sentiments of his Britannic Majesty, with respect to the injustice and inhumanity of the traffic in slaves, and promises to take into consideration, with the deliberation which the state of his possessions in America demands, the means of acting in conformity with those sentiments: and engages, moreover, to prohibit his subjects from carrying on the slave trade, for the purpose of supplying any islands or possessions, excepting those appertaining to Spain; and to prevent, by effectual measures and regulations, the protection of the Spanish flag being given to foreigners who may engage in this traffic, whether subjects of his Britannic Majesty or of any other state or power."

And his Catholic Majesty, conformably to the spirit of this article, and of the principles of humanity with which he is animated, having never lost sight of an object so interesting to him, and being desirous of hastening the moment of its attainment, has resolved to cooperate with his Britannic Majesty in the cause of humanity, by adopting, in concert with his said Majesty, efficacious means for bringing about the abolition of the slave trade, for effectually suppressing illicit traffic in slaves, on the part of their respective subjects, and for preventing Spanish ships trading in slaves, conformably to law and to treaty, from being molested or subjected to losses from British cruisers; the two high contracting parties have accordingly named as their plenipotentiaries, viz.:—

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Hon. Sir Henry Wellesley, a member of his Majesty's most hon. Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the most hon. Order of the Bath, and his Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to his Catholic Majesty; and his Majesty the King of Spain and the Indies, Don Josef Garcia de Leon y Pizarro, Knight Grand Cross of the royal and distinguished Spanish Order of Charles III., of that of St. Ferdinand and of Merit, of Naples, of those of St. Alexander Newsky and of St Anne of Russia, and of that of the Red Eagle of Prussia, Counsellor of State, and First Secretary of State and of the general despatch; who, having exchanged their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:—

Art. 1. His Catholic Majesty engages, that the slave trade shall be abolished throughout the entire dominions of Spain, on the 30th day of May, 1820, and that, from and after that period, it shall not be lawful for any of the subjects of the crown of Spain to purchase slaves, or to carry on the slave trade on any part of the coast of Africa, upon any pretext or in any manner whatever; provided, however, that a term of five months, from the said date of the 30th of May, 1820, shall be allowed for completing the voyages of vessels, which shall have cleared out lawfully previously to the said 30th of May.

Art. 2. It is hereby agreed, that from and after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, it shall not be lawful for any of the subjects of the crown of Spain to purchase slaves, or to carry on the slave trade on any part of the coast of Africa to the north of the equator, upon any pretext or in any manner whatever; provided, however, that a term of six months from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, shall be allowed for completing the voyages of vessels which shall have cleared out from Spanish ports for the said coast, previously to the exchange of the said ratifications.

Art. 3. His Britannic Majesty engages to pay, in London, on the 20th of February, 1818, the sum of 400,000*l.* sterling, to such persons as his Catholic Majesty shall appoint to receive the same.

Art. 4. The said sum of 400,000*l.* sterling is to be considered as a full compensation for all losses sustained by the subjects of his Catholic Majesty engaged in this traffic, on account of vessels captured previously to the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, as also for the losses which are a necessary consequence of the abolition of the said traffic.

Art. 5. One of the objects of this treaty, on the part of the two governments, being mutually to prevent their respective subjects from carrying on an illicit slave trade:

The two high contracting parties declare, that they consider as illicit, any traffic in slaves carried on under the following circumstances:—

1st. Either by British ships, and under the British flag, or for the account of British subjects, by any vessel or under any flag whatsoever.

2d. By Spanish ships, upon any part of the coast of Africa, north of the equator, after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty; provided, however, that six months shall be allowed for completing the voyages of vessels, conformably to the tenor of the second article of this treaty.

3d. Either by Spanish ships, and under the Spanish flag, or for the account of Spanish subjects, by any vessel or under any flag whatsoever, after the 30th of May, 1820, when the traffic in slaves, on the part of Spain, is to cease entirely: provided always, that five months shall be allowed for the completion of voyages commenced in due time, conformably to the first article of this treaty.

4th. Under the British or Spanish flag, for the account of the subjects of any other government.

5th. By Spanish vessels bound for any port not in the dominions of his Catholic Majesty.

6th. His Catholic Majesty will adopt, in conformity to the spirit of this treaty, the measures which are best calculated to give full and complete effect to the laudable objects which the high contracting parties have in view.

7th. Every Spanish vessel which shall be destined for the slave trade, on any part of the coast of Africa where this traffic still continues to be lawful, must be provided with a royal passport, conformable to the model annexed to the present treaty, and which model forms an integral part of the same. This passport must be written in the Spanish language, with an authentic translation in English annexed thereto; and it must be signed by his Catholic Majesty, and countersigned by the Minister of Marine, and also by the principal naval authority of the district, station, or port from whence the vessel clears out, whether in Spain, or in the colonial possessions of his Catholic Majesty.

8th. It is to be understood that this passport, for rendering lawful the voyages of slave-ships, is required only for the continuation of the traffic to the south of the line; those passports which are now issued, signed by the first secretary of state of his Catholic Majesty, and in the form prescribed by the order of the 16th of December, 1816, remaining in full force for all vessels which may have cleared out for the coast of Africa, as well to the north as to the south of the line, previously to the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty.

9th. The two high contracting parties, for the more complete attainment of the object of preventing all illicit traffic in slaves on the part of their respective subjects, mutually consent, that the ships of war of their royal navies, which shall be provided with special instructions for this purpose, as hereinafter mentioned, may visit such merchant vessels of the two nations as may be suspected, upon reasonable grounds, of having slaves on board, acquired by an illicit traffic, and, in the event only of their finding slaves on board, may detain and bring away such vessels, in order that they may be brought to trial before the tribunals established for this purpose, as shall hereinafter be specified.

Provided always, that the commanders of the ships of war of the two royal navies, who shall be employed on this service, shall adhere strictly to the exact tenor of the instructions which they shall receive for this purpose.

As this article is entirely reciprocal, the two high contracting parties engage mutually, to make good any losses which their respective subjects may incur unjustly, by the arbitrary and illegal detention of their vessels.

It being understood that this indemnity shall invariably be borne by the government whose cruiser shall have been guilty of the arbitrary detention; provided always, that the visit and detention of slave-ships, specified in this article, shall only be effected by those British or Spanish vessels which may form part of the two royal navies, and by those only of such vessels which are provided with the special instructions annexed to the present treaty.

10th. No British or Spanish cruiser shall detain any slave-ship not having slaves actually on board; and in order to render lawful the detention of any ship, whether British or Spanish, the slaves found on board such vessel must have been brought there for the express purpose of the traffic; and those on board of Spanish ships must have been taken from that part of the coast of Africa where the slave trade is prohibited, conformably to the tenor of the present treaty.

11th. All ships of war of the two nations, which shall hereafter be destined to prevent the illicit traffic in slaves, shall be furnished by their own government with a copy of the instructions annexed to the present treaty, and which shall be considered as an integral part thereof.

These instructions shall be written in Spanish and English, and signed for the vessels of each of the two powers, by the minister of their respective marine.

The two high contracting parties reserve the faculty of altering the said instructions, in whole or in part, according to circumstances; it being, however, well understood, that the said alterations cannot take place but by the common agreement, and by the consent of the two high contracting parties.

12th. In order to bring to adjudication with the least delay and inconvenience, the vessels which may be detained for having been engaged in an illicit traffic of slaves, there shall be established, within the space of a year at furthest, from the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, two mixed commissions, formed of an equal number of individuals of the two nations, named for this purpose by their respective Sovereigns.

These commissions shall reside—one in a possession belonging to his Britannic Majesty—the other within the territories of his Catholic Majesty; and the two governments, at the period of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, shall declare, each for its own dominions, in what places the commissions shall respectively reside. Each of the two high contracting parties reserving to itself the right of changing, at its pleasure, the place of residence of the commission held within its own dominions; provided, however, that one of the two commissions shall always be held upon the coast of Africa, and the other in one of the colonial possessions of his Catholic Majesty.

These commissions shall judge the causes submitted to them without appeal, and according to the regulation and instructions annexed to the present treaty, of which they shall be considered as an integral part.

13th. The acts or instruments annexed to this treaty, and which form an integral part thereof, are as follows:—

No. 1. Form of passport for the Spanish merchant ships, destined for the lawful traffic in slaves.

No. 2. Instructions for the ships of war of both nations, destined to prevent the illicit traffic in slaves.

No. 3. Regulation for the mixed commissions, which are to hold their sittings on the coast of Africa, and in one of the colonial possessions of his Catholic Majesty.

14th. The present treaty, consisting of 14 articles, shall be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged at Madrid, within the space of two months from this date, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have thereunto affixed the seal of their arms.

Done at Madrid, this 23d day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventeen.

Form of Passport for Spanish vessels destined for the lawful traffic in slaves.

Ferdinand, by the Grace of God, King of Castille, of Leon, of Arragon, of the two Sicilies, of Jerusalem, of Navarre, of Granada, of Toledo, of Valencia, of Gallicia, of Majorca, of Minorca, of Seville, of Sardinia, of Cordova, of Corsica, of Murcia, of Jaen, of the Algarves, of Algesiras, of Gibraltar, of the Canary Islands, of the East and West Indies, Isles, and Terra Firma of the Ocean; Archduke of Austria; Duke of Burgundy, of Brabant, and of Milan; Count of Apsburgh, Flanders, Tirol and Barcelona; Lord of Biscay and of Molina, &c.

Whereas I have granted permission for the vessel called of tons, and carrying men and passengers; master and owner, both Spaniards, and subjects of my crown, to proceed bound to the ports of and coast of Africa, from whence she is to return to the said master and owner having previously taken the required oath before the tribunal of Marine of the proper Naval Division from whence the said vessel sails, and legally proved that no foreigner has any share in the above vessel and cargo, as appears by the certificate annexed to this passport; which certificate is given by the same tribunal, in consequence of the steps taken in pursuance of the directions contained in the Ordinance of Matriculation of 1802.

The said captain, and owner of the said vessel being under an obligation to enter solely such ports on the coast of Africa as are to the south of the line; and to return from thence to any of the ports of my dominions, where alone they shall be permitted to land the slaves whom they carry, after going through the proper forms, to shew that they have, in every respect, complied with the provisions of my royal decree of 1817, by which the mode of conveying slaves from the coast of Africa to my colonial dominions is regulated; and should they fail in any of these conditions, they shall be liable to the penalties denounced by the said decree against those who shall carry on the slave trade in an illicit manner.

I therefore command all general and other officers commanding my squadrons and ships; the captain-generals of the departments of marine, the military commandants of the provinces of the same, their subalterns, captains of the ports, and all other officers and persons belonging to the navy; the viceroys, captain-generals or commandants of kingdoms and provinces; the governors, mayors, and justices of the towns upon the sea-coast of my dominions of Indies; the royal officers or judges of entries therein established; and all others of my subjects to whom it belongs, or may belong, not to give her any obstruction, nor to occasion her any inconvenience or detention, but rather to aid her and to furnish her with whatever she may want for her regular navigation; and of the vassals and subjects of kings, princes, and republics in friendship and alliance with me; of the commanders, governors, or chiefs of their provinces, fortresses, squadrons and vessels, I require that they likewise shall not impede her in her free navigation, entry, departure, or detention in the ports to which, by any accident, she may be carried; but permit her to provide and supply herself therein with whatever she may be in need of, for which purpose I have commanded this passport to be made out, which, being signed for its validity by my secretary of state for the despatch of Marine, shall serve for the time that a voyage, going and returning, may last; after the conclusion of which, it shall be returned to the commandant of Marine, governor or other person by whom it may have been issued; adding, for its proper use, the corresponding note.

Given at Madrid, on

I, THE KING.

Note. This passport, No. authorizes any number of slaves, not exceeding being in the proportion of five slaves for every two tons (as permitted by the royal decree of 1817) excepting always such slaves employed as sailors or domestics, and children born on board during the voyage; and the same is issued by me the undersigned on the day of this date, made out in favour of who has previously conformed with all the formalities required by the Royal Decree of 1817, and is bound to return it immediately upon his return from the voyage.

Given at on the of of the year .

Instructions for the British and Spanish ships of war employed to prevent the illicit traffic in slaves.

Art. 1. Every British or Spanish ship of war shall, in conformity with Article IX. of the treaty of this date, have a right to visit the merchant ships of either of the two powers actually engaged, or suspected to be engaged in the slave trade; and should any slaves be found on board, according to the tenor of the Xth Article of the aforesaid treaty;—and as to what regards the Spanish vessels, should there be ground to suspect that the said slaves have been embarked on a part of the coast of Africa where the traffic is no longer permitted, conformably to the Articles I. and II. of the treaty of this date; in these cases alone, the commander of the said ship of war may detain them; and having detained them, he is to bring them, as soon as possible for judgment, before that of the two mixed commissions appointed by the XIIth Article of the treaty of this date, which shall be the nearest, or which the commander of the capturing ship shall, upon his own responsibility, think he can soonest reach from the spot where the slave ship shall have been detained.

Ships, on board of which no slaves shall be found, intended for purposes of traffic, shall not be detained on any account or pretence whatever.

Negro servants or sailors that may be found on board the said vessels, cannot, in any case, be deemed a sufficient cause for detention.

Art. 2. No Spanish merchantman or slave ship shall, on any pretence whatever, be detained, which shall be found any where near the land or on the high seas south of the Equator, during the period for which the traffic is to remain lawful, according to the stipulations subsisting between the high contracting parties, unless after a chace that shall have commenced north of the Equator.

Art. 3. Spanish vessels, furnished with a regular passport, having slaves on board, shipped at those parts of the coast of Africa where the trade is permitted to Spanish subjects, and which shall afterwards be found north of the Equator, shall not be detained by the ships of war of the two nations, though furnished with the present instructions, provided the same can account for their course, either in conformity with the practice of the Spanish navigation, by steering some degrees to the northward in search of fair winds, or for other legitimate causes, such as the dangers of the sea, duly proved; provided always, that, with regard to all slave ships detained to the north of the Equator, after the expiration of the term allowed, the proof of the legality of the voyage is to be furnished by the vessel so detained. On the other hand, with respect to slave ships detained to the south of the Equator, in conformity with the stipulations of the preceding article, the proof of the illegality of the voyage is to be exhibited by the captor.

It is in like manner stipulated, that the number of slaves found on board a slave ship by the cruizers, even should the number not agree with that contained in their passport, shall not be sufficient reason to justify the detention of the ship; but the captain and the proprietor shall be denounced in the Spanish tribunals, in order to their being punished according to the laws of the country.

Art. 4. Every Spanish vessel intended to be employed in the legal traffic in slaves, in conformity with the principles laid down in the treaty of this date, shall be commanded by a native Spaniard, and two-thirds at least of the crew shall likewise be Spaniards; provided always, that its Spanish or foreign construction shall, in no wise, affect its nationality, and that the negro sailors shall always be reckoned as Spaniards, provided they belong, as slaves, to subjects of the crown of Spain, or that they have been enfranchised in the dominions of his Catholic Majesty.

Art. 5. Whenever a ship of war shall meet a merchantman liable to be searched, it shall be done in the most mild manner, and with every attention which is due between allied and friendly nations; and in no case shall the search be made by an officer holding a rank inferior to that of lieutenant in the navy of Great Britain, or of ensign of a ship of the line in the Spanish navy.

Art. 6. The ships of war which may detain any slave ship, in pursuance of the principles laid down in the present instructions, shall leave on board all the cargo of negroes untouched, as well as the captain and a part, at least, of the crew of the above-mentioned slave ship; the captain shall draw up in writing, an authentic declaration, which shall exhibit the state in which he found the detained ship, and the changes which may have taken place in it; he shall deliver to the captain of the slave ship a signed certificate of the papers seized on board the said vessel, as well as of the number of slaves found on board at the moment of detention.

The negroes shall not be disembarked till after the vessels which contain them shall be arrived at the place where the legality of the capture is to be tried by one of the two mixed commissions, in order that in the event of their not being adjudged legal prize, the loss of the proprietors may be more easily repaired. If, however, urgent motives, deduced from the length of the voyage, the state of health of the negroes, or other causes, required that they should be disembarked entirely, or in part, before the vessel could arrive at the place of residence of one of the said commissions, the commander of the capturing ship may take on himself the responsibility of such disembarkation, provided that the necessity be stated in a certificate in proper form.

Art. 7. No conveyance of slaves from one port in the Spanish possessions to another shall take place, except in ships provided with passports from the government on the spot, ad hoc.

Done at Madrid the twenty-third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventeen.

Regulations for the Mixed Commissions, which are to reside on the Coast of Africa, and in a Colonial Possession of his Catholic Majesty.

Art. 1. The mixed commissions to be established by the treaty of this date, upon the coast of Africa and in a colonial possession of his Catholic Majesty, are appointed to decide upon the legality of the detention of such slave vessels as the cruizers of both nations shall detain, in pursuance of this same treaty, for carrying on an illicit commerce in slaves.

The above-mentioned commissions shall judge, without appeal, according to the letter and spirit of the treaty of this date.

The commissions shall give sentence as summarily as possible, and they are required to decide, (as far as they shall find it practicable,) within the space of twenty days, to be dated from that on which every detained vessel shall have been brought into the port where they shall reside; first, upon the legality of the capture; second, in the case in which the captured vessel shall have been liberated, as to the indemnification which she is to receive.

And it is hereby provided, that, in all cases, the final sentence shall not be delayed, on account of the absence of witnesses, or for want of other proofs, beyond the period of two months; except upon the application of any of the parties interested, when, upon their giving satisfactory security to charge themselves with the expense and risks of the delay, the Commissioners may, at their discretion, grant an additional delay, not exceeding four months.

Art. 2. Each of the above-mentioned mixed commissions which are to reside on the coast of Africa, and in a colonial possession of his Catholic Majesty, shall be composed in the following manner:

The two high contracting parties shall each of them name a commissary judge, and a commissioner of arbitration, who shall be authorized to hear and to decide, without appeal, all cases of capture of slave vessels which, in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty of this date, may be laid before them. All the essential parts of the proceedings carried on before these mixed commissions, shall be written down in the legal language of the country in which the commission may reside.

The commissary judges and the commissioners of arbitration, shall make oath, in presence of the principal magistrate of the place in which the commission may reside, to judge fairly and faithfully, to have no preference either for the claimants or the captors, and to act, in all their decisions, in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty of this date.

There shall be attached to each commission a secretary or registrar, appointed by the sovereign of the country in which the commission may reside, who shall register all its acts, and who, previous to his taking charge of his post, shall make oath, in presence of at least one of the commissary judges, to conduct himself with respect for their authority, and to act with fidelity in all the affairs which may belong to his charge.

Art. 3. The form of the process shall be as follows:

The commissary judges of the two nations shall, in the first place, proceed to the examination of the papers of the vessel, and to receive the depositions on oath of the captain and of two or three, at least, of the principal individuals on board of the detained vessel, as well as the declaration on oath of the captor, should it appear necessary, in order to be able to judge and to pronounce if the said vessel has been justly detained or not, according to the stipulations of the treaty of this date, and in order that, according to this judgment, it may be condemned or liberated. And in the event of the two commissary judges not agreeing on the sentence they ought to pronounce, whether as to the legality of the detention, or the indemnification to be allowed, or on any other question which might result from the stipulations of the treaty of this date,—they shall draw by lot the name of one of the two commissioners of arbitration, who, after having considered the documents of the process, shall consult with the above-mentioned commissary judges on the case in question, and the final sentence shall be pronounced conformably to the opinion of the majority of the above-mentioned commissary judges, and of the above-mentioned commissioner of arbitration.

Art. 4. As often as the cargo of slaves found on board of a Spanish slave ship, shall have been embarked on any point whatever of the coast of Africa where the slave trade continues to be lawful, such slave ship shall not be detained on pretext that the above-mentioned slaves have been brought originally by land from any other part whatever of the continent.

Art. 5. In the authenticated declaration which the captor shall make before the commission, as well as in the certificate of the papers seized, which shall be delivered to the captain of the captured vessel at the time of the detention, the above-mentioned captor shall be bound to declare his name, the name of his vessel, as well as the latitude and longitude of the place where the detention shall have taken place, and the number of slaves found living on board of the slave ship at the time of the detention.

Art. 6. As soon as sentence shall have been passed, the detained vessel, if liberated, and what remains of the cargo shall be restored to the proprietors, who may, before the same commission, claim a valuation of the damages, which they may have a right to demand; the captor himself, and in his default, his government, shall remain responsible for the above-mentioned damages.

The two high contracting parties bind themselves to defray, within the term of a year from the date of the sentence, the indemnifications which may be granted by the above-named commission, it being understood that these indemnifications should be at the expense of the power of which the captor shall be a subject.

Art. 7. In case of the condemnation of a vessel for an unlawful voyage, she shall be declared lawful prize, as well as her cargo, of whatever description it may be, with the exception of the slaves who may be on board as objects of commerce; and the said vessel, as well as her cargo, shall be sold by public sale for the profit of the two governments; and as to the slaves, they shall receive from the mixed commission a certificate of emancipation, and shall be delivered over to the government on whose territory the commission, which shall have so judged them, shall be established, to be employed as servants or free labourers. Each of the two governments binds itself to guarantee the liberty of such portion of these individuals as shall be respectively consigned to it.

Art. 8. Every claim for compensation of losses occasioned to ships suspected of carrying on an illicit trade in slaves, not condemned as lawful prize by the mixed commissions, shall be also heard and judged by the above-named commissions, in the form provided by the third article of the present regulation. And in all cases wherein restitution shall be so decreed, the commission shall award to the claimant or claimants, or his or their lawful attorney or attornies, for his or their use, a just and complete indemnification, for all costs of suit, and for all losses and damages which the claimant or claimants may have actually sustained by such capture and detention: that is to say, in case of total loss, the claimant or claimants shall be indemnified, first, for the ship, her tackle, apparel, and stores; secondly, for all freight due and payable; thirdly, for the value of the cargo of merchandise, if any; fourthly, for the slaves on board at the time of detention, according to the computed value of such slaves at the place of destination, deducting therefrom the usual fair average mortality for the unexpired period of the regular voyage; deducting also for all charges and expenses payable upon the sale of such cargoes, including commission of sale; and fifthly, for all other regular charges in such cases of total loss: and in all other cases not of total loss, the claimant or claimants shall be indemnified; first, for all special damages and expenses occasioned to the ship by the detention, and for loss of freight when due or payable; secondly, a demurrage, when due, according to the schedule annexed to the present article; thirdly, a daily allowance for the subsistence of slaves, of one shilling or four reals and a half de vn. for each person, without distinction of sex or age, for so many days as it shall appear to the commission that the voyage has been or may be delayed by reason of such detention; as likewise: fourthly, for any deterioration of cargo or slaves; fifthly, for any diminution in the value of the cargo of slaves, proceeding from an increased mortality beyond the average amount of the voyage, or from sickness occasioned by detention; this value to be ascertained by their computed price at the place of destination, as in the above case of total loss; sixthly, an allowance of five per cent. on the amount of the capital employed in the purchase and maintenance of cargo, for the period of delay occasioned by the detention; and seventhly, for all premium of insurance on additional risks.

The claimant or claimants shall likewise be entitled to interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum on the sum awarded, until paid by the government to which the capturing ship belongs; the whole amount of such indemnifications being calculated in the money of the country to which the captured ship belongs, and to be liquidated at the exchange current at the time of award, excepting the sum for the subsistence of slaves, which shall be paid at par, as above stipulated.

The two high contracting parties wishing to avoid, as much as possible, every species of fraud in the execution of the treaty of this date, have agreed, that if it should be proved, in a manner evident to the conviction of the commissary judges of the two nations, and without having recourse to the decision of a commissioner of arbitration, that the captor has been led into error by a voluntary and reprehensible fault on the part of the captain of the detained ship; in that case only, the detained ship shall not have the right of receiving, during the days of her detention, the demurrage stipulated by the present article.

Schedule of demurrage or daily allowance for a vessel of

100 tons to	120 inclusive,	5	per diem.
121 ditto—	150 ditto,	6
151 ditto—	170 ditto,	8
171 ditto—	200 ditto,	10
201 ditto—	220 ditto,	11
221 ditto—	250 ditto,	12
251 ditto—	270 ditto,	14

and so on in proportion.

Art. 9. When the proprietor of a ship, suspected of carrying on an illicit trade in slaves, released in consequence of a sentence of one of the mixed commissions (or in the case, as abovementioned, of total loss), shall claim indemnification for the loss of slaves which he may have suffered, he shall in no case be entitled to claim for more than the number of slaves which his vessel, by the Spanish laws, was authorized to carry, which number shall always be stated in his passport.

Art. 10. Neither the judges, nor the arbitrators, nor the secretary of the mixed commissions shall be permitted to demand or receive, from any of the parties concerned in the sentences which they shall pronounce, any emolument, under any pretext whatsoever, for the performance of the duties which are imposed upon them by the present regulation.

Art. 11. When the parties interested, shall imagine they have cause to complain of any evident injustice on the part of the mixed commissions, they may represent it to their respective governments, who reserve to themselves the right of mutual correspondence for the purpose of removing, when they think fit, the individuals who may compose these commissions.

Art. 12. In case of a vessel being improperly detained, under pretence of the stipulations of the treaty of this date, and the captor not being enabled to justify himself, either by the tenor of the said treaty, or of the instructions annexed to it, the government to which the detained vessel may belong, shall be entitled to demand reparation; and, in such case, the government to which the captor may belong, binds itself to cause inquiry to be made into the subject of the complaint, and to inflict upon the captor, if he be found to have deserved it, a punishment proportioned to the transgression which may have been committed.

Art. 13. The two high contracting parties have agreed, that in the event of the death of one or more of the commissary judges, or the commissioners of arbitration, composing the above-mentioned mixed commissions, their posts shall be supplied, ad interim, in the following manner:

On the part of the British government, the vacancies shall be filled successively, in the commission which shall sit within the possessions of his Britannic Majesty, by the governor or lieutenant-governor resident in that colony, by the principal magistrate of the same, and by the secretary; and in that which shall sit within the possessions of his Catholic Majesty, it is agreed, that, in case of the death of the British judge or arbitrator there, the remaining individuals of the said commission shall proceed equally to the judgment of such slave ships as may be brought before them, and to the execution of their sentence. In this case alone, however, the parties interested shall have the right of appealing from the sentence, if they think fit, to the commission resident upon the coast of Africa; and the government to which the captor shall belong, shall be bound fully to make good the compensation which shall be due to them, in case the appeal be decided in favour of the claimants: but the vessel and cargo shall remain, during such appeal, in the place of residence of the first commission before which they shall have been carried.

On the part of Spain, the vacancies shall be supplied, in the possession of his Catholic Majesty, by such persons of trust as the principal authority of the country shall appoint; and upon the coast of Africa, in case of the death of any Spanish judge or arbitrator, the commission shall proceed to judgment in the same manner as above specified for the commission resident in the possession of his Catholic Majesty, in the event of the death of the British judge or arbitrator; an appeal being, in this case likewise, allowed, to the commission resident in the possession of his Catholic Majesty; and, in general, all the provisions of the former case being to be applied to the present.

The high contracting parties have agreed to supply, as soon as possible, the vacancies that may arise in the above-mentioned commissions, from death or any other cause; and in case that the vacancy of any of the Spanish commissioners in the British possessions, or of the British commissioners in the Spanish possession, be not supplied at the end of the term of seven months for America, and of twelve for Africa, the vessels, which shall be brought to the said possessions respectively, shall cease to have the right of appeal above stipulated.

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.] A person from the Roll's-office presented the following copy of letters patent, granting the office of clerk of the parliaments to George Henry Rose, Esq. in reversion.

"George the third, by the grace of God, King of Great Britain, and so forth: to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting: Whereas we, by our letters patent under our great seal of Great Britain, bearing date at Westminster, the twenty-fourth day of February, in the twenty-third year of our reign, (amongst other things therein contained,) did for us, our heirs and successors, give and grant unto our trusty and well beloved Samuel Strutt, Esq. the office of clerk of the parliaments, of us, our heirs, and successors; to have, enjoy, and exercise the said office unto him the said Samuel Strutt, by himself or his sufficient deputy or deputies for the term of his natural life, immediately after the decease of Ashley Cowper, Esq. or when the said office should then first and next happen to become void, or devolve, fall, or come into the hands of us, our heirs or successors, by the surrender or forfeiture of the said office by the said Ashley Cowper, or by any other means whatsoever; and whereas we, by our letters patent above recited, (amongst other things therein contained,) did for us, our heirs and successors, further give and grant unto our trusty and well beloved George Rose, Esq. the office of clerk of the parliaments of us, our heirs, and successors; to have, enjoy, and exercise the said office unto him the said George

Rose, by himself or his sufficient deputy or deputies, for the term of his natural life, immediately after the decease of the said Ashley Cowper, and Samuel Strutt, or when the said office should then first and next happen to devolve, fall, or come into the hands of us, our heirs or successors, by the surrender or forfeiture of the said office by the said Ashley Cowper and Samuel Strutt, or by other means whatsoever, as in and by the said recited letters patent (relation being thereunto had) may more fully and at large appear. And whereas the said Ashley Cowper and Samuel Strutt are both since deceased, and the said George Rose still living, and now is in the full possession and exercise of the said office. Now know ye, that we, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, and for divers other good causes and considerations us hereunto especially moving, have given and granted, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do give and grant, unto our trusty and well-beloved George Henry Rose, son of the said George Rose, the office of clerk of the parliaments of us, our heirs and successors; and him, the said George Henry Rose, clerk of the parliaments of us, our heirs, and successors, we do for us, our heirs and successors, ordain and constitute by these presents to have, enjoy, and exercise the said office unto him the said George Henry Rose, by himself or his sufficient deputy or deputies, for and during the term of his natural life, immediately after the decease of the said George Rose, or when the said office shall first and next happen to become void or devolve, fall, and come into the hands of us, our heirs or successors, by the surrender or forfeiture of the said office by the said George Rose, or by any other means whatsoever. And further, of our more ample grace, we have given and granted, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do give and grant, unto the said George Henry Rose, for the exercise and occupation of the said office, the sum of forty pounds of lawful money of Great Britain by the year; to have and yearly to receive the said forty pounds during the term of his natural life, immediately after the decease of the said George Rose, or when the said office shall first and next happen to become void, or to devolve, fall, and come into the hands of us, our heirs or successors, or unto the gift, disposal, or grant of us, our heirs or successors, by the surrender or forfeiture of the said office by the said George Rose, or by any other means whatsoever, to be paid out of the issues, profits, and revenues arising out of the Hanaper of the Chancery, of us, our heirs and successors, by the hands of the keeper or clerk of the same Hanaper of the Chancery of us, our heirs and successors, for the time being, at the feasts of the annunciation of the blessed Virgin Mary, the nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Michael the Archangel, and the birth of our Lord Christ, by equal portions; the first payment thereof to begin at that feast of the feasts aforesaid which shall first and next happen after the decease of the said George Rose, or after the first vacancy of the said office as aforesaid; together with all and all manner of liberties and privileges anciently belonging to the said office, and with all other profits, advantages, pre-eminences, and emoluments whatsoever and howsoever belonging or appertaining to the same office, and in as ample manner and form as the said Ashley Cowper, Samuel Strutt, and George Rose, or any other person or persons, now hath or have had and received, or ought to have had and received, in or for the execution of the said office. And lastly, we will, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do grant unto the said George Henry Rose, that these our letters patent, or the enrolment thereof, shall and may be in and by all things good, firm, valid, sufficient, and effectual in the law against and concerning us, our heirs and successors, notwithstanding the misnaming or not certain naming the office and premises aforesaid, or either of them; and notwithstanding the misreciting, or not certain or not full reciting, of any gift or gifts, grant or grants of the office and premises aforesaid, or either of them, being or not being of record, heretofore made or granted by us, or by any of our progenitors, Kings or Queens of England or Great Britain, to any person or persons, or any other omission, imperfection, defect, matter, cause, or thing whatsoever, to the contrary hereof notwithstanding.

In witness, &c. Witness, &c. this 24th day of October, in the 35th year of our reign.

By Writ of Privy Seal."

Repeal of the Suspension Act.] Lord Sidmouth presented a bill, intituled, "an act to repeal an act made in the last session of parliament, intituled, an act to continue an act to empower his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government." Having read the title of the bill, his lordship moved that it be now read a first time.

Lord Holland rose, but, on its being intimated that it was intended to pass the bill through all its stages that night, he said he would reserve what he had to offer for the third reading.

The bill was then read a first time, after which Lord Sidmouth moved that the standing order, relative to the progress of public bills be read and suspended. This being done, his lordship next moved the second reading of the bill.

Lord Holland wished to have the preamble read.

The Lord Chancellor read the preamble, which after reciting the titles of the two acts, one suspending the habeas corpus act till the 1st of July last, and the other continuing the suspension till the 1st of March next, stated that the continuance of the powers thus granted was no longer necessary.

Lord Holland said, he could have wished that a different expression had been used, but he should not now move any amendment. He could not, however, avoid saying a few words on the circumstances which had led to the suspension of the habeas corpus act. Last year, their lordships had allowed themselves to be surprised into a course, on the adoption of which it was alleged that the safety of the country depended. His Majesty's ministers had been either actually the tools of wicked and designing men, or had been led away by the desire of obtaining undue power to themselves. Believing, as he did, that the whole of their lordships proceedings in passing the act for suspending the habeas corpus had rested upon garbled and unfair evidence, he must state that he could not be satisfied with the mere repeal of that act, and that he thought an inquiry into the grounds on which it had been passed ought to be instituted. No proceeding could have been more dangerous to the true interests of the country than that to which their lordships had given their sanction on evidence so totally imperfect. The right which had been suspended, he wished to remind them, was not one which had been granted by any act of parliament whatever. The personal liberty of the people was no concession. It was a right antecedent to any statute, and equal to the right of their lordships to vote in that house, or to the right of the king to sit on the throne. He did not mean to say that there was any absolute limitation to the power of parliament on this subject, when circumstances rendered such a stretch of power indispensable; but he said, that to suspend this right of the people was an act of as great violence as to suspend the prerogatives of the crown, and could only be justified by the clearest evidence of the most overwhelming necessity. Consistently with this view, he thought their lordships could not let the matter pass over with the mere repeal of an act which had been so unjustifiably passed. It was their duty to shew, that a law which deprived the people of their most important right, of personal liberty, was a calamity which was not to be inflicted without proof, or without some subsequent proceeding, which would demonstrate to the latest posterity, that they considered themselves pledged to guard against such unjust encroachments in future. He trusted, then, that parliament, when all pretence of danger from investigation should be over, would institute an inquiry into the nature of the evidence on which the act of the last session had been passed. The evidence on such an inquiry must not be of the ex-parte and suspicious nature which their lordships were induced to accept of last year. It must not be evidence prepared by persons seeking power, or wishing to retain it. Nothing could be satisfactory, and nothing would satisfy the country, but a fair and impartial investigation. A full examination into all the circumstances which took place at the passing of the act, and all which had occurred since, was what the occasion demanded, when the liberties of the people had been so violently invaded. He trusted it was unnecessary for him to urge the importance of this right on their lordships' minds, but he could not help dwelling upon it. He must repeat, that it was the most ancient of all the rights of the people of this country. It rested not on magna charta, on the act of habeas corpus, or the bill of rights, though it was reasserted in them. The act of 1672, in the reign of Charles II., by which it was legislatively enacted, did not constitute the right. If the statement given upon this subject (though it was but a bad authority, that of James II.) were correct, an ancestor of a noble lord then before him (the Earl of Shaftesbury) was the chief means of passing the habeas corpus act through parliament; and if so, it evinced a sagacity and a penetration which atoned for all the acts imputed to him by some historians. But at what period was this act originally passed? At a time when the country teemed with conspiracies in a greater degree than at any other period of our history; conspiracies, which were said to have been fomented by the mover of the act himself. Afterwards, when the whole country was thrown into consternation by the popish plots—whether true or false, he did not at present pretend to determine—no idea was started of repealing the habeas corpus act. Neither the Rye-house plot, nor any other plot, had been thought sufficient, even in those convulsed times, to warrant the legislature in depriving the subject of personal liberty. Returning to the act of last session, he must again assert, that no ground for it had been laid at the time it was passed, and nothing had since occurred to shew that there was any thing in the state of the country which called for it. Where was any disturbance or conspiracy to be found that could justify such a measure? It was not to be found in any of the legal proceedings which had taken place in the metropolis, at Derby, or in Scotland. In that country, they were told, on a former occasion, that a most dreadful oath had been taken; an oath so dreadful that it was not fit to be publicly stated: and yet what was the result? The law-officers of that part of the united kingdom were at a loss how to indict this oath. They made two attempts, and failed; at length they made a third attempt, when, after some very curious facts had come out in evidence, the whole ended in the acquittal of the party accused. None of these proceedings afforded any appearance of a necessity for the measure which ministers had recommended and which parliament had been induced to adopt. But the noble earl (Liverpool) had declared that he was ready to prove, not only that the measure was justified by the state of the country at the time, but that it had been productive of the greatest advantages. That the country was in better circumstances now than in the last year he was happy to believe; but whatever improvement had taken place, certainly was not owing to the suspension of the habeas corpus act. Were the truth of this assertion of ministers to be admitted by their lordships, there would be no longer any security for personal liberty. On any future occasion, when desirous of obtaining an undue increase of power, if they could persuade parliament to suspend the habeas corpus act on ex-parte evidence, they would have nothing more to do, supposing the state of the country to have from other causes improved, than to come forward next year and say, "You see what advantages have been derived from adopting our recommendation." On the contrary, if it should happen to be followed by discontent and distress, ministers would thereby acquire an argument for prolonging their undue authority. They would say: "You see now that the measure which we called for was necessary, and that the suspension of the law must be continued." Nothing, however, could excuse such a measure, but an evident proof of its necessity, founded on a full and impartial investigation.—Last session their lordships had heard much of blasphemous productions, but had these productions been put down by the suspension of the habeas corpus act? It was not said that they were now in circulation. Was it the threefold prosecution of Mr. Hone which had produced this effect? This was certain—that with respect to these publications, things remained in the same state as last year; and if they were no longer a subject of complaint, it could not be owing to any of the measures of the noble lord. With regard to that prosecution, it was not his wish to say much, lest any thing which might fall from him on that subject should be taken as a vindication of the species of publication against which the prosecution was instituted. So far from wishing to vindicate that sort of writing, he rather thought that it ought, in point of good taste as well as of decency, to be discouraged. At the same time he could not help saying, that these prosecutions bore such marks of hypocrisy as he had never before witnessed. Was there any man in the country so weak as to believe, that the writer of the parodies against which ministers had manifested so much indignation, would have been questioned had he ridiculed persons in opposition to the government? His (Lord H's.) friends had often been made the subject of satire, and yet, on those occasions, the government never thought religion so endangered by such publications as to render it necessary for the Attorney-General to prosecute them. He recollected a parody upon the words of our Saviour himself, which was published by those connected with the noble lord's administration, against persons in opposition. Now, wishing to speak with all respect of the liturgy of the church of England, he should only say, that he thought it most extraordinary that prosecutions should be instituted for parodies on that which was the work of man, while parodies on the Holy Scriptures themselves were allowed to pass unnoticed. He recollected a parody, which had been published in all the ministerial newspapers of the time, against the late Mr. Paul. It was of the most disgusting nature, and yet no notice had been taken of it. When it was so evident to all the world, that the prosecutions brought against Mr. Hone had been instituted for political reasons only, it was impossible for the country not to despise the hypocritical pretences under which they were brought forward. This was an unavoidable consequence which ministers must endure; for, in order that motives should be respected, it was necessary that they should be truly respectable. It did not become any administration to inflict severe punishments on one set of men who might be hostile to them, for the same kind of acts which they viewed with indulgence when committed by others in their favour. He should say nothing more on this subject but to express his hope that their lordships would agree to the inquiry he had suggested. If a committee should be instituted, it must not be formed as that of last year had been. The inquiry, to give satisfaction, must be minute and complete. If a committee should be agreed to, it ought to be an open one, to which all their lordships would have access; and then he might hope, that no evidence would be permitted to be garbled or withheld, as, he was assured, could be proved to have been done by ministers with respect to the committee of last year. Information had been received by ministers which would have tended to counteract the impression of other evidence before the committee, but which had never come to their hands. This was a subject which called for a strict investigation.

Lord Sidmouth did not expect that the noble lord would have thought it proper, on the present occasion, to address to their lordships observations of the nature of those they had just heard, though he was aware that the circumstance of such a bill being on the table left the noble lord at perfect liberty to adopt the course he had taken. The noble lord had stated, that there was no necessity for the act of last session. Of this assertion, he should only say, that the report made by the committee appointed by their lordships, on the authority of which the act was passed, afforded a complete refutation. The noble lord has also asserted, that the evidence produced by ministers was garbled, and that information which ought to have been communicated to the committee was withheld. He well knew that the noble lord was incapable of stating any thing which he did not in his conscience believe to be true; but he could assure their lordships that every kind of information which could with propriety be laid before the committee had been produced to them, and that nothing had been withheld which was necessary to enable them to arrive at a fair and proper conclusion on the question submitted to their consideration. The noble lord also denied that the act of last session had been of any advantage to the country. In the Prince Regent's speech, it was true, only the other causes which had contributed to the returning prosperity of the country were mentioned, but it did not follow that great benefit had not been derived from the suspension of the habeas corpus act. There never was a greater contrast exhibited by the country than that which the comparison of its present state with that of last year afforded; and he would now maintain, and if the occasion should arrive would prove, that the act of last session had mainly contributed to this result. The effects it had produced in many parts of the country did not rest on assertion; they were already proved. The magistrates and persons best informed in the county of Leicester stated, on their own knowledge, that the passing of the suspension act had preserved tranquillity in manufacturing districts where the greatest alarm for the peace of the country had previously existed. In another place, where there had been a more formidable manifestation of treason, the good effects of the measure had been still more apparent—he meant that insurrection in consequence of which a bill of indictment had been found against the offenders who were tried at Derby. On that occasion, ten of the persons accused fled; four were sentenced to suffer death; and in all, thirty-one confessed themselves guilty of treason, some of whom were transported, and the remainder pardoned. These men, besides making a confession of their guilt, gave certain information, that an insurrection of a much more formidable nature than that in which they had been engaged was in contemplation, and would infallibly have taken place had not the habeas corpus act been suspended. It was that measure alone which had deterred them. Thus it was proved by incontrovertible evidence, that the measure for which the noble lord contended there was no necessity, had preserved the peace and tranquillity of the country. Much stress had been laid on the destitute condition and humble circumstances of those who had last year disturbed the public peace: it was true that their means were very inadequate to the objects they had in view; but even had they never expected fully to effect their purposes, was there no medium between the holding of their seditious meetings, and a state of things in which the throne itself was exposed to tumultuous attacks? The truth, however, was, that many of the movers in those lamentable disturbances were far from being men of mean or contemptible talents; they possessed powers of writing and expression by which they exercised very considerable influence over the lower classes. It was entirely attributable to the withdrawing the influence of these men by the operation of the suspension act, that no convulsions had since taken place in that part of the kingdom to which he had alluded, and which had before been disturbed by the events that led to the trials at Derby.—The noble lord had adverted to the trial of Mr. Hone, and it was necessary that he should make some reply to what had fallen from him. He had, indeed, little expected that any complaints would be made in that house on the subject of this prosecution. Great complaints had been made both in parliament and out of it, that ministers had delayed to prosecute a number of offences of this description; they were loudly called on to do so, and they yielded at length to the call, not from hypocritical motives, not from a pretended regard to religion, but because they saw in the progress of disaffection that the same means were pursued to alienate the affections of the people from their government, as had been resorted to with such fatal success in a neighbouring country—he meant a continued attempt to sap the religion and morals of the community, and to render contemptible in the eyes of the people every thing that was sacred and established. He was willing to admit that government never shewed its wisdom more than when it knew what offences to overlook, as well as what to prosecute; but he thought the prosecution in question peculiarly called for by the circumstances of the times, and the insidious attempts of the disaffected. As to the panegyric which the noble lord had passed on the privilege of Englishmen to be called to trial, and publicly charged with the offences of which they were suspected, his Majesty's ministers had shewn their respect for these glorious and exalted rights in the proceedings of that day. The act then under their consideration did not expire until the 1st of March, and there was no record on the journals of the house, that an act of that description had ever been repealed, or not suffered to run to its utmost limit. But his Majesty's ministers admitted that nothing could justify the continuance of such an act but the necessity which produced it, and when that necessity ceased, it was due to the legislature and to the people to repeal it. But in recommending this repeal, it was not that his Majesty's ministers considered there was an absence of all disposition to disturb the public peace; that was far from being the case; there was a sufficient number of daring and unprincipled individuals, both in and out of the metropolis, who were ready to seize every opportunity of exciting and continuing disaffection and tumult. But the mere existence of bad men ready to excite and promote confusion was not of itself a sufficient reason for suspending one of the great bulwarks of our constitution, unless those men had also the power of carrying their designs into execution: that they possessed that power last year was admitted by the vote of their lordships, and the bill they had passed; but the means of evil in the hands of these men were so abated, that the duty of reducing them ought to be left to the power of the law and the magistracy of the country. He should now detain their lordships no longer. The Prince Regent would order papers to be laid before them touching the internal state of the country, and it would be for them to decide how those papers should be disposed of. Many opportunities would arise in the course of the session, of discussing the measures lately resorted to by the government, and on the propriety of those measures he was ready to state his unshaken conviction; but with respect to the manner in which they had been carried into execution it did not become him to speak, because the responsibility incurred by that execution fell almost exclusively on himself. He could safely say that he had endeavoured to discharge a most painful and difficult duty temperately and firmly; that he had always weighed well whatever came before him, and had tried to act up to the necessity of the case, and not to go beyond it.

The bill was then read a second time, the commitment negatived, and the bill ordered to be engrossed. The engrossed bill was brought into the house almost immediately. It was then read a third time and passed, and ordered to be sent to the Commons.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, Jan. 28.

POOR LAWS.] Mr. Sturges Bourne moved for an abstract of "returns of the assessment for the relief of the poor in the years 1748, 1749, and 1750."—Ordered.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] Lord Castlereagh laid before the house the treaty between his Britannic Majesty and his Catholic Majesty, for preventing their subjects from engaging in any illicit traffic in slaves. (See page 40.) The noble lord then moved that the house should resolve itself into a committee of the whole house on Monday the 9th of February, to take the said treaty into consideration, which motion was agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS.] Lord Castlereagh moved the following standing orders and resolutions of the house:—

1. Religion.—Grand committee for religion to sit every Tuesday in the afternoon, in the house.

2. Grievances.—Grand committee for grievances to sit every Thursday in the afternoon, in the house.

3. Courts of Justice.—Grand committee for courts of justice to sit every Saturday in the afternoon, in the house.

4. Trade.—Grand committee for trade to sit every Friday in the afternoon, in the house.

5. Privileges.—Committee of privileges appointed.—Mr. Brogden, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Viscount Castlereagh, Mr. Bathurst, Mr. Tierney, (and several other members,) and all the Knights for Shires, Gentlemen of the long robe, and merchants in the house:—to meet upon Monday next, in the afternoon, in the Speaker's chamber, and to sit every Wednesday, Friday, and Monday, in the afternoon: and all who come are to have voices, and they are to take into consideration all such matters as shall or may come in question, touching privileges; and to report their proceedings, with their opinion thereupon, to the house, from time to time; and the committee are to have power to send for persons, papers, and records for their information; and, if any thing shall come in question touching the matter of privilege of any member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

6. Elections.—Act [28 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 9.] read:—Ordered, "That all persons who will question any returns of members to serve in parliament, for any county, city, borough, or place in Great Britain, do question the same within fourteen days next, and so within fourteen days next after any new return shall be brought in.

"That all persons who will question any returns of members to serve in parliament for Ireland, do question the same by presenting a petition to this house within fourteen days next, and so within fourteen days next after any new return shall have been brought into the office of the Clerk of the Crown of Great Britain, or by lodging a petition in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, within fourteen days next, and so within fourteen days next, after any new return shall have been brought into the said office of the Clerk of the Crown in Great Britain.

"That when any such petition shall have been lodged in the said office of the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, within the time before limited, the said Clerk shall forthwith make a copy thereof, to be preserved in the said office, and immediately thereupon shall transmit such original petition (in the method used in conveying returns of writs) to the Speaker of the house of Commons, to be laid by him before the house; and in case no such petition shall have been lodged in the said office within the time before limited, the said Clerk of the Crown shall forthwith transmit a certificate in the like manner to the Speaker of the House of Commons, signed by himself, or his deputy, specifying the time when such return was made, and that no such petition had been lodged in his office previous to the date of such certificate.

"That all members who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom, do make their election for which of the places they will serve, within one week from and after the expiration of the fourteen days before limited for presenting petitions, provided there be no question upon the return for that place; and if any thing shall come in question touching the return or election of any member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate; and that all members returned upon double returns, do withdraw till their returns are determined."

Resolved, "That no Peer of this realm, except such Peers of Ireland as shall for the time being be actually elected, and shall not have declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, hath any right to give his vote in the election of any member to serve in parliament.

"That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom, for any lord of parliament, or other peer or prelate, not being a peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the election of members to serve for the Commons in parliament, except only any peer of Ireland at such elections in Great Britain respectively, where such peer shall appear as a candidate, or by himself or any others be proposed to be elected; or for any lord lieutenant, or governor of any county, to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission, to influence the election of any member to serve for the Commons in parliament.

"That if it shall appear that any person hath procured himself to be elected or returned a member of this house, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this house will proceed with the utmost severity against such person."

7. Witnesses.—Resolved, "That if it shall appear that any person hath been tampering with any witness, in respect of his evidence to be given to this house, or any committee thereof, or directly or indirectly hath endeavoured to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime and misdemeanour; and this house will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

"That if it shall appear that any person hath given false evidence, in any case, before this house, or any committee thereof, this house will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender."

8. Strangers.—Ordered, "That the sergeant at arms attending this house do from time to time take into custody any stranger or strangers that he shall see, or be informed of to be, in the house or gallery, while the house, or any committee of the whole house, is sitting; and that no person so taken into custody, be discharged out of custody, without the special order of the house.

"That the back door leading to the speaker's chamber be locked up every day at the sitting of the house, and the key delivered to the clerk, to be locked up by him: and that he do not presume to deliver the same to any person whatsoever without order of the house; and that the sergeant at arms attending this house do take care to clear the speaker's chamber every day before the door is locked up.

"That no member of this house do presume to bring any stranger or strangers into the house or gallery thereof, while the house is sitting."

9. Constables.—Ordered, "That the constables and other officers of Middlesex and Westminster do take care that during the session of parliament, the passages through the streets between Temple-bar and Westminster-hall shall be kept free and open; and that no obstructions be made, by cars, drays, carts, or otherwise, to hinder the passage of the members to and from this house, and that the sergeant at arms attending this house do give notice of this order to the officers aforesaid.

"That the constables in waiting do take care that there be no gaming or other disorders in Westminster-hall, or the passages leading to the house, during the sitting of parliament; and that there be no annoyance by chairmen, footmen, or otherwise, therein or thereabouts.

"That the said orders be sent to the high bailiff of Westminster, and that he do see the same put in execution."

10. Footmen.—Ordered, "That no footman be permitted to be within the lobby of the house, or upon the stairs leading thereto.

"That the sergeant at arms attending this house do take care that there be no gaming, or other disorders, in the room appointed for the footmen attending the members of this house to wait in.

"That the sergeant at arms attending this house do take into his custody such footmen as shall presume to disobey the orders of the house; and that no such footmen be discharged out of custody but by the special order of the house."

11. Letters.—Ordered, "That to prevent the intercepting or losing of letters directed to members of this house, the person appointed to bring letters from the General Post-office to this house, or some other person to be appointed by the postmaster-general, do for the future, every day during the session of parliament, Sundays excepted, constantly attend, from ten of the clock in the morning till seven in the afternoon, at the place appointed for the delivery of the said letters, and take care, during his stay there, to deliver the same to the several members to whom they shall be directed, or to their known servant or servants, or others bringing notes under the hands of the members sending for the same.

"That the said officer do, upon his going away, lock up such letters as shall remain undelivered: and that no letter be delivered but within the hours aforesaid.

"That the said orders be sent to the postmaster general.

"That when any letter or packet directed to this house shall come to Mr. Speaker, he do open the same; and acquaint the house at their next sitting, with the contents thereof, if proper to be communicated to this house."

12. Prayers.—Ordered, "That the sergeant at arms attending this house do from time to time, when the house is going to prayers, give notice thereof to all committees; and that all proceedings of committees in a morning, after such notice, be declared to be null and void."

13. Votes and Proceedings.—Ordered, "That the votes and proceedings of this house be printed, being first perused by Mr. Speaker; and that he do appoint the printing thereof; and that no person but such as he shall appoint do presume to print the same."

14. Expiring Laws.—Committee appointed, "to inquire what temporary laws, of a public and general nature, made by the parliaments of England, or Great Britain or Ireland, or of the United Kingdom, are now in force, and what laws of the like nature, passed by the English, British, Irish, or United Parliaments, have expired between the first day of the last session of parliament and the first day of the present session, and also what laws of the like nature are about to expire in the course or at the end of the present session, or on or before the 1st day of August, 1819, or in the course or at the end of any session, which may commence during that period, or in consequence of any contingent public event;" to report observations; power to send for persons, papers, and records; instruction, "that they do report opinion from time to time to the house, which of the said laws are fit to be revived, continued, or made perpetual;" five to be the quorum: to sit notwithstanding any adjournment;—Reports 1st February in the last session of parliament, from the committee on temporary laws of a public and general nature, referred.

15. Public Business.—Resolved, "That, in this present session of parliament, all orders of the day set down in the order-book for Mondays and Fridays shall be disposed of before the house will proceed upon any motions of which notices shall be entered in the order-book."

16. Private Bills.—Standing Order, 18th June, 1811. "That all petitions for private bills be presented within fourteen days after the first Friday in the next and every future session of parliament," read.

Resolved.—"That this house will not receive any petition for private bills after Friday the 13th day of February next:

"That no private bill be read the first time after Monday the 16th day of March next:

"That this house will not receive any report of such private bill after Monday the 20th of April next."

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, he was much gratified at hearing the renewal of the grand committee for courts of justice; but he should be very glad to find a precedent of their actual sitting. He should be happy if such a committee were rendered effectual as to its objects.

The resolutions were then ordered to be printed.

ADDRESS TO THE PRINCE REGENT.] Mr. Wodehouse brought up the report of the committee appointed to prepare the address to the Prince Regent, which was read.

Lord Milton said, there was one part of the speech from the throne, which he had heard with the most unfeigned satisfaction; he alluded to the recommendation to erect a greater number of places of public worship. No person could reside ever so short a time in the metropolis, without witnessing the lamentable deficiency of churches; but before they applied to the public purse for the sum requisite for the erection of additional churches, it might be proper to inquire into the state of the property of the church, to see whether means might not be devised for making some part of it available for such a purpose; he did not mean to say, however, that if it should be found that there was no church property which could be applied in that manner, he would not consent to additional burthens. There was one point which ought to be particularly attended to in the erection of churches; the greatest attention ought to be paid to the accommodation of the lower orders. There was hardly a parish church in the kingdom, in which great encroachments had not been made by persons of wealth on that part of the church which was the property of the population of the parish. They ought to guard as much as possible against the recurrence of what he considered a very great evil—the enclosure of pews from the body of the church.

Mr. Curwen said, however painful it was for him to express any difference of opinion on an occasion like the present, he felt that, without doing so, he should not discharge his duty as a representative of the people. It was stated in the speech from the throne, that our manufactures were in the most flourishing condition. He would ask, if it was not notorious that this was not a true statement? An application had lately been made to government, by some of the most considerable manufacturers of the county of Lancaster, who stated, that they were carrying on the trade of printing cottons at the hazard of their own fortunes, without the smallest prospect of advantage, and that, without a repeal of certain taxes, the foreign trade in this article would be at an end. Many thousands of individuals were employed twelve hours every day for six days in the week at so low wages as ten shillings a week. He would only ask the house if they thought such wages would either be offered or accepted if the trade was in a flourishing state? Men were willing to work sixteen hours a day for the sake of an additional two shillings a week. With respect to agriculture, it was indeed true, that the agriculturists were now better off than they had been for some time—but how? By the high prices alone. But he would ask if the people found any thing like general employment? On the contrary, thousands were without employment, and deriving their subsistence from the poor rates. Should they then give their sanction to such a statement of the amelioration of the condition of the country? It was stated, that our finances were improving, but he would venture to say, that notwithstanding the inquisitorial system which had been followed, no addition would be gained to the revenue. The expenditure exceeded the revenue by no less than eight millions; and if Ireland and the sinking fund were taken into the account, the whole deficiency would be found to exceed twenty-seven millions. He did not despair of the country, but then the present system of adding every year to the public debt must be discontinued. Nothing could save us from irretrievable ruin, unless the house would go fairly into the state of the country, and probe the wound to the bottom. It was useless and absurd to say, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

The address was then agreed to, and ordered to be presented by privy councillors.

MESSAGE OF CONDOLENCE TO THE QUEEN.] Lord Castlereagh rose, to move addresses of condolence to her Majesty the Queen, and to Prince Leopold, on the loss which the Royal Family, His Serene Highness, and the country, had sustained in the death of the Princess Charlotte Augusta.—The noble lord trusted that this motion would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the house. The want of precedent on such a subject could be no obstacle to a measure which he had no doubt accorded fully with the feelings of all present. The event which now called for their condolence was of the most tragical description. The unexpected and sudden death of a mother and her child in such affecting circumstances, even in private life, was a subject of deep and painful interest to every feeling mind; how much, then, must these feelings be aggravated by the consideration of the high station and prospects of the illustrious individual whose lamented death now called for their condolence! Her recent marriage to the man of her choice was brought about under the most auspicious circumstances, and formed a painful contrast to her sudden and untimely end. It was unnecessary to dwell now upon a subject on which there existed but one sentiment, either in that house, or throughout the country. Under the impression, therefore, of such feelings, so strong and so sincere, it was surely their duty to give them expression, although they should have no precedent to guide them. The only precedent of which they could avail themselves for their direction in this case, was the mode in which they had presented their congratulations to her Majesty on the marriage of this illustrious pair. He proposed, therefore, that they should now follow up this precedent in conveying their condolence to her Majesty. He said they had no precedent for any address of condolence beyond the throne; but the same principle which had guided them thus far, would also warrant them in addressing that illustrious individual whose fate had been so intimately connected with that of our beloved Princess. The bright prospects held out, and the expectations formed, from the happy union of Prince Leopold with the Princess Charlotte were such as can seldom occur. The rare virtues and exemplary habits which they exhibited, were such as to reflect dignity upon their exalted station: and the sorrow excited by the fatal overthrow of hopes so confidently and so justly entertained, was not more general in this country than in every foreign state. He therefore proposed that a message of condolence be sent to her Majesty, and that the same course be adopted as formerly in presenting their congratulations.

The Speaker stated, that there was no precedent on the records, so far as he had been able to trace them, of any address of condolence which went beyond the crown; but the ground for the present address was, as he understood, the congratulation which had been voted lately both to the Prince Leopold and the crown.

Lord Castlereagh then moved—"That this house do condole with her Majesty on the calamitous and untimely death of her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte Augusta."

Mr. Calcraft said, he rose to discharge a painful duty, but he should be wanting to himself and those whom he represented, if he did not give his negative to this motion. He would use no harsh words, nor would he enter into any explanation on the subject; but he felt something within him which compelled him to express his marked dissent. (Hear, hear, from the opposition benches.)

Lord Castlereagh was understood to say, that as no definite objections had been stated, he had no reply to make.

Mr. M. A. Taylor expressed his strong dissent to the motion.

The motion was then put.—There was a general cry of "aye" from the Treasury side of the house, and as general a cry of "no" from the other side.

The Speaker.—I think the "ayes" have it.

It was then agreed that Mr. Disbrowe should attend her Majesty with the condolence.

MESSAGE TO PRINCE LEOPOLD.] Lord Castlereagh then moved, "That a message be sent to condole with His Serene Highness Prince Leopold George Frederick, Duke of Saxe, Margrave of Meissen, Landgrave of Thuringen, Prince of Cobourg of Saalfeld, in the calamitous and untimely death of his illustrious consort, Her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte Augusta."

Mr. Brougham said, he heartily and sincerely concurred in the motion, and felt that it would be impertinent and troublesome to trespass on the patience of the house by saying any thing further on the subject.

Mr. Calcraft spoke warmly to the same effect.

The motion was then put, and agreed to unanimously, several voices on the opposition side exclaiming nemine contradicente.—Lord John Thynne was appointed to attend His Serene Highness with the message.

BANKRUPT LAWS.] Mr. John Smith moved the re-appointment of the committee on the bankrupt laws.

Mr. Lockhart said, there was sufficient evidence before them to shew that the state of the bankrupt laws was extremely defective. In the present state of those laws no distinction was made between the moral and the immoral bankrupt, between those who had been honest, but unfortunate, and those who had profusely squandered the money of their creditors before the act of bankruptcy. He thought there should be a greater power in some tribunal to inquire into the previous conduct of the bankrupt. This power, he conceived, would be best vested in the commissioners of bankrupts. He hoped the committee would report as early as possible, as it was a subject connected with the interests, the morals and credit of the country.

The committee was then appointed, consisting of Mr. John Smith, Mr. Solicitor-General, Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Lockhart, and several others, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett rose, and said he had some petitions to present in favour of parliamentary reform. He did not know what effect they would have on the proposal which was in agitation to repeal that act which was commonly called the act for suspending the habeas corpus act. Whatever was done would not alter his opinion respecting that act, and the cruel and atrocious proceedings of the ministers under it, who had used it, perhaps, for the purpose for which it was intended—to put a stop to the great question of parliamentary reform, in favour of which petitions had been presented signed by a million of persons, though many of them had been rejected on the pretence of some defect in form, or because the meaning of the petitioners was presented in printed, and not in written words. He did not much care whether the habeas corpus act was revived, whether it remained suspended, or whether it was obliterated from the statute-book, since it was reduced to this condition, that it might be suspended whenever the ministers thought proper, or on any pretences which they chose to allege. It would be better, perhaps, that it should be obliterated from the statute-book, and for this reason—that the ministers now concealed the real import of their measures under the name of a suspension of the habeas corpus; whereas, if it were altogether repealed, the people would be left to the protection of magna charta, under which they had the same right to personal protection; the statute of habeas corpus affording only a more summary remedy to persons aggrieved. The great body of the people of England who had demanded parliamentary reform, had now found it necessary to proceed cautiously, in consequence of the practice which had been pursued by the government of sending about spies and informers, if not for the purpose of entrapping the people into illegal acts, yet in such a manner that they always took on themselves to entrap those who were unwary.—By the 13th of Charles the Second, st. 1. c. 5. it was provided, that no petition for any alteration in church or state, should be signed by more than twenty persons. From the disposition which had been shewn to revive sleeping laws, the persons who were desirous of petitioning imagined that this law might be put in force against them. The petitioners were not to be frightened out of the course they had adopted to obtain their constitutional rights; but they also were desirous not to alarm the timid and the weak, or to give any opportunity for the employment of spies and informers, or to bring together large numbers of people, among whom these agents of the ministers might find some whom they might excite to riot, and thus throw discredit on the cause. They had therefore determined, in order to accomplish their objects, to present petitions, each of which would be signed by twenty persons. The question of a reform in that house, was, in his opinion, the only great and important question which could come before them; and he had therefore thought fit to lose no time in presenting the first of a series of petitions on this subject, to which he should hereafter have to call their attention. He concluded by presenting the following petition, signed by twenty inhabitants of the city of Bath. —"That the petitioners, deeply impressed with the evils that have resulted, and the ruin that threatens to follow, from the injurious state of the representation of the people, entreat the early attention of the house to the question of parliamentary reform; a great proportion, perhaps a majority of the house, so far from being the representatives of the people, are notoriously known to represent the interests of wealthy peers or trading borough-holders, or to have purchased seats in the house for the express purpose of disposing of them to the best advantage to the ministry of the day, one of whom has been himself branded with trafficking in this disgraceful barter of national honour for individual comfort; such a state of pollution in an assembly, which ought to be the source of honour and the fountain of prosperity and freedom, has entailed upon this injured country all the mischiefs attendant upon a state of corruption so gross, and a dependence so unlimited upon the increased and increasing influence of the crown; and being firmly convinced that a radical reform in the representation, a recurrence to annual parliaments, and the adoption of universal suffrage, are the only means of preventing a fatal revolution, the petitioners ask, from the wisdom of the truly honourable members of the house, those measures, which can alone restore the confidence and secure the tranquillity of the nation."—Eight other petitions, each signed by twenty inhabitants of the same city, were presented by Sir F. Burdett, read, and laid on the table*.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, January 29.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] The Earl of Liverpool rose, in the absence of his noble friend the Secretary of State for the home department, to give notice, that it was the intention of that noble lord to lay before the house on Monday next, certain papers relative to the internal state of the country, and to move that those documents be referred to a committee. He therefore now moved that their lordships be summoned for Monday next.—Ordered.

REPEAL OF THE SUSPENSION ACT.] The bill for repealing the habeas corpus suspension act was brought up from the Commons by Mr. Brogden and others.

The Lord Chancellor read the title of the bill, and stated, that it had been returned without any amendment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, Jan. 29.

REPEAL OF THE SUSPENSION ACT.] A message from the House of Lords announced, that their lordships had passed a bill, intituled, " an Act to repeal an Act made in the last session of parliament, intituled, an Act to continue an Act to empower his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it would perhaps be more convenient for both parties to reserve any observations they might wish to make on the subject of the suspension to a future day. On Monday next a communication would be made of certain papers relative to the internal state of the country. He trusted that whatever differences of opinion might exist with respect to the necessity for the suspension, or the manner in which the powers given to ministers had been exercised, there could be but one opinion respecting the propriety of passing the repeal through the house with as little delay as possible. It was his intention therefore to propose that the house should depart from their usual practice, and pass the bill through all its stages that day. He concluded with moving that the bill be read a first time.

Mr. Tierney agreed in thinking that the suspension act ought to be repealed with as little delay as possible. He should abstain at present from entering into any of the topics alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, on the understanding that the subject would be gone fully into on a future day.

The bill was then read a first time.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the second reading.

Sir William Burroughs asked, in what manner the subject would be gone into on Monday?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was first intended to lay before the house certain papers on the internal state of the country, and afterwards, the appointment of a committee would be proposed.

Mr. Tierney wished to know, whether the committee was to be chosen by ballot, or direct nomination?

Mr. Brougham said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to leave them in the dark on this subject. In the last session, there were two ways of proceedings: one by ballot, and the other by motion.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he believed the committee would be named by ballot.

Mr. Brougham wished to know, whether the committee was to be proposed on Monday, or on a future day?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the papers would be laid before the house on Monday, and the committee would not be proposed till a future day.

The bill was then read a second time.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved the commitment of the bill. On the question for the Speaker's leaving the chair, Lord Folkestone rose and said, he had no wish to delay the proceedings in the quick passing of a bill, which was, in his opinion, so very necessary. He was, however, much surprised, considering the time when he entered the house, that this bill, as a matter of public business, had proceeded so far, as it was not conformable to the usual practice. It seemed as if ministers were afraid of opposition, or dreaded discussion, and, at all events, their conduct was very unfair. He could not think that the bare repeal of the habeas corpus suspension act was enough. Something appeared to be due to those persons who had suffered by apprehension and confinement. He wished to speak under the information and correction of others who were better acquainted with the law than himself; but as far as he could form a judgment on the matter, it seemed that the persons discharged on recognizances had been unjustly treated. He could perceive no sufficient legal authority for demanding these recognizances; for he thought that some accusation, upon oath, should have been alleged against the parties to justify such a proceeding. There were, unquestionably, cases where the courts could bind parties to a recognizance; but in this instance it appeared that they were bound, where there was no right to bind them. If he was correct in his ideas, he must conceive that this bill did not go far enough; and that a clause should be introduced for the purpose of vacating the recognizances which had been so illegally demanded. If it was not proposed by others, he should bring up a clause himself to that effect.

The Attorney-General said, that the question whether recognizances had been justly or unjustly demanded from the persons lately discharged from confinement under the suspension act, was a question better fitted for the consideration of a court of law than for debate in that house. There were many occasions in which persons were bound to enter into them, though discharged, in order that they might appear when called upon. If the taking of these recognizances was illegal, there was power in the court to investigate the matter, and to discharge the individuals. He was not certain whether the noble lord had asked for his legal opinion as to the power of magistrates. The magistrate had the power of taking single personal security in various cases. The Secretary of State had the power to apprehend persons for treason, which he could do through the medium of a magistrate. Then the magistrate acted under his orders, and recognizances might be required. But the real question was one purely of law. With respect to applications for discharge from recognizances, no bar was placed against hearing them. Parties who made objections in point of law were told, that they should not be deprived of the opportunity of making their objections. He trusted that he, in the conduct he had pursued, had judged rightly. Had he acted in a different way, he might have been told that he wanted to prevent the statement of objections in point of law..

Mr. Brand said, the Attorney-General had confounded the practice of courts of law with the legislation of the country. The men detained under the suspension act were enlarged on the condition of entering into recognizances for their appearance in court on a future day, and therefore they were under the control of the court. But the house were now repealing the act under which those men were held in confinement, and provision ought to be made that no detention should be continued after the passing of the bill.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the object of the present bill was, to restore the law to its natural and usual course of operation: any applications respecting recognizances might be made to the courts in the regular way. He should object to any such clause as the noble lord had proposed.

Mr. Brougham contended that the noble lord (Castlereagh) had not understood the grounds on which the clause was proposed. It was true, no doubt, that after the passing of the present bill, no persons could be arrested or detained in prison, without having the power of forcing on their trial, but in what way did the government now endeavour to escape from this? The persons detained under the suspension act were bound on their recognizance to appear in court on a certain day, that is to say, the bill would still be in force against them. In substance, government were enabled to detain persons in custody after the passing of the repeal—they were bound to appear in court on the first day of Hilary term, and from day to day afterwards. Various things might be demanded from men confined under such circumstances, as the condition on which they could obtain their liberation—they might be compelled to pay 100*l.*—they might be asked to go down on their knees—or they might be asked to give recognizances to appear on a certain day in court, and from time to time afterwards. Ministers chose to demand a recognizance; and, with few exceptions, it was deemed advisable to accede to their demand. Could any man, however, say, that they had the power to demand such recognizances, and to detain those individuals who refused to grant them, without the suspension act? Why then these recognizances necessarily flowed from the suspension act, and ought to be vacated by the repeal. The demand was generally complied with—in three cases it was rejected—and the parties chose rather to remain in prison, when another process was resorted to, not now before the house, he alluded to the proceeding of a certain London justice. It had been argued that this was properly a question for the consideration of a court of law: but he contended that it was not properly a question for the consideration of a court of law. The way taken in this case, was to put an option to the parties, which option could not have been put to them, had they not been visited with the extraordinary powers of the suspension act.

The Solicitor-General contended that the hon. and learned gentleman had not argued the point correctly. Suppose no act for suspending the habeas corpus act had been passed, would not the secretary of state have possessed the same powers of apprehending and committing for treason? The act did not, in such respects, confer new powers on the secretary of state. The act was not passed to enable to commit, but only prevented the privileges of the habeas corpus act. The legality of requiring recognizances was not essentially connected with the suspension act. The power was exercised independently of the provisions of the act, which took away the right of bail. The question as to the recognizances remained, independent of the act; and it was a question purely of law.

Sir W. Burroughs submitted, that the hon. and learned gentleman (the solicitor-general) had not answered his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Brougham.) The secretary of state was armed with no power to demand recognizances: and in taking them in this case he had usurped a power which did not belong to him. The individuals detained ought either to have been released or brought to trial; but the secretary of state had thought fit on his own authority to annex conditions to the release. The hon. and learned gentleman seemed to think that the secretary of state had a right by the common law to discharge on recognizance. This was not the case. When persons were arrested on a charge of high treason, no magistrate or authority, except the court of King's Bench, had any cognizance. A magistrate had no power in such a case to take any recognizance or admit to bail. If an inferior magistrate had not a right to take bail, then he had not a right to take recognizances. (Hear, hear.) It had been admitted, that there was no serious ground for the detention of the individuals; but there might be an object to keep up alarm, and thereby to gain and to rally round administration those who otherwise would not have supported them. (Hear.) The question of the recognizances was, he thought, materially connected with the present bill, particularly as it concerned the conduct which had been pursued under the suspension act.

Mr. Lockhart agreed, to a certain extent, with the solicitor-general, that the question as to recognizances did not flow from the suspension act, but might be considered as a question at common law; yet there were various considerations connected with the subject.

Sir S. Romilly said, he did not intend to offer any obstruction to the measure now before the house. But he felt himself bound to express his decided opinion, that the bill which they were now about to repeal, was originally altogether uncalled for, and seemed to him to have been intended as an experiment upon the patience of the country. At present it was not his intention to enter at large into the merits of the question, but merely to offer a few general observations. It had been asked repeatedly, and with great propriety, at the passing of the suspension act, what use was intended to be made of the measure. It was always answered, that it was necessary, in the state of the country, to enable government to detain certain persons in custody without bringing them to trial, as a disclosure of certain facts connected with their conviction might be attended with serious consequences to the public tranquillity. Some of the people, however, taken up and detained under this pretence, had been discharged more than two months ago without any trial or inquiry; the necessity of detaining them, no longer existed in the state of the country. It was proposed, at the time of passing the bill, that its duration should be limited to the 1st of December, but this was not assented to, and the country had existed nearly twelve months under the tyranny of this dreadful statute. It had still the misfortune to exist under this statute, and the exercise of the arbitrary powers conferred by it had continued till within a few days. But the very proper urgency with which the present bill was hurried through its several stages, proved that there was not a vestige of danger now to require its operations. When did it become thus useless? Was the suspension act necessary last night—last week—a month—or two months ago? (Hear, hear, hear.) It appeared that since the month of June last, there existed not a shadow of pretext for its continuance; since that period there had been no insurrection, no appearance of disaffection; at least not such as came before the public notice; and had such a spirit existed, there was very little doubt but we should have heard of it, as there appeared in a certain quarter an extraordinary alacrity in divulging plots and conspiracies. Let it be remarked, and the remark was well worthy of attention, that it was in the month of June last that the conduct of certain spies and emissaries of government was exposed; and from that time we had heard of no discontent—no insurrection—no conspiracies. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. B. Bathurst said, it was the practice of the other side of the house to represent this measure as setting its supporters in array against the people; but this was uncandid and unjust. It was not against the people that they were furnished with this discretion; but against the deluded part of the people, and for the benefit of the public at large. In the same spirit the officers of the crown had been charged by the hon. and learned gentleman with bringing forward some late proceedings, and persisting in them for the express purpose of rendering juries contemptible, and thus preparing the public mind for further encroachments on one of their most valuable privileges. But common candour and justice would ascribe their conduct to a more honourable motive—to an imperative sense of public duty. It had been asserted, and with great confidence, that all the mischiefs which had occurred had their origin in the artful machinations of a certain individual, whose name (Oliver) had formerly been mentioned in that house. He had no difficulty in asserting, in opposition to all this clamour, that that individual had done no mischief whatever; that on the contrary he had done great service; and that he had disclosed conspiracies at which he had only incidentally and accidentally been present; for surely little weight could attach to the unfortunate declarations of the men who were executed at Derby*, besides that they were fully disproved by their own previous statements. It had been said that government ceased to employ spies in the month of June, and that, from that period the country remained tranquil: but the real cause of this tranquillity was to be found rather in the suspension of the habeas corpus, and the salutary apprehensions of the trial which was then hanging over the disaffected. He solemnly protested, that to the best of his judgment the state of the country was not such at any given period up to this date, that the bill could be repealed with safety.

Sir Samuel Romilly explained. He had not alluded to the employment of any particular individual, but stated generally, that government had employed various instruments, and that those persons promoted the mischief which they were sent to detect. But he was astonished to hear the right hon. gentleman maintain, that

* Brandreth, before his execution, was heard occasionally to mutter, "Oliver has brought me to this."—"But for Oliver I should not have been here." Ludlam, while the executioner was putting the rope round his neck, exclaimed loudly and distinctly, "this is all Oliver and the government." (From The Times journal, Nov. 8, 1817.)

persons employed to detect treason had not promoted it, since the report of the secret committee of the lords distinctly admitted it.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, that the persons alluded to in the report were not employed by government, but by inferior magistrates.

Mr. Tierney observed, that ministers continued to act on the extraordinary powers conferred upon them to the very last; for that, down to the 20th day of January, they kept certain persons in confinement. He understood from the other side that they had pledged themselves to two distinct points. They undertook to shew, first, that danger existed to the very last hour of the suspension, and that the bill was not continued in force beyond what was absolutely necessary; for if it continued one day or one hour beyond that necessity, it was a heavy crime, for which somebody had to answer. The second point to which they were pledged was, a thorough defence of all the spies they had employed, and they had undertaken to prove that spies were not in any one instance the cause of the mischief.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole house.

In a few minutes the house resumed, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the bill be read a third time.

Lord Folkestone then proposed a clause to the following effect:—"That all persons bound by recognizances under the suspension act, be henceforth completely discharged from those recognizances, but that this clause should not apply to any other recognizances."

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the clause proposed by the noble lord placed the house in an extremely awkward situation. In such a case they would actually be legislating on a subject, the legality of which remained to be discussed in a court of justice. He hoped, therefore, that this difficulty would be avoided by withdrawing the clause.

Mr. Tierney observed, that some of those poor unfortunate men had been more than twelve months in confinement, during which their families were left unprotected and starving. It was therefore a question not so much of justice as of humanity. Even if they could obtain redress in a court of law, yet they would be exposed to heavy expenses. He hoped that the house would save them this necessity, and release them completely from the effect of their recognizances as a small atonement for the heavy evils they had suffered from the act of suspension.

Lord Folkestone said, he rested his clause, not upon a doubtful statement of any facts, but on such as were notorious, and that he proposed merely the complete repeal of the suspension act.

The Attorney-General thought it impossible he could have been misunderstood. He was far from supposing the recognizances illegal. God forbid that he should defend any illegal act. Suppose that these men, instead of being discharged, were still in prison, could the noble lord propose a clause for their release? He knew he could not. All the effect the repeal could have in such a case, was to leave them to the common operation of the habeas corpus act, as if the suspension had never taken place. Notice had been given to these men that their attendance would not be required; and they were told, that whenever it should be required, previous notice would be given. The notice was communicated to the whole of them, before they left home, except one man, who had set out before the notice arrived. The recognizances, therefore, were not held over their heads to harass or distress them. The object of the noble lord was, that matters should be placed exactly in the same state as if the act had never passed. It only deprived them of the right of being tried, and when repealed, left the habeas corpus in full operation. He did not, therefore, think it necessary, either as to humanity or principle, that the clause proposed should be inserted in the bill.

Mr. Brougham said, he imagined that the attorney-general did not yet understand the plea on which this clause was offered to the house. It was by virtue of the act of suspension that the secretary of state had been enabled to exact these recognizances from the prisoners. The persons bound by these recognizances might go to the King's Bench, and demand to be released from them. But might not the King's Bench say, that they had voluntarily, and with their eyes open, entered into them? Was it not likely they would say so? The attorney-general then well knew they were without their remedy. But what was it that had enabled the government to demand these recognizances in such a manner that the prisoners were compelled to comply? The suspension of the habeas corpus act. It was then suspended, and at the time when their recognizances were entered into, no man knew how long it would remain suspended. In common cases, when the government had detained a man, they might offer him his discharge on his recognizance; if he refused that, the alternative was that he must be brought to trial. But, on the other hand, during the suspension of the habeas corpus act, if a prisoner refused to give his recognizance, the government was not obliged to bring him to trial. He would in that case be compelled to remain in prison, as the right of suing out his writ of habeas corpus was denied. Was there no difference between saying, give your recognizance or you shall be brought to trial, and saying, give your recognizance or you shall remain in prison? Here was the gist of the question. In three cases where the prisoners refused the alternative, they were kept in confinement till within a few days of the meeting of parliament. He hoped that, the conduct of a London magistrate towards two of those persons whom he had committed previously to the passing of the act, would soon come under the consideration of the house. (Hear.) The fate of those three shewed the terrible option given to the unhappy prisoners, which led them to give voluntary recognizances. He called upon his learned friend opposite, to say whether the Court of King's Bench would not refuse redress on the ground that the recognizances were voluntarily entered into?

The Solicitor-General observed, that the learned gentleman had now placed the argument on the ground that the recognizances were voluntarily entered into, and that, therefore, the Court of King's Bench would refuse redress. On this point, he was ready to join issue with him, and would assert, without fear of contradiction, that the Court of King's Bench would not refuse redress on such a ground. The question was not whether the parties had entered into recognizances voluntarily, or by duress; but whether these recognizances were legal or not. On the point of legality alone would the Court of King's Bench consider the question. The magistrates had, unquestionably, the right to hold to bail, and consequently to take personal recognizances. The only question was, whether they had done so legally, in the present case. This question was not for the house to decide. They had only to repeal their own act, and that would be effectually answered by the bill before them, without any such clause as the noble lord proposed.

Sir Samuel Romilly was surprised to hear the learned gentleman opposite pretend to understand that his learned friend near him had shifted his ground. He had from the first rested the argument on the ground of the recognizances having been voluntarily entered into. To say, therefore, that he had now placed the argument on that ground, was a misrepresentation. The secretary of state had derived from the suspension the power of detaining in prison without trial. Would it be pretended that this did not give him in effect the power of committing at his pleasure; and would it be denied, that an act of indemnity would be called for to cover the commitment as well as the detention? This power of committing and detaining was derived exclusively from the suspension act. From the same source was derived at least the opportunity of obtaining the recognizances. (Hear, hear.) Could it then be pretended that the suspension act was repealed while this part of it remained in force? The house was bound in consistency with their professed object to adopt the clause proposed.

The Attorney-General repeated his former arguments as to the legality of the recognizances, and the opportunity that would be afforded of discussing it in a court of law.

Sir W. Burroughs asked, why were recognizances taken at all? If there existed any danger, why release the prisoners; if not, why oblige them to enter into recognizances? This was no trifling evil. The intention and the effect of these recognizances were to send the prisoners back to the world, loaded with suspicion. To do away this evil, it was indispensable to adopt the clause proposed, and he would therefore divide the house rather than dispense with it.

Lord Folkestone rose to say, that in order to save trouble, he would withdraw the clause, if the attorney-general would state that he was ready to move the Court of King's Bench, to have all the recognizances discharged; but if the attorney-general only meant to give his own assurance that the recognizances would not be acted upon, he should feel himself compelled to press the clause.

The Attorney-General said, the nature of the case had been misunderstood, if it was supposed that the persons in question had entered into recognizances for their good behaviour. Their recognizances were only for their appearance in court to answer any charge that might be instituted against them. At the time they were discharged, it had not been determined whether any proceeding against them should be instituted. Their recognizances could not afterwards be discharged till the first day of term. On that day they appeared in court, notwithstanding the notice given them that their appearance was not necessary. When he said notwithstanding the notice, he excepted a few who left their homes before such notice could have been given. When they appeared in court, he said to them that their recognizances should not be acted upon, but should be immediately discharged; but some of them replied, that they had a right to make objections to the recognizances. He then at once said he would not deprive them of that right; God forbid that he should interpose, by any deed of his, between them and their right to bring forward legal objections. He had now no hesitation in saying, that their recognizances would be forthwith discharged.

Lord Folkestone then withdrew his clause and the bill was read a third time, and passed*.

* It may be proper to subjoin an outline of the proceedings that took place in the Court of King's Bench on the subject of these recognizances.—On the first day of Hilary Term, (Jan. 23,) John Roberts, Francis Ward, John Johnston, John Knight, John Bagguley, and several others, late of Manchester, Derby, &c appeared on the floor of the Court, and claimed to be heard separately.

John Roberts, of Manchester, said, that he had been confined in Gloucester gaol, under the habeas corpus suspension act, and had been liberated at the beginning of the present month, under a recognizance to appear in the Court of King's Bench on the first day of this term. He wished to know if Lord Ellenborough had any charge against him.

Lord Ellenborough.—I a charge against you?—You must couch your application properly; I have no charge against you.

Roberts.—Then, will your lordship counsel me

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Lord Folkestone presented the following petition of Francis Ward, which was ordered to be read: viz. "That the petitioner is a lace-maker, what I am to do, and where I am to obtain redress for my unjust imprisonment?

Lord Ellenborough.—I am a judge, not a counsel. You have appeared, and therefore you have satisfied your recognizance.

Another person now begged to be heard; but before he had proceeded far, he was interrupted by Francis Ward, who read a copy of the recognizance, by which he had been bound to appear this day, and so from day to day, whenever he should be called upon, under a penalty of 100*l.* He insisted that that recognizance ought to be discharged.

Lord Ellenborough observed, that this was quite a voluntary obtrusion, and if such persons were listened to, the term ought to be extended to double its present length.

Mr. Justice Bayley informed them that the recognizance was satisfied by their appearance, which would be recorded; the court had no power to discharge the recognizance, which was to continue for a year.

Another of the persons on the floor here insisted that it ought to be discharged: he was 130 miles from home, without a penny in his pocket; and if he were to reach home, he might be called upon next week to appear again; or, indeed, from day to day, during the present term.

John Knight demanded either to be put upon his trial forthwith, or to be set at large entirely: it was not just that this recognizance should be hanging over the head of an innocent man, to compel him to submission, or to silence the expression of his opinions.

John Johnston said, that the object of it was to allow him to go at large, while he was a good lad, but to punish him if he were a naughty boy.

Lord Ellenborough desired him to avoid such foolish and indiscreet language.

Another of these persons was about to read a statement of his case, when he was stopped by the court, as it had nothing to do with the question.

Mr. Justice Abbott said, that their appearance on the floor would be sufficient for the present, and they might now go home until called upon to appear again in case of misconduct.

They did not seem at all satisfied with this answer, but spoke of redress, and unjust imprisonment. One of them said, that he had been dragged from his family and immured for 22 weeks in a dungeon several hundred miles distant. After the peremptory paper had been gone through, Lord Ellenborough, Mr. Justice Abbott, and Mr. Justice Holroyd withdrew, leaving Mr. Justice Bayley, who read an affidavit, presented to him by Ward. His lordship said that he could do nothing but advise the parties to go home; he had no doubt that they would not be again required to appear.

Ward said he meant to found a motion upon his affidavit. Mr. Justice Bayley told him that it would be of no use at any time, but now the court was not sitting.

Johnston in the name of the whole of them informed his lordship, that as their appearance to-day satisfied the terms of the recognizance, they would return tomorrow prepared with affidavits, on which motions might be founded.

On the following day, Johnston appeared in court, and moved, either that he might be discharged from the recognizance into which he had been forced to enter, or that he might be brought to trial forthwith.

Lord Ellenborough.—Is there any recognizance of John Johnston before the court?

Mr. Dealtry, clerk of the crown office, answered in the affirmative.

Lord Ellenborough.—Read the recognizance.

Mr. Dealtry then read the recognizance, which was taken before E. T. Lyon, Esquire, at the Castle of Exeter, and bound the defendant, John Johnston, under a penalty of 100*l.* to appear in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench on the first day of the present term, to answer all and every matter and thing which might be alleged against him, and there to attend from day to day until discharged.

Lord Ellenborough.—Now what have you to object to this recognizance?

Mr. Johnston.—I wish to state the circumstances under which my imprisonment took place. I have prepared an affidavit on the subject, which I am desirous your lordship should hear read.

Lord Ellenborough.—I yesterday explained that there was no occasion for the parties under recognizances to attend till further notice.

Mr. Johnston.—I call on you to read my case, which is stated in the affidavit I hold in my hand.

Lord Ellenborough.—What object is to be derived from hearing the affidavit?

Mr. Johnston.—The object which I have in view is to have my recognizances cancelled, or to be brought to trial as soon as convenient. I do not mean to be importunate.

Lord Ellenborough.—It must appear that we have a right to cancel your recognizances before it can be done. As for bringing you to trial, that is not in our power.

Mr. Johnston.—I presume you will give me a decided answer.

Mr. Justice Bayley.—Can you shew us any grounds upon which we shall be authorized in drawing the conclusion that the recognizance into which you have entered, ought not to have been taken?

Mr. Johnston.—I do not pretend to say that there are any such grounds.

Lord Ellenborough.—Then you are in no condition to make this motion. Unless you can shew us that your recognizance has been illegally taken, we have no right to disturb it. We cannot have the time of the court thus wasted.

Mr. Johnston.—The object which I am desirous of obtaining is of vast importance to me.

Mr. Justice Bayley.—Your application is confined to two things: first, that you should be brought to trial forthwith. To this you have received for answer that the court have not the power to bring you to trial. The second thing for which you apply is to be discharged from your recognizance, and upon this the answer has been equally explicit. There is no ground upon which the court can comply with this request, unless you can satisfy us that your recognizance has been illegally obtained from you. You say your affidavit does not go to shew that there has been an illegality in the mode of taking your recognizance, consequently we can afford you no redress.

and has resided in the parish of Saint Mary, in the town of Nottingham, upwards of twenty-eight years, having a wife, four children, and a mother ninety years of age, dependent upon

Mr. Johnston.—Then I must certainly beg of the court, (as I shall remain in town, and be in attendance from day to day, as my recognizance requires) to allow me the means of supporting myself. It would not be prudent to return to my family, and still to have this recognizance held over my head. It is my decided wish, if my recognizance can't be discharged, that I be brought to trial. In the interim, I hope your lordships will afford me the means of living comfortably. Your lordships will not think this request unreasonable.

Lord Ellenborough.—Your application, if not unreasonable, is certainly an extraordinary one.—The court have no power to comply with your desire.

Mr. Johnston.—Then your lordship means to say that you refuse to grant any one of my applications?

Lord Ellenborough.—I mean to say what I have said.

The Attorney-General now addressed the court as follows:—"My lords, I had no notice whatever of any such motions as those which you have heard being about to be made this day, save what I derived from the ordinary channels of public information, in which I saw reported that which occurred yesterday. In consequence of what I thus collected, I felt it my duty to attend here and to state, and I have every reason to believe, the gentleman who has been making these applications, had notice before he left Manchester, that his attendance in court would not be required."

Lord Ellenborough.—Then the inconvenience and expense of being absent from his family is attributable to himself?

The Attorney-General.—So I believe; and I believe that every other gentleman who entered into recognizances under similar circumstances, received a like communication.

Mr. Johnston.—I do not mean to deny that.

Lord Ellenborough.—Then there is an end of this business.

Mr. Johnston.—But I wish to state the nature of the notice which I received.

Lord Ellenborough.—Really the time of the court, which belongs to other suitors, cannot be thus trifled with. We have heard your motion, and have given you the only answer of which it is susceptible.

Mr. Johnston.—Then I suppose I must submit to the consequences.

Two other persons made similar motions, which were rejected. Others were prepared to bear the same course, but the court would not hear them.

On a subsequent day, however, Joseph Mitchell obtained a rule, to oblige Sir Nathaniel Conant (chief magistrate of the police establishment at Bow-street) to shew cause why the recognizance entered into by Mitchell, should not be discharged. On the 31st of January, the Attorney-General attended to shew cause. The application, he observed, was made on the ground, that the recognizance had been obtained by compulsion, and at a time when Mitchell, being a prisoner, was not in a condition to act according to his own will; but he should be able to satisfy the court, that there was no pretence for this assertion. On the contrary, Mitchell had not only voluntarily submitted to it at the time, but had strongly recommended to a person of the name of Benbow, also in custody under a warrant of the Secretary of State, to do the same, telling Benbow, that he was a fool not to comply with what was a mere form for the sake of regaining his liberty. The Attorney-General further stated, that he was provided with the affidavit of Sir Nathaniel Conant, expressly and pointedly contradicting all the material passages in that of Mitchell, upon which their lordships had been induced to grant the rule nisi. It was denied by Sir Nathaniel that he had ever directed him to appear in the Court of King's Bench for the purpose of getting his recognizance discharged; but he admitted having told him, that if ever he should be called upon to appear, his expense of coming to town would be defrayed. The affidavit of Sir Nathaniel further stated, that when the terms of the recognizance were read over to Mitchell, he was asked whether he was content, when he immediately assented. Their lordships knew perfectly well, that when a recognizance was entered into, the party was never called upon to sign any thing. The usual way, both before magistrates and in court, was to repeat the forms of the obligation to the party whose appearance was required, with the penalty of violating it, and he was then asked if he was satisfied. If he answered yes, or indicated by a bow or any other motion his assent, the recognizance was complete—there was no writing or signing of any paper at the time, although, at a subsequent period, the recognizance was returned, and made matter of record. The fallacy Mitchell had fallen into was this—he had supposed that because he had not affixed his signature to the instrument, it was therefore no recognizance. The affidavit of Sir Nathaniel Conant was confirmed in every particular by several other persons; by Mr. Day and Mr. Adkins, who were present at the interview between Mitchell and Sir Nathaniel. The affidavit of Adkins stated that upon Mitchell's at first hesitating and desiring to know the nature of the instrument, Sir Nathaniel repeated to him the words, "You acknowledge yourself indebted to our Sovereign Lord the King in the sum of 100*l.* It is upon condition that you appear in his Majesty's Court of King's Bench on the first day of next term, to answer all such matters and things as shall be then and there objected to you, and that you do not depart without leave."—Upon which Mitckell said, he had no objection to that. It was astonishing, then, that he should have come forward with a motion to discharge his recognizance, on the principle that he had not entered into it. If any magistrate had returned a recognizance which he had not actually taken, he would have been guilty of a gross offence; but in the present case, the party had first expressed his acquiescence in the terms of it, and afterwards having repented of what he had done, had regretted his conduct, inasmuch as it kept fetters on his legs, and tied up his mouth; thus most unequivocally admitting the fact that he had entered into the recognizance.

Mitchell, in support of his application said, he had no idea that the recognizance was a proceeding which would have subjected him to ulterior inconvenience. He had no conception it rendered him liable to be capriciously called upon by the ministers of the government. He had been told, that for a magistrate to extort such an instrument, by taking advantage of the situation of a party, was illegal, and, therefore, upon that ground he hoped the re-him for support; that on the 10th of June, 1817, a number of Nottingham police officers entered the petitioner's dwelling-house, in the town of Nottingham aforesaid, and one of them (Mr. Lawson) said to the petitioner, "Mr. Ward, we are come to search your house;" the petitioner asked by what authority they came to do so; one of them observed, "you may be sure we are not come without authority;" the petitioner replied, "shew me it or you shall not search my premises;" immediately Mr. Lawson held up in his hand a paper, and said, "Here it is;" the petitioner requested him to read it, he replied, "The law will not justify me in reading it, until we get before a magistrate;" while this conversation was passing between the petitioner and Lawson, the other police officers were gone into different parts of the petitioner's dwelling-house and premises; therefore seeing all remonstrance in vain, the petitioner reluctantly submitted to that which he thought diametrically opposed to both law and justice; the petitioner has no doubt but the sequel will prove to the house that he did not oppose the police from motives of fear; no, the man who is guided by this rule, "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you," has nothing to fear; and that rule which was laid down by no less a personage than Jesus Christ, has long been adopted and acted upon by the petitioner, so that he had no reason to dread the thoughts of ten or twelve constables searching his premises for seditious and treasonable documents; it was not from fear, but from a consciousness of the rectitude of the petitioner's conduct as a man and a subject, and from a persuasion of the illegality of those proceedings, that the petitioner opposed the searching of his house; when the police officers had took down a cannister, looked into a thimble, and searched the petitioner's house in vain, they frankly acknowledged there was nothing to be found which they were searching for; the petitioner asked them what they were looking for; one of them observed, "You have that to find out;" not being satisfied with such proceedings, the petitioner consulted an attorney, and was by him advised to make application for a copy of the warrant or authority by which the petitioner's house was searched, and for the names of the cognizance would be discharged. Sir Nathaniel Conant had told him, that if he wished to get rid of the recognizance, he had only to make his personal appearance in the Court of King's Bench, on the first day of term. He hoped the trap and snare he had been lured into, would not be used for his destruction, and that his recognizance would not be suffered to hang over him like a scarecrow. If the court had any thing to allege against him, he would willingly deliver himself up to trial. He was not afraid of suffering or of answering any kind of charge. He had been afraid of being put into a dungeon, and locked up in a loathsome cell, without any charge being preferred against him. He had got out of the way to avoid such evils; but he never had, and never would, shrink from a fair trial. On this ground he entreated their lordships to discharge his recognizance. He had come up to London to attend the court, being warned by the Mayor of Liverpool, in consequence of a letter sent to that magistrate by Lord Sidmouth. He thought the noble and learned lord on the bench had conceived that he had entered into a recognizance, when he really had not. He trusted he should not only be discharged, but that he should have some kind of satisfaction made to him for his severe sufferings.

Lord Ellenborough observed, that the application to the court was on the ground of recognizances having been returned, which had never been entered into. Such was the gravamen of the application. If not having been in fact entered into, the party had been put to trouble and expense; or whether that were so or not, if in truth there was no such recognizance, it would be an offence by the magistrate who had returned it, which this court would severely animadvert upon; but the evidence before the court shewed, not only that the recognizance had been entered into, and that the pretence of the person making the present application was not founded, but that he was conscious of what he had done; for evidently he had been commenting on the refusal of other persons to do the same thing; and at a subsequent period had regretted that he had done it. The fact, that he had entered into the recognizance, was sworn by Sir N. Conant, who had minutely stated all the circumstances of the transaction. Sir Nathaniel's testimony was fully confirmed by the other witnesses. But, (said his lordship) without referring to extraneous matter, the question was, whether the ground of the application was denied. Now, it was positively sworn that Mitchell assented to enter into a recognizance in the terms propounded to him, and the change of his opinion afterwards would not alter the effect of his having so entered into it. The ground of the application was taken away by the affidavits of Sir Nathaniel and the others, and consequently there was no pretence for Mitchell's obtaining the rule.

Mr. Justice Abbott and Mr. Justice Holroyd both concurred in opinion with the Chief Justice, and the rule was accordingly discharged.

Mr. Attorney-General then rose and said, it was his intention to move to discharge all recognizances returned to the court, of persons who had been apprehended under the operation of the habeas corpus suspension act. He had a list of their names before him. He was anxious upon this subject not to be misunderstood. He moved to discharge those recognizances, because he did not think it necessary to keep them in force any longer. He should have done it earlier, but it had been suggested to him that some persons wished to state objections to their recognizances in point of law, and he did not think it right to prevent those persons from having the benefit of their legal objections. He should now move to discharge the recognizance of Joseph Mitchell, whose case had been just argued, those of John Roberts, Francis Ward, John Johnston, John Knight and John Bagguley; also the recognizances of several other persons, whom the learned gentleman named. (See the statement in the Appendix, entitled, "a Return of all Persons Arrested, Committed, or Detained, in England, on Treasonable Charges, in the Year 1817, &c.") constables it was directed and delivered to. The petitioner then applied to Mr. Enfield, town clerk; who observed, "You have no right to a copy," and he repeated that assertion several times, and added with considerable emphasis, "You may make application, but I know what advice I shall give;" the petitioner went directly to the police office, where he saw Mr. Alderman Saars, and acquainted him with the petitioner's business; the Alderman said, "Go backwards," and immediately ordered a constable to take the petitioner into custody; after remaining in that situation upwards of an hour, Mr. Alderman Barber (a near neighbour of the petitioner) came to him and said, "I am very sorry for you, Francis, as I believe you to be an honest industrious man, but I would advise you to withdraw your application;" he repeated that several times, and further added, "It is a dangerous case to press, however you will not consider me as advising you as a magistrate, but as a friend;" the petitioner informed him that the treatment the petitioner had received was altogether unmerited, and that, at all events, he was determined to press his application, conceiving he had an incontrovertible right to make the demand. Soon after this interview the petitioner was taken before the bench of magistrates at the police office, when the town clerk inquired of the petitioner what his application was; he informed the town clerk it was for a copy of the warrant issued ordering his dwelling-house and premises to be searched, and for the names of the constables it was directed and delivered to. The town clerk ordered the petitioner to be taken away until his case was disposed of; in a short time the petitioner was again introduced to the magistrates, and the town clerk then informed him that they had agreed not to grant the request, and that the petitioner must be detained for being concerned in the Loughborough outrage, alluding as the petitioner supposed to frame-breaking, which took place in Loughborough in June 1816. The petitioner was then taken to the town gaol, where (except what food his wife brought him) he had nothing but bread and water, felon's allowance, and slept in one of the dampest cells that ever man was put into; added to this his bed was not only damp but had a strong sulphureous smell, which rendered it almost intolerable; thus the petitioner was taken from his abode of comfort, without reason or justice, and cut off from society, except in the day-time, being immured in a small room with a felon; and although confined in this prison out four days, the petitioner there caught a severe cold, which is so firmly fixed upon his lungs, that he has too much reason to fear it can never be removed. On the 14th of June, the fourth day after his arrest, Mr. Alderman Barber, the town clerk, a king's messenger, and a Bow-street officer, came to the gaol, and informed the petitioner that he must prepare for a journey, as there was a warrant from the secretary of state; Mr. Barber then observed, "The Loughborough business must stand over," and the petitioner has heard no more of it from that time to the present. He denies any participation or knowledge, either directly or indirectly, in the breaking of frames at Loughborough or elsewhere, or with the parties concerned therein, and he here challenges inquiry, and insists that the imputation so made upon him is groundless, and founded only in malice. In about an hour afterwards the King's messenger and Bow-street officer came again to the gaol, and chained the petitioner hand and foot to a man of the name of Haynes. Before they got into the chaise the Bow-street officer said to the petitioner, "If you heave your hands to let the chains be seen, you shall be the first that shall fall;" at the same time holding a pistol in his hand; on the road to London the fetters round the petitioner's hand gave him much pain, which caused him to comment upon the severe and unmerited treatment he was suffering: the officer observed, "You wish to make it appear that you are not a disaffected person; the town clerk informed me that you are much respected by the mechanics of Loughborough and Leicester, and the working people in general, so that you are a dangerous man to be at large." On the 15th the petitioner arrived in London, and was placed in Cold Bath Fields prison, and on the 21st was taken before Lord Sidmouth and other gentlemen; after inquiring the petitioner's age, he was informed that he was apprehended under a warrant from the secretary of state on suspicion of high treason, and that he should commit the petitioner to close confinement until delivered by due course of law; and further observed, "If you have any thing to say, you are at liberty to speak;" to that the petitioner replied, "I declare my innocence, and if every action of my life was painted in its proper colour, your lordship would say I merited reward rather than punishment;" in vain did the petitioner declare his innocence, and challenge inquiry and proof of his guilt; his lordship observed, "You are not unjustly punished, for my information is from a respectable source, and you shall have a list of the evidence against you, and proper notice of your trial before its commencement." The petitioner was then conveyed back to Cold Bath Fields Prison, and on the 24th was, with William Cliff (a young man from Derby), removed to Oxford Castle. On the petitioner's arrival at that place he was confined by himself in one of the most dismal cells ever made for criminals under sentence of death, about eleven feet by seven; when there was a fire in it the petitioner was nearly suffocated with smoke, and driven to the necessity of removing into the privy for air, in order to be enabled to respire; but what is here stated is not all the wretchedness connected with that excessively miserable cell that the petitioner was confined in, for such a stench descended the chimney during the night, that the dungeon was rendered almost intolerable, endangering the life of the petitioner. He frequently applied to the governor to remove that intolerable evil, but in vain. After remaining four days in such cell, William Cliff was brought down to it, and the petitioner taken up into a small room called the turnkey's lodge, and such alternate change was made every four days for between three and four months; and although the petitioner and Cliff passed each other once each fourth day, they were not permitted to hold any conversation, or even speak to each other. Near Michaelmas the petitioner and Cliff were allowed to be together a few hours each day; that circumstance was so far alleviating the rigorous treatment of the petitioner, although he had no previous acquaintance with, or knowledge of Cliff. In the last few weeks of the petitioner's imprisonment the prisoners in the Castle became so numerous that it was found absolutely necessary for the petitioner and Cliff to be confined constantly in a turnkey's lodge, and in that situation the petitioner continued until the 13th of November 1817, and was then liberated on his own recognizance of 100*l.* to appear in the Court of King's Bench, Westminster, on the 23d of January 1818, and there remain from day to day until discharged, and not depart the court without leave. In the foregoing statement the petitioner has attempted to give the house a plain detailed account of the sufferings, without exaggeration, he has undergone while detained under the suspension act; but alas! this attempt comes far short of giving a full and clear description of the unheard-of cruelty he has been treated with, as no mention has been made of the excruciating torture of mind the petitioner has undergone;—here language fails, and to form any conception of his case, it will be necessary to figure to the imagination a man who through life has taken a very active part in it, being accustomed to labour hard for his bread, by frequently having to work twelve, fourteen, sixteen hours a day, and sometimes more, the existence of a family depending on his exertions, which all at once ceases, and the intolerable state of inactivity succeeds; added to this, being possessed of all the finer feelings that adorn human nature, and those are for a long period stretched on the rack by his being dragged away from all that is near and dear to a man in life; thus the glowing affection of a son, a husband, and a father, being simultaneously aroused, contributed not to sweeten the bitter cup of life, but to render it insupportable; for such an one, who has never been within the walls of a prison before, to be cut off from society, and immured within the walls of a dungeon not fit for a murderer to be confined in; what inconceivable sufferings must such an one experience! nothing but the thoughts of his innocence could enable him to bear up under the intolerable load;—and this is precisely the case of the petitioner; and, if the patience of the house is not exhausted, the petitioner will mention some of the damages he has sustained while in prison; he has before stated, that his own health was so much injured that he has too much reason to fear the complaint upon his lungs cannot be removed; his wife's constitution has been so much injured by uneasiness of mind, that she at present continues ill, and in all human probability is likely so to do; when the petitioner was arrested he had ten machines employed in his shop, and a good seat of work for himself, but during his confinement the latter was lost, and he has not been able to obtain any more to the present time, and he found only two machines out of the ten employed at his return; since the 10th of June 1817 to the present time he has been unemployed, and is likely to continue so; and the petitioner's character and reputation, the mainspring of a poor man's existence, and in some cases as valuable as life, have received such a stab by his being committed and detained on suspicion of high treason, that unless the petitioner is afforded an opportunity of clearing himself it may contribute greatly to his total ruin. The petitioner therefore respectfully and earnestly requests the house to order that he may be brought to its bar, and undergo the strictest examination, and that he may be brought to trial according to law, and meet his accusers face to face, and thereby have the benefit and justice of the laws; and the petitioner also prays, that having thus detailed the sufferings he has unjustly endured, the house will afford him such redress as in heir great wisdom seems fit, or that they will take such steps as shall lead to the punishment of the wrong-doers, and effectually prevent in any other case the recurrence of such unjust and cruel proceedings."

The court discharged the recognizances entered into by all of them.

Lord Folkestone, in moving that the petition be printed, said, that the house would be guilty of a great dereliction of duty, if they did not inquire into the grievances set forth by the petitioner. He meant, therefore, to move the appointment of a committee to inquire into the grounds of complaint. If no objection was made to the measure, he would move now. If any objection should be made, he would give notice for a motion on a future day.

Mr. Bennet thought it would be much more convenient to give notice, as many other persons had suffered in precisely the same way as this miserable man. He had occasion to know, and he should bring forward proofs, that the most barbarous, cruel, and inhuman treatment was exercised under the sanction of the suspension act: such as thrusting into impure cells, loading with irons, and other abuses of the same kind. As the representative house of parliament they were bound to inquire—as Englishmen they must feel bound to inquire—into the bitter grievances of Englishmen. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh hoped that the noble lord would give notice of his motion.

Lord Folkestone then presented the following petition of certain inhabitants of the town of Nottingham.—"That the petitioners are neighbours of, and have been for some years acquainted with Mr. Francis Ward, lately in confinement under a warrant from the Secretary of State on suspicion of high treason; that they have lately seen a petition which the said Francis Ward is about to offer to the house; that they wish to state to the house, that the said Francis Ward has always merited the character of a hard-working sober honest industrious man, and has conducted himself with propriety and respectability in his station in life, and the petitioners are fully assured that he is incapable of committing any act of treason, or of doing any thing which would justify the proceedings had against him; that he has in consequence of his imprisonment sustained much injury in his business; and therefore the petitioners pray the house to take his case into their most serious consideration, in order that they may provide the said Francis Ward with such relief as to their wisdom may appear just, and take such steps as shall effectually prevent the recurrence of such proceedings."—His lordship then gave notice that he would on this day se'nnight move for a committee to inquire into the subject of these petitions.

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS.] Mr. V. Fitzgerald moved for leave to bring in a bill "to suspend the operation of an act made in the last session of parliament, to provide for the more deliberate investigation of presentments to be made by grand juries for roads and public works in Ireland, and for accounting for money raised by such presentments." He observed, that the new officers (county surveyors) had not yet been appointed, as none could be obtained, qualified in the terms of the act, and that the time of presentment was inconvenient, the spring assizes being fitter for the purpose than the summer assizes.

Mr. Abercromby thought it an ill omen, that the right hon. gentleman had not stated any intention to propose a substitute for the measure which he moved to suspend. This was much to be lamented, as the system of Irish grand jury presentments was on all hands confessedly such as called loudly for some legislative remedy. He could not doubt the sincerity of the right honourable gentleman, who was the author of the act which he now proposed to suspend, nor the disposition of the Irish government to carry it into execution; but it seemed strange, that when there were places to dispose of in Ireland, there should not be found a sufficient number of candidates. Yet the difficulty of finding thirty-two surveyors, was one of the main causes alleged for this motion; for the other cause, namely, the limitation of the presentments to the summer assizes, might be easily removed, without suspending the present act.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald assured the house and the hon. gentleman, that he felt extremely anxious for the success of this measure, but finding so many difficulties in the way of its execution, and the government consequently embarrassed, he thought himself bound in candour to propose its suspension, which, however, was only to continue during the present session, within which period he hoped that a more practicable measure would be devised. The hon. gentleman might rely that he was not disposed to withdraw from the principle of the measure to which his motion referred; but to render that principle effective, he must look for the support of other gentlemen who felt an interest in the concerns of Ireland.

Mr. Peel said, it was impossible to deny that the act had met with much opposition. Surveyors were to be appointed, one to each county, some at a salary of 300*l.* or 400*l.* and some at 600*l.* It was obvious that the utility of those surveyors depended on the confidence to be placed in them. The act empowered the lord lieutenant to appoint three commissioners. It was anxiously wished that those commissioners should be persons unconnected with the government. Mr. Telford, Major Taylor, and Mr. Johnston, were the three commissioners. His only instructions to them were to judge of the competence of candidates, and to report 32 individuals whom they should find qualified. The only observation he had added, was, that local connections and local recommendations should not be relied on. The commissioners continued to devote nine hours of every day for several weeks to this business. Not fewer than 95 candidates presented themselves, some of them men of great professional abilities. Yet the board found none who possessed the necessary experience and practical knowledge in road-making and bridge-building, which form the chief portions of the duty of county surveyors, and therefore they did not grant any certificate.

Sir Henry Parnell thought the difficulty of obtaining surveyors not a sufficient reason for suspending the act. The hon. gentleman ought rather to have suspended his decision for some time. He deprecated a recurrence to the enormous expenditure to which counties had been exposed. The act now proposed to be suspended was founded on the principle of control over this expenditure, and of inquiry into its propriety. He trusted this principle was not to be abandoned.—The hon. baronet concluded by referring to the discontent produced universally in Ireland, by the enormous sums of money expended upon the presentments of grand juries, and earnestly hoped that some other bill would be introduced during the present session, because, if longer delayed, he feared it would be impossible to bring the house again to the same temper, which had happily prevailed upon this important subject, when the bill which it was now proposed to suspend received their approbation.

After a few words from Mr. C. Butler and another Irish member against the principle of the former measure, leave was given to bring in the bill, and it was brought in, and read a first and second time, and committed for Saturday next.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] Mr. Grenfell rose for the purpose of obtaining some information from the chancellor of the exchequer with regard to one or two very important questions intimately connected with the financial and commercial interests of the country. They were questions upon which distinct information ought to be given without delay. He alluded, in the first place, to the resumption of cash payments on the part of the Bank of England, which, as at present fixed by law, would take place on the 5th of July next. After the promises and the declarations, so often renewed by the Government and the Bank, it was natural to suppose that no doubt or uncertainty would prevail in any quarter, as to the probability of cash payments being actually resumed when that period should arrive. Very considerable doubt did nevertheless exist in the public mind upon this subject, and more especially among that class of society which was frequently described as the monied interest. It was desirable that this uncertainty should not continue one moment after his Majesty's ministers had it in their power to remove it. No honourable member, who had a practical knowledge of what was now daily passing in the city, could be ignorant of the very large transactions and speculations of a gambling nature that were entered into and depended upon the result of this contingency. It was obvious that, in such a course of adventure, those who had the means of making themselves acquainted with the real intentions of his Majesty's ministers, must possess a material advantage over others who were not in the secret. For these different reasons he hoped he should not be considered as making an extraordinary request on behalf of the public, when he desired to know whether any event had occurred, or was expected to occur, which in its consequences would prevent the resumption of cash payments on the 5th of July next. There was another question upon which he was likewise desirous that some information should be afforded, as it equally related to the subject of the connexion between the government of the country and the bank. The public at present stood in the situation of debtor to the bank for two loans, in his opinion improperly so called, but for two loans, one of 3,000,000*l.* advanced without interest, the other of 6,000,000*l.* at an interest of four per cent. and which would soon become payable. Until these loans should be repaid, the bank had secured to themselves the undisturbed possession of a balance upon the public money deposited in their hands, which, for the last twelve years, had never fallen short, on the average, of 11,000,000*l.* or 2,000,000*l.* more than the sum which they claimed to be due to them from the public. (Hear, hear.) He was convinced that it would be highly advantageous to the public interests that the government of the country should be unfettered by these obligations; and what he wished on this occasion to inquire was, whether any arrangement was in progress, or had been concluded, either for discharging the loans in question, or placing them on a better footing; and if any, what arrangement?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the first question put to him by the hon. gentleman involved the interests of so many individuals, that he felt it incumbent on him to guard against misapprehension, by the most explicit answer which the nature of the subject enabled him to give. He could assure the house, that he had the satisfaction of knowing, that the Bank had made ample preparations for resuming its payments in cash at the period fixed by parliament. He could at the same time add, that he knew of nothing either in the internal state of the country, or in its political relations with foreign powers, which would render it expedient to continue the restriction beyond that period. It was well known, however, that financial measures and pecuniary arrangements were in a course of proceeding amongst foreign powers, of such a nature as might, by possibility, make it a question for the consideration of parliament, whether the restriction ought to be further continued whilst the immediate effects of such arrangements should be in operation. Having so far replied to the hon. gentleman's inquiry, he felt that he should only embarrass his statement by any further attempt at explanation. With regard to the second question of the hon. gentleman he had no difficulty in stating, that he had it in contemplation to submit some measure providing for the discharge of the loan of 6,000,000*l.* bearing an interest of 4 per cent.; but as no interest was payable on the old loan of 3,000,000*l.*, and which might, therefore, in some respects be considered as a gift, he apprehended that the hon. gentleman himself would not feel disposed to relinquish it without obtaining some other advantage of corresponding value.

Mr. Tierney said, that what he understood from the right hon. gentleman was this—first, that the Bank was prepared to resume its cash payments, a fact which it gave him satisfaction to hear; but then he was immediately told that something might happen between this and the 5th of July next amongst foreign powers, which might, by possibility, render the preparations of the Bank unavailing. It was evidently impossible to say that any thing could be expected to take place at home to interfere with the performance of their engagements. He must say he had never heard more words employed in elucidating a subject, which left the subject more in the dark. The only inference which they enabled him to derive was this—that there were persons who wanted some excuse for still postponing the resumption, and that they now began to fear it would be necessary to look for that excuse abroad. Had the right hon. gentleman refused to afford any answer to the question of his hon. friend, he should not have been disappointed; but the one which had been given would not remove the evil complained of by his hon. friend, but would, in his opinion, considerably increase it. Instead of finding speculation confined to the probability or improbability of one event, the right hon. gentleman's statement was calculated to excite a spirit of curiosity as to the contents of every foreign mail, that must necessarily lead to the enlargement and multiplication of gambling transactions. The right hon. gentleman's observation as to the loan of 3,000,000*l.* appeared to him to amount merely to this—that as the repayment of a loan was seldom very agreeable, he was disposed to defer that ceremony as long as possible. He certainly had looked for a much more full and satisfactory explanation, when he recollected the triumphant boasts and anticipations which had been indulged in during the course of last session. He had himself been twitted by the right hon. gentleman, for entertaining a slight doubt upon the subject, and was then told that the Bank had, for many purposes, already resumed their cash payments. All, however, that could now be said was, that we had a Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose utmost endeavours at distinctness, only served to shew that he had no one distinct idea upon the subject. (A laugh.)

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was ordered that the house should resolve itself into a committee of supply on Saturday next, and that the speech of the lords' commissioners be referred to the said committee.

NEPAUL WAR.—MARQUIS OF HASTINGS.] Mr. Speaker informed the house, that he had received a letter from the Marquis of Hastings, dated the 6th of February, acknowledging the letter of the late Speaker, which conveyed to him the thanks of that house, for his successful administration of the Nepaul war. (See vol. I. p. 116.) The noble marquis disclaimed every pretension to so exalted an honour, except an earnest anxiety to maintain the British interests in India, and uphold those military trophies which had been previously acquired by his countrymen in that distant quarter of the empire. He could not fail, however, to recognize in the vote of the house, that liberal policy which always induced them to favour with their approbation the indications of any zeal, however humble. He should carefully transmit the thanks of the house to General Ouchterlony, and the other officers engaged in the Nepaul war, who, although they could not set a greater than himself, would undoubtedly estimate at a proper value, the reward conferred upon their exertions.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.] Lord Castlereagh said, he had intended to move that the house at its rising should adjourn till Monday, but he now felt it proper to propose the adjournment only until Saturday, in order that the royal assent might on that day be given to the bill which had been passed this night, and with a view also of presenting on Saturday, if it should be then ready, the communication from government to which he had before alluded with regard to the state of the country. This communication would, he had no doubt, be laid before the house either on Saturday or Monday; and he gave notice of his intention to propose the usual course upon such a communication, namely, that it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Tierney asked upon what day the communication alluded to was most likely to be made, and also upon what day the noble lord's proposed motion would be brought forward?

Lord Castlereagh replied, that he proposed to submit his motion for referring the communication to a secret committee on Monday, but whether that communication would be laid before the House on Saturday or Monday, would depend upon the convenience of government.

It was then agreed that the house should adjourn till Saturday*.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, Jan. 31.

REPEAL OF THE SUSPENSION ACT.] The royal assent was given by commission to the bill intituled, "An act to repeal an act made in the last session of parliament, intituled, An act to continue an act to empower his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government."

The commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Melville.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, Jan. 31.

On receiving a message to attend the lords commissioners, the House went; and being returned, Mr. Speaker reported the royal assent to the habeas corpus suspension act repeal bill. (See the lords.)

Mr. Arbuthnot moved, that there be laid before the house an account "of all Exchequer bills issued by virtue of the act of the 57th Geo. III. c. 2. intituled, 'An act for raising the sum of 24 millions by Exchequer bills for the service of the year 1817,' outstanding and unprovided for." Also, an account "of all Exchequer bills issued by virtue of the act of the 57th Geo. III. c. 80, intituled, 'An act for raising the sum of nine millions by Exchequer bills for the service of the year 1817,' outstanding and unprovided for."

The accounts were immediately brought up, by which it appeared, that bills for "24 millions," and "nine millions," had been issued.

CONVICTS UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH IN

* In consequence of this adjournment, the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Speaker did not attend on the 30th of January, (being the day of the martyrdom of King Charles I.) to hear the usual sermon preached. They are the only members whose duty it is to attend.

NEWGATE.] Mr. Bennet moved that there be laid before the house, a return "of the number of persons, male and female, now under sentence of death in Newgate; distinguishing each, and stating their respective ages, the date of their sentences, and the crimes for which they have been convicted." He was induced to make this motion in consequence of there being at this moment 65 or 66 persons under sentence of death in the gaol in question; and from his having understood from his Majesty's ministers, during the last session, that an arrangement would be made for reporting the persons convicted in one session before the other commenced. The situation of the unhappy persons to whom he alluded was truly miserable, and their treatment more than inhuman. They were confined together in cells 9 feet 5 inches long, by 7 feet wide, and in these places they were shut up sixteen hours out of the four-and-twenty. They were all mixed together indiscriminately, the young with the old, and thus the young had the opportunity of learning nothing but the trade of preying upon their fellow-creatures. He could not help thinking that the house had a right to expect that his Majesty's ministers would have attended to their pledge. If there was not room sufficient in the gaol for the accommodation of its inmates, application should be made to parliament on the subject. He did not want to interfere with what might be considered the province of the city of London; but if they did not think proper to bring the matter forward, he should feel it his duty to do so. He desired to be distinctly understood, as not meaning, by his present observations, to cast the least reflection on Mr. Brown, the present gaoler of Newgate, who, he verily believed, had done more to ameliorate the situation of his prisoners than had been done since the time of the benevolent Howard.

On the question being put from the chair,

Alderman Atkins said, it was extremely to be regretted that the condemned cells in the gaol of Newgate were not calculated for the reception of more than 40 persons. It never was anticipated that there would be occasion for greater accommodation. With regard to making reports of one session before the other commenced, he begged to state that this was impossible. The interest of the unhappy criminals frequently required that time should be taken to deliberate on their cases, and to make inquiries as to their characters, often in distant parts of the country. The reports were made as often as it was expedient.

Mr. Bennet, in answer to the last observation of the hon. gentleman, stated, that the Recorder had been ready for some time with his last report; the delay took place on the part of his Majesty's government.—The motion was then carried.

BANK TOKENS.] Mr. Curwen begged to know, whether any steps had been taken to secure those persons from loss who might chance to have Bank of England tokens, which had been of so much use to the public, in their possession after the period appointed by the Bank for their recall, and whether they would not be received in payment by the receivers of taxes?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the receivers of taxes would no doubt receive the Bank tokens so long as the Bank would receive them, but he was not prepared to say they would do more. He understood there had been some communication from the Bank of England on the subject to the country bankers, with a view to facilitate the exchange of the tokens for other money.

Mr. Curwen said, he only wished that means should be taken to secure the public from loss.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day for the house to resolve itself into a committee of supply. The object he had now in view was merely to adopt the usual form of taking into consideration that part of his Majesty's speech which referred to the supplies for the year. It was always customary to refer this subject to a committee of supply the day succeeding that on which the speech itself had been taken into consideration. He had adopted the earliest opportunity of pursuing this course. If it were intended to enter into any discussion, it would perhaps be fitter to defer the question till Monday.

Mr. Sharp said, he merely rose for the purpose of referring to the circumstance, that in the speech to which the right hon. gentleman had alluded, there was not one word said of economy or retrenchment. There was not the same regard even to appearances that was observable at the opening of the preceding session. (hear.) On the contrary, it seemed to be the intention of his Majesty's government to raise the income of the country to the expenses, rather than to reduce the expenses to the income. (hear.) It was important, especially as that period approached when they were to meet their constituents, and when they would be called upon to describe what the state of the country was, that it should be understood to which class they belonged—whether to that class which had assisted in adding to the intolerable taxation of the people, and to the lavish expenditure of ministers, or to that class which endeavoured to lessen the burdens of the people, and to oppose a further extension of extravagance.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought, after the pledge he had given to bring the state of the finances of the country before the house in a substantial shape, that the hon. gentleman might have spared his observations. The house would, no doubt, be as much alive to economy, and pay as great a regard to the public interests at the present season as at any former period.

Mr. Brougham could not agree with the right

hon. gentleman that his hon. friend's observations were uncalled for. It was true that they were to have a committee of finance, but when they recollected how much they had benefited from that committee before, he was not disposed to place much reliance upon its exertions. (hear.) In the speech which had been delivered from the throne, as his honourable friend had justly stated, there was no allusion whatever to retrenchment or economy. All they had to do, therefore, was to avail themselves of the experience of last year, when economy and retrenchment were recommended by the Prince Regent; and, comparing that with the present year, when there was no such recommendation, form a conclusion as to what their expectations might fairly be. (hear.) He trusted that the house and the country would keep a watchful eye upon those gentlemen (his Majesty's ministers,) and that they would, by a strenuous effort, during the few weeks which yet remained to them, endeavour to reduce the intolerable burdens under which the people groaned.

The house then resolved itself into a committee. The estimates for the current year were laid before it, and on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was resolved, "that a supply be granted to his Majesty."—The house then resumed, and the resolution was ordered to be reported on Monday.

PROPERTY TAX.] Mr. Brougham wished to be informed whether any steps had been taken for destroying all remains of a tax which had been justly odious to the people, and which had been abolished through the exertions of that house and of the country at large—he meant the property-tax?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was not prepared to answer the question in detail; he would inquire more particularly, and give an answer on Monday.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Mr. Bennet presented the following petition of William Benbow, late of Manchester, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table. "That the petitioner on the 16th of May 1817, was arrested in the city of Dublin without apparent legal authority for that purpose, and detained in custody after examination for four days, without being able to obtain any information as to the cause of his arrest or detention in custody; that on the 20th of May 1817, the petitioner being still in custody, a messenger arrived from England and re-arrested him, by virtue of a warrant from Lord Sidmouth, upon a pretended suspicion of high treason, and the petitioner was conveyed in irons from Dublin to London, and committed to the house of correction in Cold Bath Fields, there to remain until delivered by due course of law; that the petitioner was then promised a fair trial, and that the list of witnesses intended to be brought against him, with whatever other information might be necessary, should be furnished him in due time: that the petitioner was confined for the space of eight months in the house of correction as aforesaid, and treated with much unnecessary cruelty and insult, and exposed to much studied deprivation of those comforts that his situation required; the petitioner not being permitted to correspond freely even with his wife, the letters of the petitioner to his wife being detained by Lord Sidmouth, and those of his wife to the petitioner by the jailer of the house of correction, as if it were necessary to add all the pain to the petitioner's miserable situation, of which his persecutors were capable; the petitioner's letters, or rather such of them as Lord Sidmouth thought proper, were forwarded free of expense, this was not requested by the petitioner, but afterwards the petitioner was informed that no more correspondence could be franked for state prisoners; that the petitioner requested the Secretary of State to furnish him with such necessaries as the deprivation of liberty prevented him from procuring for himself, when he was insulted by being told he might have such things as were provided for persons committed on felonious charges; that after eight months of such unmerited confinement and violent treatment, the petitioner was offered his liberation upon terms which he deemed himself bound to reject, as degrading, oppressive, unjust, and calculated to shield his persecutors from the consequences of their despotic conduct; that the petitioner therefore refused to accept his liberty upon any other than an unconditional discharge, and a full admission of the unnecessary violation of the laws which had taken place in his person; that the petitioner did receive such unconditional discharge on the 20th of this month, and after having been thus confined and ill-treated by his persecutors, is now discharged without trial, and thrown upon the world without means, at a distance of nearly two hundred miles from his home and family, without the least assistance to carry him thither, or to compensate in any way his losses and privations by such a wanton violation of the principles of justice, and the constitutional laws of the land; the petitioner therefore feels himself in duty called upon to lay his sufferings and his grievances before the house, and to call upon its honourable members for such redress as may become their regard for the liberty of the people, and the sanctity of the laws, both of which have been violated in the treatment experienced by the petitioner."

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS.] The Irish grand juries act suspension bill went through a committee. The report was brought up, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 2.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE MESSAGE

OF CONDOLENCE.] Lord St. Helens reported, that he and the Lord Arden had waited on her Majesty with their lordships' message of condolence on the melancholy event of the death of her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte of Tuesday last, and that her Majesty was pleased to receive the same very graciously.

PRINCE LEOPOLD'S ANSWER.] The Earl De Lawarr reported, that he and Lord Amherst had waited on his Serene Highness with the message of condolence on the melancholy event of the death of his Serene Highness's consort, her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte, and that his Serene Highness was pleased to return the following answer:

"My Lords,—I feel most sensibly the interest which the House of Lords have shewn in my affliction. I thank them for this instance of their attention, and receive their condolence with sincere and earnest satisfaction."

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.] Earl Grosvenor rose to inquire, whether any thing had been done in consequence of what passed on the first day of the session, on the subject of the appointment, by reversion, to the office of clerk of the parliaments. It was his intention to move for an account of all offices held in reversion.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that the committee to which the patent granting the reversion was to be referred, would have several objects submitted to its consideration, the investigation of which might occupy some time. It was, however, his intention, in the course of the present session, to propose, relative to the office of clerk of the parliaments, some legislative measures which would operate prospectively. To fulfil this intention, a bill would be necessary, which he should introduce.

The Earl of Lauderdale observed, that the object which his noble friend had in view was to render the office of clerk an efficient office. In that respect the motion had his approbation.

Earl Grosvenor wished an inquiry to be instituted into the nature of all offices which were granted in reversion, and would be glad to obtain an official account of their salaries and their duties. He did not know how far the noble lord meant his measure should extend, but he apprehended he did not intend to go the length of abolishing the office of clerk of the parliaments. Nothing more strikingly shewed the impropriety of granting offices in reversion than what had occurred with respect to that at present under consideration. He was persuaded, that the gentleman who lately held the office of clerk of the parliaments would never have asked the reversion for his son, could he have foreseen that that son would have filled the situation of ambassador to a foreign court at the time that the duties of his office as clerk of the parliaments required his presence in that house. It was his intention to propose the abolition of the practice of granting places in reversion, and that the abolition should be extended not only to grants from the crown, but to those made by the judges, and indeed to grants in reversion of every description connected with the public service or the institutions of the country. In the mean time he moved an address to the Prince Regent, praying that he would order to be laid before the house an account of all grants in reversion of offices held immediately from the crown, and also all grants in reversion of other public offices.

The Earl of Liverpool objected to the general nature of the motion. If the noble earl confined it to those offices held under the crown, he should be ready to agree to it.

The Lord Chancellor thought the noble earl might divide his motion, if he continued of opinion that he ought to call for information as to both species of offices. For his own part he had on a former occasion stated his sentiments to the house on this question, and he still continued of the same opinion as to the utility of the offices referred to in the latter part of the motion.

The Earl of Lauderdale could not see any necessity for his noble friend pressing his motion in its present shape, nor could he understand the motive of the noble earl opposite in rejecting it, as the information asked for was, in fact, already before the house. At all events, he thought it would not be necessary for his noble friend to adhere to his large motion, and, therefore, he recommended it to him to divide it.

The Lord Chancellor said, he should be very well pleased to see a statement of all grants in reversion laid before their lordships, and probably should himself shape a motion calculated to attain that object. His opinion with regard to offices granted by the judges, as he had already intimated, remained unaltered. Many offices formerly bestowed by the Chancellor were now in the gift of the crown; but with regard to the judges in the other courts, the power of giving those offices was necessary, as a part of their emoluments arose from those gifts. Were it not for this, the incomes of the judges would be totally inadequate to the laborious and important duties they had to perform. When the subject was last before the house, he had convinced their lordships of the utility of the offices in the gift of the judges, as well as of others of a similar nature; and he had no doubt that he should be equally successful when the question came again before them. He had, however, no objection to an account of all grants in reversion by the crown being laid before their lordships; and when it was produced, he should perhaps think it right to call for an account of all landed property, held in virtue of grants from the crown, previously to the act passed respecting those grants.

Earl Grosvenor said, that all that had occurred since the subject was last discussed had only tended to fortify him in his opinion, that nothing could be more injurious to the interests of the public than granting offices in reversion. In saying this he by no means meant to suggest, that he thought the noble and learned lord, or any of the judges, were overpaid for their services. What he objected to was, not the amount of their emoluments, but the mode in which they were obtained. With regard to the motion, he would consent to divide it, and to press, for the present only, the first part relative to grants from the crown.

The motion, thus altered, was put and agreed to.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] Lord Sidmouth presented a bag of papers, sealed up, which, he stated, he had it in command from the Prince Regent to lay before their lordships. They related to the state of the country, and the events that had happened since the second report of the committee of secrecy in the last session of parliament. It was his intention to have moved that night to refer these papers to a secret committee; but he was induced to postpone the execution of that intention, as two noble lords (the Marquis of Lansdowne and Lord Holland) who wished to be present, were prevented from attending by a melancholy occurrence (the death of the Earl of Upper Ossory.) He understood, however, that one of those noble lords (the Marquis of Lansdowne) might be expected to attend to-morrow. He would, therefore, on that day move for the appointment of a committee. In the mean time he moved, that the bag of papers remain in the custody of the clerk of the house, and that the lords be summoned for to-morrow.—Ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, Feb. 2.

The House met, and 40 members not being present at four o'clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, Feb. 3.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] The Earl of Lauderdale moved for a series of accounts relative to the state of the revenue and the public debt, all of which were ordered. His lordship then observed, that though he was aware business of much importance was expected, he must trouble their lordships with some motions connected with a question of the greatest importance to the interests of the country. The time was fast approaching when the subject of the resumption of cash-payments by the bank must come before them, and when that great question must be decided one way or another. He trusted that parliament would not consent to continue the restriction without a full inquiry into the circumstances of the case, which alone could enable them to come to a right decision on the whole of this question, upon which more than upon any other the welfare of the country depended. In the mean time he should merely move for the following accounts, viz. the bank-notes in circulation during the years 1815, 1816, and 1817; the highest and lowest amount of the notes in circulation at different periods, between the 1st of January 1816 and 1817, distinguishing the notes above and below five pounds; the market price of gold and silver bars, and Spanish dollars, and the course of exchange on Hamburgh, from the 1st of January 1815 to January 1818, both inclusive. Also, the number of stamps issued during the same period for promissory notes, distinguishing the different kinds.

Lord King was induced to inquire of the noble Secretary of State what was really intended with respect to the resumption of cash-payments; for very considerable alarm had been excited by what had been reported to have been stated on high authority in another place. The reason which had been given for the continuance of the restriction on the bank, would, perhaps, appear to many perfectly unintelligible: but he was the more inclined to regard it with alarm, as he was certain that the reason which had been assigned was merely the ostensible and not the real one. The reason which had been given was, certain financial operations in the money-market, particularly great loans negotiating for another country. Now this, he was assured, ought not, and could not, be the real cause of delay in the resumption of cash-payments. Were the scene of this story to be changed, and were a French minister to say, that the bank of France had ample funds to answer every demand, was ready to pay all its notes, but that some loans which were making in Germany rendered it necessary to postpone the day of payment—were this to be said in a French legislative assembly, how would the minister who ventured such a paltry excuse be derided and scoffed at? Their lordships must, however, now see the necessity of strict investigation. Every moment that the resumption of cash payments was delayed was fatal to the welfare of the country. Their lordships were not ignorant of the great embarrassment and loss which had been sustained by the depreciation of paper during the war. Great distress had been since occasioned by the measures which had been taken to bring it to par. A difference had again been produced, and hence it was thought necessary that the bank should continue to refuse payment of their notes. The uncertainty of the measures of government in this respect produced fluctuations, which were destructive of every kind of property, and attacked the interests of all classes. It must therefore be obvious that there could be no stability in money transactions unless the currency of the country was placed upon a solid foundation, and the bank resumed the wholesome practice of paying its notes in specie.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that he should not enter into any discussion of the topics on which the noble lord had touched. They were, it was true, questions which had given rise to much difference of opinion in that house and elsewhere, and he was also aware that there still existed great difference of sentiment as to the policy of the financial measures pursued in the course of the last war. He was not, however, called upon to vindicate that policy at present. With regard to the particular measure to which the noble lord's inquiry was directed, he had uniformly held, and still did hold, that it was both the interest of this country and of the bank, that cash-payments should be resumed as speedily as possible. In stating that he had always felt the force of this principle, he must also express an equal conviction, that the particular moment when the bank ought to resume the regular course of payment was a consideration of the greatest delicacy and importance. Whatever might have been stated during the war as to the resumption of payments on the return of peace, still the question as to the precise period for the adoption of that measure was always understood to be left to the decision of parliament on a full consideration of the circumstances which might exist at the time. Having said thus much he should only add, that he had ground for believing, and indeed knowing, that the bank had made every necessary preparation for answering the demands which might arise by the expiration of the restriction bill, and he saw nothing, either in the domestic situation of the country, or in the relations of our foreign policy, that was calculated to produce any undue delay in the resumption of cash-payments. It was possible, however, that there might be circumstances in existing pecuniary arrangements of foreign powers which would render it advisable for parliament to consider whether the act ought not to remain in force as long as these circumstances, which were not likely to recur again, continued to operate. If any supposition was entertained of the delay being occasioned by financial transactions between the government and the bank, he could assure their lordships it was perfectly groundless.

Lord King observed, that the measure had this relation to the financial transactions of government—that if the restriction act were allowed to take its course, the bank would be no longer able to take up the immense quantity of exchequer-bills brought into the market.

The Earl of Lauderdale remarked that the noble Secretary had stated, that the particular period for the resumption of cash-payments was a question of expediency which required great consideration. Now, only two years ago, the noble Secretary had treated with great derision all those who ventured to doubt that the bank would pay in cash within two years from that time. For his part, he had never expected that the bank would pay in cash at the period promised, nor could such an expectation be entertained by any one who fairly considered the nature of the connexion between the bank and the government. The noble Secretary of State had declared, that notwithstanding the intended delay, there was nothing in the situation of the country that need prevent the restriction act from being allowed to expire, and that the bank was perfectly prepared to pay its notes in cash at the time fixed by the act of parliament. He knew not on what information the noble earl had founded his opinion as to this ability of the bank. He derived it, perhaps, from some of the directors, but there might be different opinions among them. But though the bank had made ample preparation, the noble Secretary hinted, that still there might be something in the relations subsisting among foreign powers which ought to retard the resumption of cash-payments: but what that something was, he had not chosen to explain. From what he had said, however, this much appeared—that this most important of all measures to the welfare and prosperity of the country no longer depended upon the decision of the British parliament on what might be done by the government of France, or of any other foreign country. The noble Secretary had observed that such a circumstance was not likely to recur; but what security could be found for this assurance? Could the noble lord pledge himself that the governments of Russia or Prussia might not choose to negotiate a loan as soon as the effect of the present one making for France might cease to operate? Would not a loan for any of these powers be as good a reason for postponing the day of paying in cash, as that negotiated for France? Let the case be reversed, and suppose a French minister were to say to any assembly in that country, that the bank of France could not be allowed to pay, because a small loan was negotiating by this country, would he not be laughed at for giving such a reason? In fact, the cause of delay assigned by the noble earl was of so extraordinary a nature, that it called for the most serious consideration of their lordships. A full and complete investigation was necessary. It appeared to him, that the proper course would be to examine the bank directors, and indeed he thought that nothing short of an inquiry of that kind could satisfy parliament and the country. In the mean time he could not help observing, that if the noble earl and his colleagues persisted in proceeding in their present course, without any efficient investigation, they would expose themselves to a more serious responsibility than any ministers had ever ventured to encounter; for they now placed the country in this situation—that the resumption of cash-payments was no longer to depend on the wisdom of parliament, but on measures which any continental despot or foreign assembly might choose to adopt. Nothing could be more alarming to the landed interest, and indeed to all classes in the country.

The motions were then agreed to.

ed their lordships, that he yesterday intimated his intention of proposing that the papers on the state of the country, which he had laid on the table by the command of the Prince Regent, should be submitted to the consideration of a committee chosen by their lordships. He accordingly now moved that the papers be referred to a secret committee.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he would not occupy much of their lordships' time; but when he considered what had been the nature of the early proceedings on the subject to which the papers proposed to be referred to a committee related, he thought it necessary to call the attention of the house to the course now proposed by the noble Secretary of State. The papers which he had laid on the table must have one of two objects—either it was meant to found on them some prospective measures, which, however, he hoped could not be the case; or else it was intended to make them serve to the house and the country as a justification of the past. If either of these objects were in view, or both of them, it was equally important that their lordships should have the opportunity, not only of examining the papers, but of investigating every circumstance connected with them, which might be necessary to elicit the truth. The mode of selecting the individuals to whom the papers were to be submitted was, therefore, a question of great importance: for it was most essential with a view to any measure that might be adopted, that the investigation should be full and complete. That was the only inquiry which could be satisfactory either to the house or the people. It was, therefore, an important question for their lordships, whether in choosing a committee, it ought not to be one so constituted as to ensure a full investigation of all the parts of the subject submitted to their consideration, and thereby to lay a foundation for measures which could not fail to be satisfactory. For this reason he submitted to the noble viscount, whether he ought not to state to the house the grounds which had induced him to propose the course of secret investigation which his motion implied.

Lord Sidmouth said, that in 1801 a committee of secrecy had been appointed in consequence of a message from the House of Commons, but that was not the mode they were called on to follow now, nor was it necessary by the practice of the house in that case more than when a communication was received from the Throne. The first communication last year was no more than a message, which, when sent, did not presume to state what the proceedings of the committee of secrecy were to be, but merely laid papers before the house to be submitted to their consideration. That was the course of proceeding which he called on their lordships to pursue at present; that was all the appeal he made to them. But in answer to the noble marquis, he had no hesitation to say, that the object of the papers laid before them was to put their lordships in possession of facts which tended to shew what had been the state of the country since the last report of the committee of secrecy, and the manner in which the discretionary powers vested in ministers had in the mean time been exercised. As to the larger powers which the noble marquis had desired for the committee, there was no power vested in a committee of that house, as in a committee of the House of Commons, to call for papers, persons, and records; if the committee wanted further information, they might, through their chairman, make a motion for the attendance of witnesses: but the course he had now proposed, was that which had always been followed by committees of that house.

The Earl of Carnarvon observed, that after the house had been told from the Throne that the country was in a state of perfect tranquillity, they could not be acting on the spur of any necessity, or feel the influence of alarm; there was, therefore, full time for deliberation. But if it was to be the province of the future committee to inquire how ministers had exercised the high discretionary powers that had been vested in them, the house must not delude itself or the country, by consenting to go into that inquiry upon such information as should be furnished by ministers themselves: the committee should have power to call for other evidence, and examine other facts. He would not then make many observations on the two reports of last session, but he entreated their lordships to compare those reports with the judicial proceedings that had followed them, and then to see whether they would still be so enamoured of secret committees as to be satisfied from similar documents to produce a similar report: he entreated them to consider whether such a report, grounded on such evidence, would be more than a solemn mockery, from which no benefit whatever could result to the country at large. The noble lord had referred to the precedent of 1801; that precedent led to a bill of indemnity for all the acts of power exercised by ministers; but after all we had seen and heard, after all ministers had pledged themselves to prove, and the number of verdicts they had subsequently recovered;* (hear, hear) after it had been repeatedly stated that there was but too great reason to believe that the servants of government had themselves excited the disturbances that had occurred, he thought they ought to be well satisfied, whether all the acts of insurrection proved, and there were none proved but at Derby, were not attributable to the very agents employed by ministers. If their lordships should be content, on a secret inquiry, completely to indemnify ministers for all that had passed, and by that means preclude all those who had been injured in fortune, health, and character, who had languished in dungeons, or groaned beneath the weight of fetters, from any hope of retrieving their losses, or establishing their character—if their lordships should be satisfied to give such an indemnity as should exclude these victims of power from all redress of their wrongs—if their lordships should act thus, they would not do their duty to themselves or to their country. He would enter into the subject no further at that time; the question would be more fully discussed in the proceedings on the committee: but he must enter his caveat against instituting an inquiry on the conduct of ministers upon any mere shewing of their own, and making them at once their own accusers, witnessses, and judges. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Liverpool contended, that the simple question for the consideration of the house was, whether they would appoint a committee to examine the information laid before them, and follow the invariable usage on such occasions. He was aware that, in some instances, proceedings of this nature had originated in a message from the House of Commons, and, at other times, not; for it was optional in the crown to pursue which course it chose. But in all cases where the crown had made communications on the state of affairs, whether foreign or domestic, whenever that communication had been secret, it was usual to institute a secret committee to enter into the inquiry. The proceedings of that house were of a nature peculiar to itself, and the course pursued in them applied to all cases of proceedings on inquiries. Even where those proceedings were public, no power was delegated to committees of that house to call for witnesses, papers, or records, but they were compelled to come to the house, and through their chairman, to name the witnesses and papers they required, and then move for their production. This was the rule and invariable practice of the house. Under those circumstances, he did not think that the house could have any doubt as to the course it ought to pursue. That was not the time to discuss the merits of the two reports, or the measures that had arisen out of them, or the nature of the report which the present committee might make, or whether any or what measures should follow it. He should only say, that if the noble lord opposite thought him ready to admit, from the result of the trials that had taken place, that any facts in those reports had been contradicted, he was so far from making such admission, that he thought the result of the trials strongly confirmed all that had been laid before the committee. Not only had fifty true bills for treason been found by the grand jury, but thirty-six individuals had been convicted, or had admitted their guilt. He would not now discuss any further the reports of last year, but those reports had been, in that house at least, the result of unanimous opinion on the part of the committee, and, in the other house, the committee was also unanimous on the report, though there was a difference of opinion as to the measures that ought to be pursued in consequence. Not to prolong the discussion, he would repeat, that their lordships had had laid before them important information on the state of the country since the period of the last report up to the present time; and the question was, whether the house would refer the papers to a committee in the ordinary course? It would be open to that committee to determine how it should act on this information; it would be open to the house whether it should act on the representation of the committee, and it might then consider whether any further measures should be pursued.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, in explanation, stated, that he had made no objection to the motion, but had merely put it, whether, under all circumstances, it would not be more advisable to give the inquiry a more extended form. If, by the result of their lordships' determination, a door should not be open to information from all quarters, and to the interests of all parties, the inquiry would probably be not satisfactory to the house, and certainly not to the country.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, he had not asserted that the trials for high treason had falsified the reports of last year, but that they had not borne them out; and if the committee were to make out a case on such documents as ministers only should lay before it, the result could be no other than a report such as ministers might send forth without any committee at all.

The motion was then agreed to for referring the papers to a committee of secrecy, to consist of eleven lords, to be chosen by ballot. The ballot to take place at five o'clock on Thursday, to which day the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, Feb. 3.

CONVICTS IN NEWGATE.] Mr. Brown, the keeper of Newgate, presented an account of the number of persons under sentence of death in that prison, pursuant to the order of the 31st of Jan. (See the Appendix.)

DROPPED ORDERS.] Mr. Speaker addressed the house on the subject of the dropped orders and notices of yesterday. He wished them to consider the expediency of disposing of those orders and notices for future days, before they proceeded to the orders and notices of this day.

Mr. Wynn said, that the whole doctrine of notices was founded on nothing like right; but a custom had grown up of late years, which had acquired a degree of authority, that when a notice was given for a particular day, it should have precedence on that day. As to dropped notices, he always understood the practice to be, that a member who had given notice for the day, should have precedence over those which had been dropped.

The Speaker observed, that what he desired was, to collect the sentiments and wishes of the house. In former times, a notice for a particular day certainly had precedence on that day. Perhaps, if that were the rule, it might be better to adhere to it.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Lord Castlereagh rose to call the attention of the house to a subject of which all must feel the importance. There could be but one opinion as to the usefulness and the merits of the committee on finance last session. Their activity and fidelity in the execution of their duties were exemplary. The general view and scope of their inquiries into the state and management of public affairs were conducted in the true spirit of their parliamentary instructions. They had presented six laborious and indefatigable reports. The chief object was to investigate the public business, and the affairs of the country, so as to see what offices in the different departments of public importance could be reduced or abolished.— They had gone through the departments of the army, the navy, and the ordnance; they had made clear, and perspicuous, and just reports, mixed with observations of a useful nature, which would be found very beneficial in the future considerations of Parliament. His present intention was, merely to propose what he conceived to be the duty of government; he did not wish to go into the subject in detail, but merely to make an outline. If the committee should be again appointed, he should be prepared to shew that government had done every thing that was intended, or generally supposed that it would or could perform.— He had told the house originally, that he did not think that the labours of the committee could be brought to a close in one session, for it was probable that two or three sessions might be requisite for going through such inquiries fully, as to the public income and expenditure. The consideration was one of great extent and magnitude. Doubts had been expressed respecting the intentions of government, and an hon. friend of his, the member for Bramber, (Mr. Wilberforce), had seemed to think that government might do little in the mean time; but he could say, that in the mean time government had done a great deal, and anticipated much of the expected benefit. Many things yet remained to be considered; but the labours of the committee had reduced the question into a narrower compass. The situation of affairs in Ireland was not weakened, but, on the contrary, he believed that the internal tranquillity of that portion of the empire was improved. He had reason to think and to trust, that the charity and benevolence of the opulent and higher classes of society in Ireland, had tended to draw together more closely, and better to unite, all the social attachments. These benefits and reliefs from the higher to the poorer had been afforded without being compelled by law. He did not wish to occupy the time of the house any longer, and should therefore conclude by moving, "that a select committee be appointed to inquire into and state the income and expenditure of the United Kingdom, for the year ending the 5th of Jan. 1818; and also to consider and state the probable income and expenditure, so far as the same can now be estimated, for the years ending the 5th of Jan. 1819 and the 5th of Jan. 1820 respectively, and to report the same, together with their observations thereupon, to the house: and also to consider what further measures may be adopted for the relief of the country from any part of the said expenditure, without detriment to the public interests."—This motion being agreed to,

Lord Castlereagh moved that the committee consist of the following twenty-one members:—

Lord V. Castlereagh	Mr. Peel
Mr. Nicolson Calvert	Lord Viscount Clive
Mr. Bankes	Mr. Hart Davies
Mr. Davies Gilbert	Mr. Gooch
Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer	Sir George Clerk
	Sir Thomas Acland
Mr. Cartwright	Mr. Frankland Lewis
The Lord Binning	Mr. Robert Smith
Mr. Holford	Mr. Huskisson
Mr. Bootle Wilbraham	Mr. Calcraft
Mr. Littleton	Mr. Tremayne.

These names being read,

Mr. Bankes observed, that a right hon. gentleman, of great knowledge in matters of finance, (Mr. Tierney) was appointed on the committee of last year, but his name was afterwards struck off the list, at his own request, as he could not attend from indisposition. (See Vol. I. p. 457.) The health of that right hon. gentleman was now re-established, and, therefore, it might be expedient that he should be placed on the committee.

Mr. Tierney said, that though he was somewhat recovered, his health was not such as he might desire: he was still in too weak a state to attend to business in the morning, and in the evening also. He begged, therefore, to be excused from serving on the committee.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the manner in which the committee had proceeded was, to invite the attendance of any member of the house, who had peculiar information in any particular branch of public business. This was the case with the heads of the official departments, and he did not think a better course could be pursued this session. He should be unwilling to make any alteration in the names of the committee, as most of them were intimately acquainted with the former part of the investigation; but the occasional assistance of any other member might be obtained.

The motion was then agreed to, and the committee were empowered to send for persons, papers, and records: seven to be the quorum; to report observations from time to time, and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] Mr. Grenfell rose and said, that he would not affect any surprise at what had lately been announced to the house by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the subject of renewing the bank restriction act— for it was nothing more, than he had, himself, always expected from the right hon. gentleman.

But it was fit to call the recollection of the house to the hopes and expectations which had been held out, as to the termination of the bank restrictions, that they might see how, of late years, they and the public had been deluded on that subject. It was fit to recollect the promises held out, not only by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but by other members of administration; and particularly by a right hon. gentleman at the head of the department of the land revenue, who had looked to July next as the period which it was probable to rely upon for the ceasing of the restrictions. Expectations on this point had been given with considerable confidence and boldness. These fair promises were accompanied by the assurances of gentlemen connected with the Bank of England, who had expressed the readiness and willingness of the bank to renew cash payments, and their wish only to have permission to do so. He would not express any doubt as to the sincerity of such declarations on the part of the directors of the bank. He had heard, within a few days, that such was the opinion of a gentleman, a director, but not a member of that house (Mr. Harman). He was disposed to give every proper degree of credit to such opinions. But might not the bank, under such circumstances, say to government, "relieve us from the restrictions." From 1797, the situation of the bank was altered, and was in a state completely anomalous, when compared with other public bodies. What was ruin to others was wealth to the bank. There was, in fact, a stoppage of payment for 21 years. What would have destroyed other establishments, had been prosperity to the bank. Some of the directors had stated, that the restrictions had originated with government, and were entirely measures of state policy, and for the benefit of government and the community. It was a curious subject to look back at the effects produced by the change of system. The restrictive system had been resorted to eight times. The reasons for restriction were founded, first, on the nature and character of the war with revolutionary France; then on the war waged by Buonaparté against the finances of this country; and then, on the high price of bullion. Thus had they gone on, under different pretexts; but the pretexts became flimsy, indeed, if it were attempted to continue the restrictions on account of certain supposed foreign loans in negotiation in this country, through Mr. Rothschild or other gentlemen. It was possible, indeed, that if cash-payments were renewed, not a shilling would go for foreign loans. He was adverse to the principle of restrictions in any of the branches of trade, as well as in that of money. Neither did he desire to prevent the investment of money in foreign securities. He wished the trade in money to be free and unshackled, which could not be the case while the bank restrictions remained; yet in every view of the subject, he should prefer cash-payments to foreign loans. He considered an extensive paper currency as of incalculable advantage to the country, and in this view he thought country banks founded upon solid principles, and all other modes by which an extension could be given to that circulation, ought to be fostered and encouraged; but in order to render that currency permanent and safe, it appeared to him indispensable that it should be founded upon, and referable to, some fixed definite standard, and gold and silver appeared to him to be the best, if not the only standard, hitherto discovered by mankind, adapted for that purpose. If he were wrong in his ideas, he had the consolation of being erroneous with all the great writers and thinkers on the subject, from Mr. Locke to Mr. Adam Smith, and the late Lord Liverpool. He would trouble the House no longer than to move for the following accounts:—

1. "Of the total weekly amounts of bank notes and bank post bills in circulation from the 1st of Jan. 1817 to the 3d of Feb. 1818; distinguishing the bank post bills, and distinguishing the amount of notes under the value of five pounds, and stating the aggregate amount of the whole."

2. "Of the amount of bank notes in circulation on the 7th and 12th of each month, from Jan. 1817 to Jan. 1818, both inclusive; distinguishing the bank post bills, and the amount of notes under five pounds, and stating the aggregate amount of the whole."

3. "Of the highest and lowest aggregate amount of bank notes, including those of every kind, at any one time in circulation, from the 1st of Jan. 1817 to the 3d of Feb. 1818, both days inclusive; specifying the date of every such amount, and distinguishing the amount of bank post bills, and that of notes above or below the value of five pounds, of which it is composed; also an account of the highest and lowest amount of each separate kind of notes, at any one time in circulation for the same period, specifying and distinguishing as before."

4. "Of the weekly amount of bank notes in circulation of the value of five pounds and less, from the 1st of Jan. 1817 to the 3d of Feb. 1818, both inclusive; distinguishing the amount of notes of 5*l.* and of 2*l.* and of 1*l.*"

5. "Of the market prices of standard gold in bars, Portugal gold in coin, standard silver in bars, and Spanish dollars, or pillar pieces of eight, with the course of exchange with Hamburgh, Lisbon and Paris, from the first of Jan. 1817 to the 3d of Feb. 1818."

6. "Of the balances of cash in the hands of the Bank of England on the 1st and 15th days of each month, between the 1st of Jan. and 15th of Dec. 1817 inclusive, resulting from payments under the head of customs, and of all other branches of the public revenue, stating the average balances of the year, made up from the said days."

7. "Of the balances of cash in the hands of the Bank of England on the 1st and 15th days of each month, between the 1st of Jan. and the 15th of Dec. 1817 inclusive, resulting from the post-master-general's account with the bank, stating the average balance of the year, made up from the said days."

8. "Of the balance of cash in the hands of the Bank of England on the 1st and 15th days of each month, between the 1st of Jan. and the 15th of Dec. 1817 inclusive, belonging to the different departments of the government, including the balances of the accountant-general of the Court of Chancery, and stating the average balance of the year, made up from the said days."

9. "Of all public balances not particularly specified in the three preceding accounts with the Bank of England, on the 1st of Jan. 1818; distinguishing the amount under each head respectively, and stating the aggregate amount of the whole."

10. "Of the total amount of unclaimed dividends, including lottery prizes, in the hands of the bank on the 1st and 15th days of every month in the year 1817 inclusive; distinguishing the unclaimed dividends from lottery prizes, and stating the average balances of both in the year, made up from the said days."

11. "Of the Exchequer bills and bank notes deposited by the governor and company of the Bank of England, as cash in the chests of the four tellers of his Majesty's Receipt of Exchequer, on the 10th of Jan. 1817, and on every 28th day subsequent to that period, down to the 1st of Jan. 1818; distinguishing the amount of all such Bank of England notes as exceeded in value one thousand pounds each, known at the Exchequer under the title of special notes, and stating the average balances of the year, made up from the said days."

12. "Of all allowances made by the public to the bank, or charged by the bank against the public, exclusive of the charge for the management of the public debt, for transacting any public service in the year 1817; describing the nature of those services, and the amount charged thereon in the said year, and including the sum of 5,898*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.* paid to the bank under the denomination of charges of management."

13. "Of the advances made by the Bank of England to Government, on land and malt Exchequer bills and other securities, on the 10th of Oct. 1817, and on the 5th of Jan. 1818; distinguishing the various heads under which such advances have been made."

14. "Of the bank notes in circulation on Saturday nights in each week, from the 1st of Jan. 1817 to the 3d of Feb. 1818; distinguishing the bank post bills, and distinguishing the amount of notes under the value of five pounds, and stating the aggregate amount of the whole."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was not then his intention to enter upon the subject at length: but to reserve himself for such opportunities as should thereafter arise. He had on a former night alluded to the restriction as a measure merely probable. If, however, it should turn out that recourse to this measure should be found necessary, he should then take the opportunity of giving his opinion more in detail.

The motion that the several documents respecting the bank be produced, was then put and carried.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] Lord Castlereagh, by command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, presented a bag of secret papers, sealed up, containing information respecting the internal state of the kingdom. It was ordered to be kept in the custody of the clerk of the house.

PROPERTY TAX.] Mr. Brougham rose to inquire whether the right hon. gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), was now prepared to answer a question put by him on Saturday night, whether all the papers connected with the property-tax had been destroyed?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that distinct and positive orders had been given some time ago, that the papers alluded to should be destroyed, and he had no reason to think that those orders had not been obeyed.

Mr. Brougham said, he understood that copies of those papers had been taken, and as those copies were as dangerous as the originals, he wished to be informed if they too had been destroyed?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that all those papers, whether originals or copies, had been ordered to be destroyed.

EX-OFFICIO INFORMATIONS.—MR. HONE.] Mr. William Smith moved, "that there be laid before this house, an account of the sum received at the crown office from Mr. Hone, for the copies of the informations filed against him by the Attorney-General, with the authority on which the same was demanded, and the use to which the same was applied." At the same time he thought it proper to mention, that the case of Mr. Hone was rather the incidental occasion than the reason of this motion. He had for more than 20 years been of the same opinion respecting the expediency of reform on this subject; and he now took shame to himself that he had been so remiss in bringing it under discussion. Had the question been repeatedly agitated, it was impossible that some amelioration should not have taken place. In considering the recent prosecutions instituted against Mr. Hone, he could not help admiring the intrepidity, sagacity, and skill, with which he had conducted his own defence. He had since had an opportunity of conversing with him in private, and he must declare, that he discovered nothing that could tend to give him an unfavourable impression of his character, nothing unbecoming the manners of a gentleman. As for the parodies published by Mr. Hone, his opinion perfectly coincided with that of the public in general, that they were highly censurable; and it was not the least honourable part of Mr. Hone's conduct, that immediately on finding that such was the public impression respecting them, he used every means to prevent the circulation. But those parodies, however censurable, were not a fit subject to be animadverted on in a court of justice. It appeared to him, that the free operation of public opinion was the only adequate and proper check to their popularity.—The hon. member said, he had little more to trouble them with on the subject, and disclaimed any intention of complaining of any party. He had the authority of Mr. Hone to state, that the conduct of the Attorney-General towards him was that of a man of urbanity, politeness, and justice. If any blame could attach to the conduct of that gentleman, Mr. Hone conceived it was in not including the three informations in one; in every other respect he had shewn himself a gentleman and a man of humanity. It was of the law itself, as it at present stood, that he had to complain. From the officers of the crown he had received every attention. Neither did he (Mr. S.) mean to reflect on the conduct of the learned lord on the bench, (Lord Ellenborough), in refusing to furnish copies, as he found that, according to law, he could not have acted otherwise. It was in the law itself, therefore, that reformation was required, and this motion appeared to him to be the proper parliamentary mode of bringing the subject under their notice.

The Attorney-General observed, that with respect to the fees exacted at the crown-office, there was no cause of complaint peculiar to this case, as no fees had been required from Mr. Hone but such as would be required from any other defendant. It was, therefore, to the shape in which the motion was brought forward that he objected, inasmuch as it seemed to imply that Mr. Hone had been exposed to hardships peculiar to himself. Had the motion been directed to ascertain the fees required from defendants in general in the crown-office, he could not object to such a motion when brought forward on general principles. In the present case, however, it appeared that such a motion would be unnecessary, as it was in the power of any of them to satisfy themselves on this subject, by referring to the records of Parliament. From these it would appear, that since the year 1693 those fees had ever continued the same as now. In the case of Mr. Hone, there was no innovation upon this immemorial law and practice; and on this ground, therefore, the present motion was unnecessary.

Sir F. Burdett said, that if the doctrine advanced by the learned gentleman were to regulate the proceedings of the house, they would have very little business to go through. Every member knows perfectly well the subject on which he moves for papers previously to their production, but he calls for their production in order to lay a clear and distinct foundation for ulterior steps. (Hear, hear.) In all matters of complaint or reform it was, if not in itself necessary, at least always required, that official authority be produced to prove their existence. But the great grievance in the case now before them, was the absolute refusal of justice to the poor, by means of the enormous expense imposed on its administration. (Hear, hear.) He should like to know of what avail the best political and legal institutions could be, if they were thus rendered inaccessible. The great grievance therefore was, that the insatiable thirst of taxation had made the administration of justice a cruel insult and mockery to the people. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member proposed to bring forward some legislative remedy for this grievance. The reason on which he wished to found this measure was no reason, according to the Attorney-General, because it was perfectly notorious to the whole world! The grievance was indeed notorious, and therefore the motion was not only reasonable but necessary.

Mr. Speaker here read the motion, and the Attorney-General moved the previous question.

Mr. W. Smith thought the mode of opposition now adopted the most singular he had ever known. If his motion was improper, let its impropriety be stated, and let it be rejected. (Hear.) But the objection was, that he had connected his motion with Mr. Hone, and not brought it forward in an abstract shape. He could give a clear, short, and specific answer. Mr. Hone's case was rather the occasion than the reason of bringing forward his motion; but it was so, because it was the most striking case of this intolerable exaction that had occurred in his recollection. Mr. Hone informed him, that he was obliged, in order to obtain information, accurate information of the crime laid to his charge, so as to be prepared to defend himself in a court of justice, to pay the sum of 9*l.* To obtain this sum, he was obliged to sell, at a great loss, part of his property. To many in that house, to all of them, indeed, this sum must appear very trifling. But to a poor man, to whom the expenditure of a shilling was matter of painful calculation, it was a heavy exaction. The accusation itself was very unjust, and this was a great aggravation of the injury. He founded his motion on the case of Mr. Hone, because he had been obliged to sell property greatly under value; the independence of his spirit not suffering him to apply to his friends for the money exacted from him. If the information were given in consequence of an abstract motion, it would not be the information wanted. It would let them know how much was charged per sheet, but it would not shew how many sheets a poor man must pay for, in order to meet an unjust accusation. If the Attorney-General should move an amendment that would in any other way procure this information, instead of moving the previous question, he would willingly adopt it. He took the present mode of introducing the subject, because he thought it the most formal, the most authentic, and the most parliamentary mode; but if he failed in his present motion, he would introduce the subject in a less formal, authentic, and parliamentary mode, by moving at once the reform of the abuses alluded to.

Lord Castlereagh felt himself bound to give his negative to the motion, because its professed object was different from the real one. The professed object was to lay a foundation for some legislative remedy as to fees paid in the crown-office. This object would be effected by a general motion on the subject. The information thus obtained would by the rule-of-three at once shew the charges in any particular case. But the real object was to give the public an exaggerated view of the question, by connecting it with Mr. Hone. The trial of Mr. Hone having taken place, and the Attorney-General having displayed all the qualities which belonged to him in the discharge of his duty, he would say nothing now on the subject; but he must give his negative to the motion for the reason which he had assigned.

Mr. Brougham defended the mode adopted by the hon. member for Norwich. His object was merely to obtain a foundation for a legislative proceeding. He said, in effect, "Give me certain documents, and I will shew you the foundation of such a measure." "No," said the noble lord, "but we will tell you that so much is charged per sheet." After such information should be laid before them, they would remain quite ignorant of the sum paid by each individual. The knowledge of this could not be obtained but by such a motion as was stated by his hon. friend. Let the amount paid in the case of Mr. Hone be given, and, if they chose, in the case of five or six others, in order to avoid attaching the question to any particular case, and they would then have a proper foundation for further proceedings.

Mr. B. Bathurst contended that if the general expenses were given, the hon. gentleman could ascertain the expense in any given instance. He would beg leave to tell the hon. gentleman, that although Mr. Hone could not get copies of the informations against him, he had a right to go to the crown-office, and to read them there as often and as leisurely as he pleased. So much for that point of complaint. The second point to which he would advert was, that the particular object of the motion was, not to bring the question of general reform, on this point of law, before the house, but to bring this particular case of Mr. Hone before them. This was a reason for which he would oppose the motion. He would say nothing of the trial. All allowed that the parodies were improper. The expenses in law processes were very great, but the unfortunate state of the country made them necessary. But Mr. Hone's expenses were trifling compared to the expenses of suits in Chancery. The hon. gentleman had told them the amount of fees paid by Mr. Hone, but he had not told them what profit he made by those publications. This information was withheld, although the profit must have been great, since the publications extended to all parts of the country. He was sorry that, since he was acquitted, he had been subjected to expense. But as he had been confessedly guilty of a moral, if not of a legal offence, there was no reason for making his particular case the ground of the motion. If the motion were for the production of charges for any given period, however short, he should make no objection to it. The rate of fees might, however, be ascertained from the report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the fees paid in courts of justice.

Lord Folkestone thought a particular instance of grievance the best foundation for a general remedy. When any complaint came from his side of the house, they were generally called upon to give a particular case. He was therefore surprised to hear those on the other side now object to a motion merely because it was founded on a particular case. He had, however, no objection, indeed he wished that twenty or thirty cases should be stated, as that would form a better foundation. But the only reason of his rising to say any thing on the subject was, the assertion of the right hon. gentleman, that Mr. Hone had a right to go into the crown-office, and to read the informations against him. This, truly, was a very valuable right to Mr. Hone, confined as he was at that time in the King's-Bench prison. By an act of parliament introduced by Sir Vicary Gibbs, the present Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, when he was Attorney-General, the Attorney-General was entitled to call upon any man to find bail, and failing to do so, to commit him to prison. Mr. Hone was, according to this act, called upon to find bail; he did not, indeed he would not, find bail, and he was in consequence committed to the King's-Bench by order of the court, and on the motion of the Attorney-General. How could he in this situation walk into the Crown-office to read the informations against him? Besides, even if he could go into the Crown-office, could a man, by the cursory perusal he could give the information there, prepare himself for his defence? (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Smith said he had no objection to withdraw his motion, if the right hon. gentleman would bring forward a general one to the same purpose.

The Speaker ordered strangers to withdraw, supposing the house would divide upon the motion.

Mr. B. Bathurst said, he could have no objection to a general motion on the subject.

Mr. W. Smith then withdrew his motion, and gave notice that he would move again on the subject to-morrow.

THE PRINCE REGENT'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.] Lord George Beresford reported the Prince Regent's answer to the address on the Lords Commissioners speech, as follows:—" I thank the House of Commons for their loya and dutiful address.—Their affectionate condolence on the heavy domestic calamity which has recently befallen me, is highly consoling to my feelings; and I thank them for the cordial assurances which they have afforded me of their attachment and support."

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND.)] Lord Binning moved for leave to bring in a bill for establishing district asylums for lunatics in Scotland. He proposed merely to have the bill introduced, and ordered to be printed. It might thus be subjected to examination till after Easter.

Lord A. Hamilton said, two-thirds of the people of Scotland had disapproved of the noble lord's former bill on this subject. He was connected with a part of the country where a lunatic asylum had been lately erected, which he considered a model for such buildings. He hoped this bill would be subjected to the same examination in Scotland as the former bill.

Sir R. Fergusson said, he had several objections to the measure, but he should reserve them for a future opportunity.

Lord Binning admitted that objections to the former bill were very generally entertained in Scotland. His object in delaying any proceedings till after Easter, was to give the people of Scotland time to examine the bill, and to consider the very material changes he had made in the measure. He proposed to enact, that Scotland should be divided into four districts; that an asylum for the reception and care of fatuous and furious or insane persons should be erected in each; and that in each county or stewartry, commissioners should be elected, who should name one or more person or persons to be a general commissioner; which persons so named, together with two persons to be named by his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the home department, should be general commissioners for carrying the act into execution.

Mr. Wynn took that opportunity of expressing his astonishment that any man could be able to read the horrors disclosed by the commissioners, who had some years ago reported on the state of lunatic institutions in England, without attempting to obtain some remedy of the evil. For three years the subject had been before them, and hitherto nothing was done. A bill had been brought forward every session, but it was regularly allowed to sleep till the end of it. If no other person undertook this matter, he would himself, however inadequate, introduce a bill on the subject.

Lord Binning added, that formerly parochial assessments had been objected to; for these, county assessments were now substituted.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition of certain inhabitants of Liverpool, praying "that the house would take an early opportunity of restoring to our beloved country, the indispensable right of fair representation."—Ordered to lie on the table.

PRESERVATION OF THE PEACE (IRELAND.)] Sir H. Parnell presented the following petition of the High Sheriff and Grand Jury of the Queen's County, assembled at summer assizes in 1817. "That the petitioners have anxiously expected that among the various measures which have been proposed to parliament for the better preservation of the peace in Ireland, and the due execution of the laws, the general state of the civil power, as provided by several statutes, would have been fully examined and revised, with the view of rendering it adequate to the administration of the law, without the necessity which has hitherto existed, and still exists, to have frequent recourse to a military force even in the most trivial cases; that the want of such an efficient power leads in the first instance to that impunity with which every species of crime is universally committed, and to those revengeful habits of injuring and destroying all persons who come forward in endeavouring to assist in the administration of the laws, and finally to those systematic confederacies to extend secret associations, which produce disturbances formidable to the existence of all government, and which occasion the necessity of very severe laws and a large and expensive military establishment; and that it is impossible for the magistracy, with the assistance which the law now affords them, to administer the laws by the aid only of the civil power." They prayed, therefore, that the house would adopt such measures as may be necessary to reform the civil police of Ireland, and to increase its authority in such a manner, as to put an end to the system which now prevails very generally, of disobedience to the laws on the part of the people, or of the administration of them by means which are extremely inconvenient and embarrassing to the magistrates, and at variance with the best principles of the constitution.

Mr. Peel took this opportunity to say that the military were never more seldom recurred to than during the last two or three years. The establishment of constables was twofold: there were some appointed by the executive in counties where any extraordinary disturbance took place; the rest were appointed in each county by the grand jury, who settled their salaries, and could remove them at pleasure. If those constables were inefficient in the Queen's county, it was the fault of the very grand jury who sent this petition.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, that the lord lieutenant had lately been enabled, by an act of Parliament, to appropriate money from the treasury to the establishment of constables. The people had previously been grateful, but, in consequence of that appropriation, they had become much more grateful.

The petition was read and ordered to lie on the table.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] On the motion of Mr. Arbuthnot, an account was ordered "of all exchequer bills issued by virtue of the act 56 Geo. II. c. 14. intituled 'an act for empowering the governor and company of the Bank of England to advance the sum of six millions towards the supply for the service of the year 1816,' outstanding and unprovided for."—The account was brought up, by which it appeared that bills had been issued for the sum of "six millions."

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the resolution "that a supply be granted to his Majesty," which was agreed to, nemine contradicente.—The committee was then appointed for to-morrow.

ESTIMATES.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved an address for the following estimates and account:—

1. "An estimate of the ordinary of the navy for the year 1818, with an estimate of half-pay of officers of the navy, and such of the officers of the royal marines as were employed in the last war."

2. "Of the charge of what may be necessary for the buildings, rebuildings, and repairs of ships of war in his Majesty's yards, and other extra works over and above what are proposed to be done upon the heads of wear and tear and ordinary, for the year 1818."

3. "Of the charge for guards, garrisons, and other land forces, for the year 1818."

4. "Of the charge of the office of ordnance for land service, for the year 1818."

5. "Account of services incurred and not provided for by parliament."

6. Estimates—"Of the probable expense of the transport service, for the year 1818."

7. "Of the money that will be wanted for the payment of the hire of transports, between the 1st day of January and the 31st day of December, 1818."

8. "Of the debt of his Majesty's navy, to the 31st day of December, 1817."

IRISH GRAND JURY PRESENTMENTS.] Mr. Fitzgerald moved the third reading of the Irish grand juries act suspension bill.

Sir F. Flood made a few observations for the purpose of vindicating grand juries in Ireland from an insinuation which, he said, had been thrown out against them, as to their presentments being often founded in perjury and fraud.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald declared that he had never heard of this imputation upon grand juries till the hon. baronet rose to defend them from it. The perjury and fraud alluded to had been described as taking place, not in framing the presentments, but in the expenditure of money raised under their authority, by subordinate agents.

Sir H. Parnell entered into a similar explanation, with regard to the misconception under which the hon. baronet laboured; after which the bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, Feb. 4.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Lord Binning brought in his bill "for the erection of district asylums in Scotland for the cure and confinement of lunatics." It was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

EX-OFFICIO INFORMATIONS.] Mr. W. Smith said, he had now so modified the motion which he had brought forward yesterday, respecting the expense of obtaining copies of informations from the crown-office, that it was not open to any of those objections which had been urged against it. He moved, that an account be laid before the house "of the fees which have been taken by the clerks in the crown-office for office copies of informations ex-officio for libel, given to persons accused, or to others in their behalf, applying for the same, during the years 1816 and 1817: specifying the rate according to which the charge is made, the total sum in each particular case, and to whose or what use the same is applied."—This motion was agreed to.

VOTES OF THE HOUSE.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the house resolve itself into a committee of supply.—On the question that the Speaker do leave the chair,

Lord Folkestone rose and said, that, according to the ancient usage of the house, he took this opportunity of pointing out a recent alteration, by which the public were aggrieved; he meant the alteration which had lately taken place in the proceedings of the house with respect to the printing of votes. He had neglected to refer to it at the time of the renewal of the sessional orders, and he took this as the most proper remaining opportunity for doing so. The house would recollect, that in the last session a change was made in the manner of publishing the votes, with a view to the convenience of members, and, on the whole, that change was beneficial. But there was one part of that arrangement which was injurious to the public; and that was the circumstance, that no petitions were printed in the votes, except such as were expressly ordered to be printed by a specific vote, which were published in an appendix. He was aware that a great number of petitions had been presented in the last session, and that the accumulation of these documents had been the chief cause of the extent to which the votes had been swelled, and the consequent delay which occurred in the publication of them. But he thought it a matter of respect which the house owed to its constituents and to the people, to publish those complaints which were transmitted to it, and delay might be equally avoided by the publication of these petitions, as a matter of course, in the appendix, as the select ones now are. It was true, that in every instance in which any member had moved that a petition be printed, no objection had been made; but the very fact, that a question was necessary previous to the printing, made an opening for objections; and it was a fair matter of complaint, on the part of the people, that their requests, when received by the house, were not printed as a matter of course. The votes of the house were the only regular way in which proceedings were made public; and the old votes seemed to be adapted to that purpose. He had not made up his mind to submit any motion to the house; but he had thought fit to put them on their guard against the consequence of a measure which might lead to an imputation, that they did not attend to the prayers of the people.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] The house then went into a committee of supply, and Sir George Warrender rose to move the navy estimates.—He said, there was this year a small increase in the supply for this branch of the public service. The committee of finance had foreseen the possibility of such an increase. The addition this year was 1000 men. The whole amount of men now was 20,000 sailors and marines. Among the causes of this small increase was the necessity of keeping up an establishment at St. Helena, and the state of South America. The rate of pay was somewhat higher in peace than war, because the proportion of able seamen to landsmen was greater in time of peace, in order that the fleet might be more speedily put on a good footing, in case of emergency. The rate of charge for ordnance was also somewhat increased. This estimate was always formed at a certain sum for each man, and the complement of a ship of war being much smaller in peace, the number of guns continuing the same as in war, a necessary increase of charge under this head of service arose. The whole estimates had been formed on the most mature consideration, and after communication with the different departments who had peculiar means of information on each head of service. The hon. baronet then concluded by moving the following resolutions:

1. That 20,000 men be employed for the sea service, for thirteen lunar months, from the 1st day of January, 1818, including 6,000 royal marines.

2. That a sum, not exceeding 611,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, "for wages of the said 20,000 men, for thirteen lunar months, at the rate of 2*l.* 7*s. per* man, per month."

3. That a sum, not exceeding 520,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, "for victuals for the said 20,000 men, for thirteen lunar months, at the rate of 2*l. per* man per month."

4. That a sum, not exceeding 559,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, "for the wear and tear of the ships in which the said 20,000 men are to serve, for thirteen lunar months, at the rate of 2*l.* 3*s. per* man per month."

5. That a sum, not exceeding 91,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, "for ordnance for sea service on board the ships in which the said 20,000 men are to serve, for thirteen lunar months, at the rate of 7*s. per* man per month."

These resolutions were agreed to.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had to propose a vote of exchequer bills to provide for other exchequer bills which were now outstanding. He should take this opportunity to give a brief view of the state of the unfunded debt. At an early period in the last session 24 millions were issued, which were still outstanding. This sum he now proposed to provide for. After that another sum of 18 millions was issued, which was outstanding, which he did not now intend to replace. There was in the last session another sum of 9 millions issued, and 6 millions had been issued in 1816. For both these sums he intended to provide, and these votes, and the usual annual taxes, land and malt, were the only ones which he intended to propose at this early period of the session. The amount of exchequer bills now outstanding was smaller than had been anticipated, not only by some gentlemen on the other side of the house, but even somewhat smaller than that which was anticipated in a resolution proposed by an hon. friend of his (Mr. Charles Grant, junior,) who had assumed that on the 5th of January, 1818, the amount outstanding might be 60 millions. It was, in fact, scarcely 57 millions and a half. At the same time, in 1817, the amount was 44,400,000—so that there was an increase of a little more than 12 millions. This was all that was added to the debt, though there were variations in other branches of the unfunded debt, the accounts of which had not yet been made up. The reduction of the unfunded debt amounted to 19 millions of stock, which was equal, at the present prices, to 15 millions in money—so that instead of any addition being made to the debt in this year, on the total amount of funded and unfunded, there was a diminution of about 3 millions.—The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving, "that a sum not exceeding 24 millions be granted to his Majesty, to pay off and discharge exchequer bills made out by virtue of an act of the 57th year of his present Majesty, for raising the sum of 24 millions by exchequer bills for the year 1817, outstanding and unprovided for."

Mr. Curwen said, he should heartily rejoice if, when the accounts were laid before the house, the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not be found to be fallacious. From the best consideration which he had been able to give the estimates, there had been a deficiency in Ireland of 5 millions (the receipts being 6 millions—the expenditure 11 millions), and in England of 9 millions, making in all 14 millions.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that comparing the actual state of the debt at the beginning of each year, the hon. gentleman, than whom no one was more competent to inquire into this subject, would see, when the accounts were presented, that there was a decrease of the debt of near 3 millions.

Mr. Tierney wished to know how the hon. gentleman, the colleague in office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was mistaken in the quantity of exchequer bills which would be outstanding at the commencement of the new year. As to the assertion that 15 millions of the national debt had been reduced, it was not possible, as so much money had not been in the hands of the commissioners. He did not blame the Chancellor of the Exchequer for taking the first opportunity of sounding a kind of bugle, as to the prosperous state of the country, and before the accounts were presented there would be little possibility of contradicting him.

Mr. C. Grant, jun. said, that he had stated in his resolutions, (see vol. I. p. 1816.) that the utmost amount of exchequer bills would be 60 millions—he had taken it as unfavourable as possible to the cause which he had argued, but he had guarded against the possibility of an inference that the sum must necessarily be so high.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he had given a short and necessarily superficial view of the state of the debt; but if he had not done so, no one would have been more ready to blame him than the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney.) He admitted that a part of the services of last year were as yet unperformed, and that, consequently, so large an amount of exchequer bills was not issued as the Treasury was enabled to issue. But he deemed it perfectly fair to take a comparison of the amount of the debt on the same day in each year.

In answer to questions from Mr. Tierney, the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that the navy debt was not paid off; also, that the exchequer bills issued to supply the deficiencies of the revenue were not included in his account.

Mr. Tierney wished to know what was the amount of the exchequer bills outstanding which had been issued for this latter purpose?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he did not know the exact amount. It did not exceed a million.

The resolution for the 24 millions was then carried; after which the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the following resolutions:

That a sum, not exceeding 9,000,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, "to pay off and discharge exchequer bills made out by virtue of an act of the 57th year of his present Majesty, for raising the sum of 9 millions by exchequer bills, for the year 1817, outstanding and unprovided for."

That a sum, not exceeding 6,000,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, "to pay off and discharge exchequer bills made out by virtue of an act of the 56th year of his present Majesty, for empowering the governor and company of the Bank of England to advance the sum of 6,000,000*l.* towards the supply for the service of the year 1816, outstanding and unprovided for."

These resolutions were agreed to: the report was ordered to be received to-morrow, and the committee to sit again on Friday.

POOR LAWS.] Mr. Sturges Bourne rose to move the reappointment of the committee on the poor laws. The committee, notwithstanding great assiduity, had been unable to get through its business in the course of the last session. He proposed to move the insertion of as many of the former names in the committee as circumstances would permit. Unfortunately since that time, the house had lost two of the members of that committee. Mr. Hall, the late member for Glamorgan, brought to the consideration of the subject an enlightened mind, and great experience of the state of a distressed part of the country. He was cut off in the prime of life. Mr. Rose, too, had been taken from them. He had given a great degree of attention to the subject, and the loss was severe to the committee, and to the house. His mind was anxious to the last hour of life on those subjects to which he had applied himself—the commerce and finances of the country. Whatever difference of opinion there was as to the great measures which he had supported, no one could doubt the depth and capacity of his mind, and the activity and indefatigableness of his exertions. In the country where he lived his loss would be more severely felt. He was ready to promote every measure that might be beneficial to those about him, and his bounty and liberality endeared him to all. The saving banks act, his last measure, would remain an endearing testimony, monumentum ære perennius, to his sagacity and benevolence.—The hon. member concluded by moving that a select committee be appointed "to consider of the poor laws, and to report their observations thereon to the house."

Mr. Curwen said, he had no opposition to make to this motion. He agreed in opinion with the members of the committee, who thought that no partial measures would be of use. The house ought not to shrink from the odium which the enactment of the necessary measures would entail on them, as any measures must be attended with suffering to some individuals. All expedients which had been adopted to mitigate the evils of the operation of the poor laws, had been ineffectual. Badging had first been resorted to in King William's time, and produced a temporary effect. Poor-houses were then built, and the objection of the people to be confined in them also had its effect. But in the course of years the evil had gone on increasing, notwithstanding these expedients. The inadequacy of wages, and the practice of supplying the deficiency of them from the parish funds, destroyed the spirit of independence among the poor. Labourers in many instances had not more than 9d. or 10d. a day. In Scotland, it had been found, that in manufacturing towns compulsory relief was necessary—and he feared that some such system must always prevail in places where the manufactures had destroyed the morals of the people.

Sir F. Burdett said, he expected no benefit from the appointment of the committee. They would, he had no doubt, expend much labour, but it would be labour in vain. There had been no change in the character of the working men in England. There was not less industry, less energy, less desire of independence, than there always had been. The evil was, that people so disposed had no means of supporting themselves. There were not the funds to employ them with profit to the employers. That the wages of labour were low was no subject of complaint against any class. No one gave less for labour than it was the interest of the labourer to receive. The employer knew whether the exertions of the labourer would repay him. The whole case had, therefore, been stated on unfair grounds. The people of England were the most energetic, the most unremittingly industrious people on the face of the earth, and the cause of the condition to which, notwithstanding their qualities, they were reduced, was obvious to his mind; and it was also obvious to him why many others did not wish to perceive it. It was the pressure of the enormous taxation on the country. If the poor laws had been the cause of the present condition of the people, how did it happen that at no former time they had produced the same effects, though they had existed for centuries? We had seen no such effects but within the few last years. He remembered, when he was a boy, before the late war, when he was playing with the labourers at his father's house, that the spirit of independence was universal—that it was a common boast with the English labourer, that neither he nor any of his family had ever asked relief from the parish. The general state of the people was now changed. The committee which was appointed, with a view to a remedy, would be little disposed to look to the real remedy, economy: a word which, at the beginning of this session, for the first time, had been never mentioned by the King's ministers, economy in the public expenditure. It was the weight on the industry of the country, to pay debts contracted in the prosecution of the war, which could not be borne, and the remedy was, to reduce all salaries and pensions which augmented this burthen unnecessarily—to reduce the wages of overpaid labour, or rather no labour which had been overpaid, while the labour of the people was so wretchedly underpaid. Such a measure would have more effect in relieving the labouring classes than all the expedients which the committee could suggest. It was an immense taxation which dried up the resources of the country, and he was persuaded, that it was of little consequence out of the pockets of what class the taxes were raised—whether on the consumers, or on the richer classes, in the shape of income tax. If it was taken out of the rich man's pocket, he was the less able to employ the labourer. He should only prefer that tax which was least oppressive in the collection, that is to say, which returned the largest proportion to the public treasury of that which was taken out of the pockets of the contributors. It was indifferent to him whether it was on salt, on leather, or other articles, or on income. That was best which produced most with least expense, with one exception—the tax on stamps on law proceedings, which was detestable on this ground, that a man was made to pay by it for that which he paid all other taxes to be entitled to: it was for personal protection—in short, for safety and liberty, that every man paid taxes according to his means; and it was a wicked and a cruel proceeding in any government to endeavour to shut out many from the benefit of that protection, by creating this artificial and unequal expense. He hoped the delusion as to the state of the country would not last for ever. They were now told that the country was in a mending condition, and as a proof, the wages of labourers were, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Curwen) said, in some instances 9d. a day, and the families were supported out of parish funds. At such a time was it that economy had never once been mentioned.—As for the relief afforded by the parish, those who knew what it was, knew also that men would use all possible exertions before they were compelled to depend upon it. With regard to the observation which he had often heard, that the poor rates held out a great encouragement to idleness by the comforts which they afforded, and that many people were anxious to participate in those comforts, he firmly believed that that observation was unfounded, and that the mass of the people contemplated it as one of the greatest calamities to be reduced to the necessity of having recourse to the poor rates.—The hon. baronet concluded with stating that he would not oppose the motion.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the hon. baronet's observations were more connected with the general policy of the country, than with the particular subject of the poor laws. As many opportunities would afterwards occur of combating such general remarks, he would not now advert to them. He hoped that neither the house nor the public would entertain the same desponding views of the poor laws with the hon. baronet. Great good had already been done by the committee. The distinct and clear view which they had given in their report, of the various branches of this complicated subject, and the wide circulation of this report through the country, had been productive of the happiest effects. He had given his attendance in the committee as much as was in his power, and had often borne a part in the discussion: he could therefore confidently affirm, that although different opinions necessarily prevailed on a subject so difficult and so complicated, the committee were unanimous on many leading points. Besides, should it be impossible to agree in opinion, or to adopt any legislative measure on the subject, he had frequently observed much good to arise from the mind often working on a subject by way of discussion. The further discussion of this subject in the committee, and in the house, would thus do good, by ascertaining principles, and suggesting improvements which would be acted upon in the several parishes, although no legislative act should pass on the subject. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. baronet's desponding representation of the inutility of investigation, would have no weight in that house or with the public.

Sir F. Burdett explained. He had not disapproved of investigation, but had said, what he would now restate, that no investigation or discussion would ever afford any relief, without such a reduction of the establishments of the government, and such a rigid economy in the expenditure, as would reduce the enormous taxation of the country to a scale compatible with the fair employment of the industrious population, and the full enjoyment of the fruits of industry.

Mr. Calcraft had not very sanguine expectations from the labours of the committee. The report, he would admit, had done some good, but no effectual relief could be expected without the powerful co-operation of government. Two points of great importance and considerable nicety would deserve the attention of the committee. The one was, whether funded property should not be subjected to poor rates as well as landed property. The other was, whether petty sessions might not be invested with the consideration of many subjects which, at present, devolved upon the quarter sessions. More good could be done by county magistrates than by any act of legislation. He had heard much said of the advantages of permanent overseers; but the principal cause of mismanagement was, that those who had a right to attend and inquire into the system of management in their parish neglected to do so. Why did they not attend and satisfy themselves of the necessity of every burden imposed upon them, and detect every attempt at imposition or peculation?

The motion was then agreed to, and the following members were named on the committee.

Mr. Sturges Bourne.	Sir John Simeon.
Mr. Curwen.	Mr. Estcourt.
Lord Vis. Castlereagh.	Mr. Thos. Courtenay.
Mr. Frankland Lewis.	Mr. Robert Smith.
Mr. Bathurst.	Mr. Davies Gilbert.
Sir Thos. Baring.	Mr. Holford.
Mr. Brand.	Mr. Cartwright.
Mr. Huskisson.	Sir Egerton Brydges.
Mr. Wood.	Sir Thomas Acland.
Mr. Morton Pitt.	Mr. Morritt.
Mr. Legh Keck.	Mr. Charles Dundas.
Mr. Lockhart.	Mr. Holme Sumner.
Mr. Dickinson.	Lord Vis. Cranbourne.
Lord Vis. Lascelles.	Mr. Littleton.
Mr. Ashurst.	Mr. Osborn.
Sir James Shaw.	Sir W. Rowley.
Lord W. Bentinck.	Mr. Chas. Grant, jun.
Mr. Fitzhugh.	Mr. Shaw Lefevre.
The Lord Stanley.

Power was given to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum; leave to report from time to time, and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house.

Mr. Speaker acquainted the house, that the clerk had prepared and laid on the table, an abstract of returns of the assessment for the relief of the poor in the years 1718, 1749, and 1750.—Ordered to be referred to the committee on the poor laws.

ELECTION LAWS AMENDMENT.] Mr. Wynn moved for leave to bring in a bill "to alter and amend the laws concerning the election of members to serve in parliament, and for further limiting the duration of polls" The great objects he had in view were, first, to shorten the period for polling; next, to enable the magistrates to regulate the number of booths; then to prohibit the use of cockades, and in certain cases to authorize the returning officer to declare a candidate duly elected, although another candidate should demand a poll. Leave being granted, the bill was brought in, read a first and second time, committed, reported, and the further consideration of the report ordered for Friday the 13th of February. The bill was ordered, in the mean time, to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented a petition of certain inhabitants of Bath, setting forth, "that defective representation being the nation's bane, the petitioners pray that all male persons (infants, insanes, and criminals excepted) may equally share in annually electing representatives to serve in parliament."—It was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—The hon. baronet then presented eight petitions of inhabitants of Bath, to the same effect.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COMMITTEE ON THE STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] Mr. Brougham said, he was anxious to ask for some information respecting the select committee to be appointed. Did the noble lord intend to accede to the proposition which he had taken the liberty to make on the first night of the session? Having then obtained no satisfactory answer, he now again asked, whether the committee to be appointed would be furnished with powers to call for witnesses, papers, and every necessary source of accurate information?

Lord Castlereagh replied, that it was intended to follow the precedent of former cases of a similar nature. Such powers as the hon. gentleman alluded to, had not been conferred on such occasions.

Mr. Brougham.—Does the noble lord then reply in the negative? Am I entitled so to understand him?

Lord Castlereagh said, that he had replied in the negative.

Mr. Brougham asked again, whether the committee was to be chosen by ballot, and if so, when the ballot was to take place?

Lord Castlereagh said, that the usual mode was to choose by ballot the next night after the motion should be agreed to.

Mr. Brougham stated, that an hon. friend of his would, in these circumstances, submit a motion to the house on the subject.

SLAVE-TRADE.] Dr. Phillimore moved for a return "of all vessels engaged in the slave trade and detained by his Majesty's cruizers, for which claims have been given by Spanish subjects, and appeals have been prosecuted to the high court of Admiralty, or to the court of Appeals (before his Majesty's privy council), since the 1st of January 1815; specifying which of the said ships have been restored, which condemned, and the cases in which appeals are still pending, and also the number of slaves which have composed the cargo of each vessel."—Ordered.

NEW STREET ACT.] Mr. Serjeant Onslow presented a petition of Thomas Wakeman, setting forth, that he had been removed from his house under the new street act, and, in consequence, had lost his business.

Mr. Huskisson had no objection that the petition should lie on the table, as a respect due to petitions to that house; but if it was intended to be followed up by any further proceeding, he would, in the name of the commissioners, object to it The hon. and learned gentleman neverhesitated to give his legal advice to persons in an inferior situation. If, then, he should bring the question into a court of law, the commissioners would readily meet it.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow said, that the petitioner had sustained an injury not in the immediate contemplation of the act, and therefore he applied to the house to consider his case and recommend it to the attention of the commissioners.—Ordered to lie on the table *.

* On the 10th of February, 1818, the following case was determined in the Court of King's Bench.

Leader v. the Commissioners for the New Street.

A rule had been obtained last term by Mr. Serjeant Onslow, calling on the commissioners for making the new street from Pall-Mall to Piccadilly to shew cause why they should not, in compliance with the terms of the act of parliament, desire the High Bailiff of Westminster to empannel a jury, for the purpose of ascertaining what compensation the plaintiff should receive, in consequence of his being obliged to remove from the premises he occupied in St. James's-market.

Mr. Gurney now shewed cause against the rule, in doing which he read the substance of an affidavit, sworn by the plaintiff, which stated that, in the year 1812, he rented a shop in St. James's-market of the Duke of Leeds at the rate of 18*l.* a quarter, and that in January, 1815, he took a house in the same market of the Duke of Leeds, at the rate of 35*l.* a-year. It was further stated, that when the plaintiff obtained possession of this house, Mr. Rickham, the agent of the Duke of Leeds, assured him that he should have a lease in return for the expense he was put to on account of repairs, and that Mr. Mill, acting under the commissioners, had offered him 50*l.* as a compensation for his loss. Mr. Gurney observed, that his learned friend, Mr. Serjeant Onslow, had obtained his rule last term with great difficulty, by urging the principle that the applicant had an interest under the act, and that the commissioners had recognized that interest by the offer of 50*l.* which Mr. Mill had made to him. It was therefore contended, that he was entitled to have the amount of his alleged damage assessed by a jury. The affidavit of Mr. Rickham gave a very different account of the case. It appeared from it, that a Mr. Mintram, the father in-law of the present tenant, who rented the shop in question by the week, long before the year 1812, had, along with other tenants in the same situation, made application to Mr. Rickham to allow them to pay their rents quarterly, instead of weekly, alleging that the weekly payments were very inconvenient to them. Mr. Rickham, on hearing their representations, said, he had no objection to take the payments quarterly, to relieve them from the trouble they complained of, but that they were not on that account to consider themselves in any other situation than as weekly tenants. He then calculated Mintram's weekly payments, and found that they came to a fraction more than 18*l.* upon which he agreed to drop the odd money, and to take the 18*l.* In the year 1812, Mintram, being about to leave the shop, introduced Leader as his son-in-law, and Mr. Rickham accepted of him as a tenant, with an express understanding that he was to occupy the shop on the same terms as his father-in-law, namely, to consider himself a weekly tenant, paying quarterly. In 1815, a year and a half after the passing of the act for making the new street, and when every one knew that the houses in St. James's-market would be purchased by the commissioners, the plaintiff took the house in question, from Mr. Rickham, for one year, and it was let to him at a very low rent, on account of the repairs. At the expiration of the year he made application for a lease for seven years, but instead of making him any promise to that effect, Mr. Rickham told him, that he could not grant his request, as the house would be taken by the commissioners, and that to grant a new lease would be creating new claims against the commissioners, which would be fraudulent and unjust. This affidavit was supported by those of the person who collected the rents for the Duke of Leeds, and the Secretary of the commissioners. From the latter it would be found, that some offer to the plaintiff was proposed to be given to him as a gratuity, and that he was distinctly informed it would not be given to him as a right. The whole claim, then, was an imposition from beginning to end. The commissioners, by succeeding to the Duke of Leeds, were clothed with the same rights which he possessed, and, therefore, the tenants were bound to go out upon receiving regular notice from the new landlords.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow contended, that though the plaintiff had no lease, he was entitled to claim under the clause of the act, which directed compensation for "any such interest or damage whatever." It had been said, that when the plaintiff took the house in St. James's-market, he was aware that it would be wanted by the commissioners. Such, he believed, could not be the fact; for if his client then knew that the new street would take that line, he had more foresight than any man in London. The plaintiff had to claim compensation for two interests, the shop and the house. With regard to the shop, his learned friend had said, that the plaintiff was only a weekly tenant; but whatever his interest was, it was now standing for trial. Would his learned friend, then, ask the court to determine, on affidavit, an in-

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, Feb. 5.

The Bishop of Derry took the oaths and his seat.

IRISH GRAND JURIES ACT SUSPENSION BILL.] This bill was brought from the Commons, and read a first time.

GOLD AND SILVER COIN.] The Earl of Lauderdale moved for accounts of the gold and silver coined in the Mint, for the two years preceding the 1st of January, 1818, distinguishing sovereigns and half-sovereigns, crowns and half-crowns, &c.—Ordered.

SECRET COMMITTEE APPOINTED.] At five o'clock the order was read for the appointment by ballot of a secret committee, to consider and report on the papers relative to the state of the country, which had been laid on the table by the Prince Regent's command.

Glasses, which had been placed on the table, were then carried round the house, in order that the lords might deposit their lists. Most of the lords present put in lists; the Earl of Grosvenor did not deposit one. After the lists had been collected the glasses were removed, and several of the lords withdrew to form a committee for the examination of the lists. On their return the names of the peers elected for the secret committee were read, viz:—

The Lord Chancellor,	Marquis of Lansdowne,
The Earl of Harrowby,	Earl Fitzwilliam,
The Duke of Montrose (as Earl Graham),	Earl of Powis,
Earl of Liverpool,	Viscount Sidmouth,
Marquis Camden,	Lord Grenville,
	Lord Redesdale.

Earl Grosvenor took this opportunity of making some observations on what had passed the other night, when a noble marquis, not now in his place, (the Marquis of Lansdowne) had stated, that it was desirable for the committee to have power to send for persons, papers, and records. His noble friend had been answered, that such a power was inconsistent with the practice of the House of Lords, and that the course proposed to be followed was justified by precedent. He thought, however, that in a case like the present, when the investigation to be instituted was of so important a nature, the power recommended by the noble marquis ought to have been given, though it might not be according to the general practice of the house. On the present occasion their lordships would, in his opinion, be perfectly justified in departing from their usual course, and enabling the committee at once to call for persons, papers and records, without waiting until the chairman of the committee might apply to the house for further information, or new evidence. But such a power, it seemed, would be contrary to precedent, and the noble secretary of state for the home department, had referred to the proceeding of 1801, as a case in point, to shew that this power ought not to be given. Now the proterest which was to be tried by a jury after term? With regard to the house, the plaintiff was, according to the affidavit of the other side, a tenant from year to year; but whatever interest he had, whether weekly, quarterly, or yearly, he was entitled to compensation under the act.

Mr. Scarlett, who followed on the same side, after dwelling on the hardship of the clause of the act of parliament which makes it lawful for the commissioners to enter upon lands or premises in such manner as they may think proper, without being deemed trespassers, proceeded to argue, that the notice they had given proved that they considered the plaintiff as holding an interest.

Court.—They did not give the notice as commissioners, but as landlords, having purchased the interest and right of the Duke of Leeds.

Mr. Scarlett conceived that they could have no power except under the act. They could only purchase as commissioners, and it would be very unjust if they were, in that character, to purchase the rights of the landlord with a view of doing what the landlord never intended to do, and never would have done. The Duke of Leeds never meant to eject his tenants. To do so was getting possession of one interest by the act, and using that interest to destroy another.

Mr. Justice Abbott.—Would any man give 600*l.* (the compensation claimed) for a shop out of which he might be turned on a week's notice?

Mr. Scarlett did not know what sum might be given, as the value depended on the probability of the occupant being turned out; very large sums were given for good-will; but whatever the value might be, what he meant to contend was, that the commissioners had no right to treat with the Duke of Leeds first, and then to turn the power they had thereby acquired against the tenant, in the way they had done.

Lord Ellenborough.—Could it be said that there were any words in the act which prevented the Duke of Leeds from disposing of his property in the same manner as he might have done before it passed? In purchasing his property, the commissioners made a compensation for every interest. They purchased the major right, which included every other.

Mr. Scarlett said, he might be wrong in the view he had taken, but, according to his sense of justice, parliament could not have intended the act to operate in a way so hostile to the interests of the tenant. He was convinced that, if the Duke of Leeds had foreseen that such consequences were to be drawn from his bargain with the commissioners, he would not have made it.

Lord Ellenborough.—A bargain has been concluded, and our business is only with its legal effect, which is this:—The commissioners having purchased certain shops and houses, stand precisely in the situation of the former landlord.—It was to be regretted that a fuller display of the act of parliament had not been made on the application for the rule, which, in that case, perhaps, would not have been granted; for the court was often under the necessity, in granting a rule, to rely on the statement of the applicant. In cases of this nature, the public frequently suffered by the claims which were advanced. He had observed, that under all compensation acts, there were always a number of parties anxious to acquire an interest. They went to the nuisance, instead of the nuisance coming to them.—Rule discharged.

ceeding of 1801 was on a report communicated to their lordships from the House of Commons. It was not, then, a measure instituted either on a communication to their lordships from the throne, nor did it resemble a committee appointed in consequence of a measure originating among themselves. The example which the noble viscount had referred to was evidently of no authority; but if the precedent were complete still he should consider himself fully justified in calling on their lordships to go out of their way and agree to the resolution which he was about to propose. He was convinced, however, that those who thought as he did, on the whole of the question which had given rise to the present committee, who were like him convinced that there had been no occasion for depriving the people of this country of the most important of their rights, no ground for the alarm spread by ministers, and that the ordinary course of law would have been perfectly sufficient for the repression of any disorders or offences which might have existed, would perhaps not be surprised that ministers endeavoured to shelter themselves, and sought to avoid a full investigation That their pretences for suspending the habeas corpus act were groundless, had been his conviction at the time they proposed that measure, and every thing which had since occurred had tended to fortify and confirm that opinion. He did not expect, however, that they would go the length of asking their lordships to appoint a committee so constituted, and with powers so limited that it must obviously appear to be framed for the purpose of white-washing them. When he recollected, too, the lofty language of the secretary of state on this subject in the last session of parliament, he little thought that he would be the very individual who should come down to their lordships with a proposition of the nature which he had made, and which was nothing more nor less than asking them to pronounce, without sufficient inquiry, the justification of himself and his colleagues. They needed absolution for their sinful deed, and this committee was to be their extreme unction. If they really thought that they had sufficient grounds of justification for their conduct, why did they not propose a committee which would give full satisfaction to the country? The noble marquis who had objected to the limited powers of the committee, he observed, was chosen one of its members. Whether, restricted as it was, his noble friend would attend or not, he did not know; but the task would be at any time arduous, to probe to the quick the system of delusion which had been employed: as it was, no complete investigation could be expected. Nothing short of a full inquiry respecting the conduct of all the persons who had been employed by government could be satisfactory. For his part, he was convinced that there had not been, throughout the whole country, any thing like treason, or any one act of disturbance which had not been provoked by the agents and the spies employed by ministers themselves. Was the evidence of such persons to be relied on for the vindication of ministers? Petitions might be presented to their lordships' house on this subject, and persons might offer to give important evidence. To refer such petitions to the committee would be the course which the house ought to take, and it would be the bounden duty of the committee to attend strictly to them. It would, therefore, be much better that sufficient powers should, in the first instance, be granted to the committee. For these reasons, he trusted that their lordships would agree to the proposition he should now submit to them—namely, that the secret committee be empowered to call for and examine persons, papers, and records.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he would make no remark on what the noble earl had stated respecting the measures of the last session of parliament, nor his assertions regarding the employment of spies and agents of government, further than to say, that the observations he had made in those respects had nothing to do with the business before the house. This was not the time for discussing those topics, and when the proper time should arrive, he should be ready to justify the course which government had considered it their duty to pursue. With regard to the only question before their lordships, namely, the powers which ought to be given to the committee, he must repeat what had been stated last night by his noble friend, that there was no example of powers of the nature of those proposed to be given to the present committee ever having been granted by their lordships. The noble earl had alluded to the proceeding of 1801, and had argued that, from the manner in which it had originated, it could not be regarded as a precedent; but that case had not been relied on as affording a precedent in every respect analogous to the present measure. It had only been referred to as one of many instances which served to shew, that when a committee was appointed by their lordships, whether on a message from the crown, or not, it was not usual to give to that committee powers of the kind now proposed. The present committee had been appointed according to the invariable practice of the house, and he conceived, therefore, that the noble earl had stated no ground which could induce their lordships to agree to his motion.

The motion was negatived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, Feb. 5.

WINDOW-TAX, IRELAND.] Mr. Shaw presented the following petition of several householders of the city of Dublin, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

"That the petitioners beg leave respectfully to approach the house, and humbly to implore an alleviation of the grievous burden of excessive taxation that oppresses them, and which is now become wholly insupportable, from the gradually increasing additions that the exigencies of the state in a period of war appeared to require; they beg leave to represent, that the pains and privations they suffered, during the continuance of the war, in complying with its extraordinary demands on their industry and resources, were mainly supported by the sanguine and reasonable expectation of relief on the return of peace; but they cannot suppress the respectful expression of their grief and disappointment in the failure of this their just expectation; during the tremendous struggles of the empire, their sufferings were without complaint, their patience without limit, their terror without despair; they contributed largely, they made sacrifices beyond their strength, and the result is, a peace of arms and a war of taxes; they have the unnatural combination of national glory and national prostration; the ravages of war have terminated, the ravages of taxes survive; without adverting to the enormous amount of local taxes in the city of Dublin, or to their improvident application, they beg leave most humbly to intreat the attention of the house, and to solicit a repeal of the window tax, founded on a pledge given to the parliament of Ireland, that it should cease with the war; they cannot be persuaded that this exalted and sacred pledge will remain longer unredeemed by a gracious and parental government, or that his Majesty's ministers will risk the morals of the people, countenancing, by their high authority and impressive example, the breach of honourable engagement; they beg leave most humbly to represent, that the policy of repeal must appear obvious, from the utter inability of the citizens to supply their contingent; that the sources of their wealth, which arise almost exclusively from supplying the requisites of war, are essentially diminished by the return of peace, and their want of general manufacture, or export trade; their shops are unfrequented, their houses untenanted, their artizans unemployed, their nobility and gentry fled, and their city become the head-quarters of sturdy and alarming beggary, exhibits their condition so humiliated, and so unmerited, as should claim at least the compassion, if not the justice, of an enlightened legislature; they beg leave most humbly and respectfully to assure the house, that their loyalty and duty instruct them in submitting with becoming resignation, to the utmost of their power, in contributing to the good order and security of the empire, but the window-tax exceeds their ability, and they implore its abolition; they beg leave most humbly and dutifully to state, that, as an integral part of the empire, they hope they are not presumptuous in looking for an integral share of protection; their more favoured fellow subjects of England have been relieved from a most important portion of the public contributions, the income tax; the petitioners are not jealous, but ashamed of the distinction—they are not envious, but grieved at the contrast—it was their right, they had the faith of parliament, and that faith was kept with them; the petitioners have the same right, the same faith, and they will not offer such an outrage to reason as to suppose that parliament will persevere in suspending the award of even-handed justice; they beg leave to state, that the effects of this tax, morally and physically considered, are such as a humane and intelligent legislature will seek to avert, being calculated by its pressure and rigour to alienate the hearts of the people, while their bodies languish under the means employed for avoiding it; thus guiltless poverty is made the instrument of self-destruction; they beg leave to state to the house, that consternation and dismay pervade the entire city at the threatened introduction of a commutation or substitute tax, and they take refuge with confidence in the wisdom and power of parliament to arrest in its progress (if the occasion arise) this pernicious and reprobated project; the life-blood is exhausted, and stimulation is in vain; to the justice and impartiality of a benevolent parliament they submit the prayer of this their most humble petition; they trust that their voice, though distant, may be heard, and that the house will find recorded on the hearts of a grateful and sensitive people, the sentiments of respect and veneration that await allegiance requited and attachment rewarded."

The hon. member gave notice, that he should take an early opportunity of calling the attention of the house to this subject.

SALT DUTIES.] Mr. Dickinson presented a petition of the linen manufacturers and bleachers of Somersetshire, against the duties on muriatic acid.—Ordered to lie on the table.

THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE MESSAGE OF CONDOLENCE.] Her Majesty's answer was reported as follows:—

"I return my thanks to the House of Commons for this mark of their attention."

THE PRINCE OF COBOURG'S ANSWER.] His Serene Highness's answer was reported, as follows:—

"I feel most sensibly this instance of attention in the House of Commons: I receive their Condolence with great satisfaction: and with earnest and consoling confidence in their interest in my affliction."

GOLD AND SILVER COIN.] Mr. Grenfell moved for an "account of gold and silver coined at his Majesty's mint for the two years preceding the 1st of Jan. 1818; distinguishing each year, and also distinguishing the amount coined from old gold and silver coin."—Ordered.

FINANCE.] Mr. Curwen rose and said, he wished to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, relative to the statement which he had made last night. He was induced to do so from an examination of the accounts of the year 1816, which exhibited a deficiency so great, notwithstanding its extraordinary resources, that he was induced to distrust the present assertions of the right hon. gentleman. He should shew, on the one hand, the sums which had been raised on various loans in that year, and then, the progress which had been made in the reduction of the debt:

In that year the bank advanced on exchequer bills - - -	6,000,000
The bank advanced without interest	3,000,000
There were surplus grants of 1815	5,663,755
Loan for England - - -	3,358,654
	18,022,409
To this must be added the increase of unfunded debt, which on the 5th of Jan. 1816 was - -	48,725,359
On the 5th of Jan. 1817 - -	50,047,088
Increase in the year 1816 - -	1,321,729
When this increase was added to	18,022,409
It made a total increase of debt -	19,344,138
It would thus be seen that the increase of debt was above 19 millions. It remained to be seen what was the reduction which was to be set against it. By the finance accounts, from which he had taken the foregoing figures, it appeared that the sinking fund in the same year had amounted to - -	13,252,600
Deduct this from the debt contracted, viz. - - - - -	19,344,138
The difference was - - - -	6,091,538

So that there was really contracted a debt of more than six millions in that year, over and above the loans for Ireland. Now, he wished to know, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether there was any error in this statement of the account which he had taken from the documents furnished by that right hon. gentleman himself, and printed by order of the house. He imagined also, that there should be added to this increase of debt the amount of a deficiency in the consolidated fund, being about 600,000*l.*

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he could not answer the statement of the hon. gentleman without examining the accounts.—There was in the last year an arrear of war taxes, which made a difference between that year and 1816. This statement of the hon. gentleman's did not apply to the year just passed.

Mr. Curwen said, he would then put a plain intelligible question to the right hon. gentleman. Was he to understand from his statement, that after all the expenses of government, of our establishments, interest of debts funded and unfunded, and advances to the commissioners for the sinking fund, there was a surplus of upwards of 3,000,000*l.* afforded by the net revenue of last year?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that on comparison of the debt incurred last year and he debt paid off, there was a balance of more than 3,000,000*l.* in favour of the country.

ASSIZES IN THE NORTH.] Mr. M. A. Taylor rose, to move for copies of the calendar of the prisoners committed for trial in the four northern counties. He was satisfied, that if the house looked to the state of the administration of justice in those districts, they would be ready to put an end to the inconvenience which existed, and wonder that no alteration had before taken place. He regretted that the committee of courts of justice, which was appointed as a matter of form at the beginning of every session, did not in reality sit, as it would have saved him the trouble of bringing forward this motion, and of devising a remedy. In the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland and Durham, and the county and town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the assizes were held only once a year. It was hardly necessary for him to expatiate on the injustice which was necessarily suffered by individuals from this practice. It often happened that persons were confined in gaol the greater part of a year, who, when put on their trials, were cleared by a jury of their country. It might happen in this year, as Easter fell remarkably early, that a man might be committed to prison soon after Easter, and kept till the next Easter, a year and a month, and probably after that might be acquitted, or convicted of an offence, such as manslaughter, of which the utmost punishment could not be so severe as the imprisonment he had undergone before trial. From this it would appear that the subject was of great importance, and loudly demanded the attention of the house. The great population and extensive traffic of these parts gave additional importance to this subject. The county of Durham contains, besides Durham itself, Monkwearmouth, Shields, and other towns which, in population and industry, might vie with any of the more favoured districts, with perhaps the exception of Manchester alone: yet these extensive districts had by the present state of things a gaol-delivery only once in every year. Scotland had its circuit court twice every year regularly; besides this, the lords of justiciary, in cases where persons had been too long in gaol, had the power at any time during the interval between the circuits, to bring the proceedings before them at Edinburgh: but the counties alluded to, though much more populous than the most busy part of Scotland, had their assizes only once a year. The stated and regular dispensation of justice was essential to a free country, more especially that of criminal justice. The object of his motion was to obtain a return of the calendar of prisoners, and of the number of causes for forty years back, in order that the house might be aware of the necessity of some remedy to this growing evil, and that there might be a clear agreement as to the points to be remedied. He said, that within his own recollection, there were several instances which placed the necessity of some remedy in a strong light. He knew a case, where a person had lain in gaol for nine months, and when at last brought to trial, was immediately acquitted of the crime for which he had been committed. When the necessary papers were produced, it was his intention to state the mode of remedy which occurred to him; and if the house should entertain the motion, he should afterwards move for a committee to consider the subject, and report thereon. He should then let the subject lie over for some time, till the judges should have the opportunity of considering whether this remedy were feasible, or whether any improvements could be suggested. At all events, he was determined not to lose sight of his object, but to persevere, year after year, till some improvement was accomplished. He should, therefore, move for "copies of the calendar of the prisoners committed for trial at the assizes in the counties of Westmorland, Cumberland, Northumberland and Durham, and the town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, commencing in the year 1780, and ending with the year 1817; specifying the dates of the respective commitments, and also the liberation of the said prisoners, as settled by the judge of assize and general gaol delivery."—Also, a "list of the causes during the said period, as set down in the marshal's paper, and delivered by him to the associate; distinguishing the special from the common jury causes; and a list of the remanets at each assize."—Ordered.

The hon. gentleman then gave notice that he should submit a motion on the subject on Thursday the 17th of February.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] Mr. Grenfell, on occasion of bringing up the report of the committee of supply, rose to make some observations on the transactions with the bank. He had frequently adverted to the same topics, but he would persist to expose what appeared to him so unfair and disadvantageous to the country. It had appeared, that in the year 1816 the bank had 11,000,000*l*. of the public money. For that sum they lent 3,000,000*l*. They had indeed lent 6,000,000*l*. at 4 per cent. He would suppose that the rate of interest was then 5 per cent. The one per cent., then, constituted a bonus of 60,000*l*. The trouble and expense of the bank were said to be entitled to remuneration. Was there a banker who would not say that he should be well paid for all this trouble and expense by 20,000*l*.? But we allowed more than half a million. (Hear, hear.) Were the finances of the country in a state to warrant such profusion? Was the condition of the people, groaning under the pressure of taxation, such as rendered this subject unworthy of consideration? (Hear, hear.) He trusted the right hon. gentleman would not limit the accommodation to be given to the public by the bank to the paltry sum of 3,000,000*l*.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that at present the rate of interest was higher than the hon. gentleman had stated. The sum now in question was employed to pay off a debt which the government owed to the bank.

The right hon. gentleman then moved, that the house form itself into a committee of ways and means to-morrow, when he should state the amount of taxes and exchequer bills required for the present year.—Ordered.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] Lord Castlereagh, in moving that the papers laid on the table by command of his Royal Highness, be referred to a secret committee, said, that any observations on the merits of the subject would at present be premature. He would not, therefore, say one word to pledge any individual's opinion as to the past or the present state of the country. He had only to offer a few words as to the form of the proceeding. He had been anxious to conform to precedents; and when an hon. and learned gentleman on the other side (Mr. Brougham) had put some questions respecting the power of the committee to call for persons, papers and records, he had been misled by an idea that it was wished to give them powers not warranted by precedent, and he had therefore replied in the negative. He since found that such powers were authorized by precedent, and he felt it, therefore, necessary to mention how he had been misled. The precedents of all former times since the revolution, pari materia, would be followed. As to the object of the present proceeding, there was no definite measure that would necessarily arise from the inquiry to be instituted. He admitted, that a bill of indemnity might be necessary, and would be called for; but it did not arise, and was not intended to arise, from the papers on the table. The conduct of ministers was fairly in issue and explanation respecting matters which could not be disclosed to the country. It was not consistent with the public safety, and with the security of individuals who had been called upon to act for the public safety, that the reasons and circumstances of their conduct should be disclosed. It was, therefore, necessary that ministers should have a bill of indemnity, to preclude them from being obliged to defend themselves in courts of justice against every individual who might complain of the conduct which they had felt to be necessary for the public safety. An indemnity was, therefore, necessary on abstract grounds. But ministers should have an opportunity of explaining their proceedings before a secret committee. By the prosperity which happily prevailed throughout the country, and by the vigilance of parliament, the great mass of danger was passed by. Yet there still existed danger from persons working with activity to produce mischief. It was therefore proper to be guarded against this evil. He concluded by moving, that the papers laid on the table by command of his Royal Highness, be referred to a committee.

Mr. Tierney said, he had no objection to refer those papers to a committee, but he thought the papers were introduced to them in a manner altogether unparalleled. There was no accompanying message to explain their nature, or to point out the object in view. There might be one or two instances of papers without a message, but it was in circumstances that at once explained their object. In the speech from the throne there was no explanation. After the speech there was nothing to tell why papers were to be laid before them. The country was described to be in circumstances of increasing prosperity; why, then, were these papers laid on the table? No papers were ever before sent by the crown, but in order that the house might afford assistance which the prerogative could not reach; and the consequence always was, a suspension of the habeas corpus, or the exertion of some legislative function in support of the prerogative. (Hear, hear.) In the present case, they had, without any message, simply a bag. (A laugh.) In the votes of the house he saw it so stated, and he supposed the expression was taken from the speech of the noble lord. If it was inquired what bag was it? the only answer was, it was a bag relating to the internal state of the country. (Much laughter.) From such an explanation, he should have supposed it was intended for the committee on the poor laws. (Repeated laughter.) But it must have reference to something different from that, or it would not have been sealed up. What its real object was, they knew not. A message would have told the view of government, and that was the very thing to be concealed. The suspension was always viewed with suspicion; but that mysterious measure, followed by the mysterious speech of the noble lord, ought to be now regarded with every kind of suspicion and distrust. (Hear, hear.) Ministers had been, during the last eight months, making a prima facie case against themselves in the mind of every man in the country. (Much cheering.) They were now to make a case for themselves in the house by means of a secret committee. He gave credit to the noble lord for his candour in assuring them, that since it was necessary, he would get a bill of indemnity. (A laugh.) He really believed the noble lord to be very candid in stating, that he would use all the means in his power to protect himself from trial and its consequences. (Much laughter.) A bill of indemnity was to be introduced for the protection of those very persons who proposed a committee by ballot. This was the coarsest juggle that could be exposed to reasonable beings. (Hear, hear.) Indemnity, he admitted, might sometimes be necessary. But, in the present instance, the secretary for the home department, or rather for the administration, for he was only their organ, had been guilty of unwarrantable severity. (Hear, hear.) They had taken up no leaders, no persons connected with any distinguished or opulent families; but they had drawn a drag-net over certain counties, and seized all within their grasp. Every case of indemnity must stand upon its own merits. In the present case, the suspension was a cabinet measure, and every member of the cabinet endeavoured to give it as much stage-effect as it was possible to give, because alarm was their daily bread. (Hear, hear.) Hence they heard of nothing but the burning of barracks, the smoking of soldiers, and the destruction of manufactories. He solemnly declared upon his honour, that after all the events and trials that took place during the recess—and he had considered and examined all of them with every attention in his power—yet, after the most careful and impartial examination, he would solemnly declare, without any party bias, that not one case occurred which shewed the suspension to be necessary. (Hear, hear.) The trials, and even the convictions that took place, only confirmed this persuasion. He had read every word of the Derby trials with the greatest care, and his labour was indeed amply rewarded by the great and splendid abilities of one of the counsel for the prisoners, his learned friend Mr. Denman. There it appeared that ministers, to speak in the gentlest terms of their conduct, had let the thing go too far, when it was in their power to stop it. There was some alarm last year; but the alarm never required a suspension of the habeas corpus act. The powers conferred by the suspension were exercised with unnecessary rigour. (Hear, hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bathurst) did not contradict him, when he said, on a former night, that the suspension was continued beyond the necessary period, according to their own shewing of necessity. It was, then, ground of direct charge against the secretary of state, if one man was kept a single hour in prison beyond the absolute necessity of the case. (Hear, hear.) But if any one thing disgusted the nation, whatever might have been their ideas of danger, or of the suspension—if any one thing disgusted the nation more than another, it was the public boast, which referred to the agency of infernal scoundrels who incited the people to rebellion. (Loud and long continued cheering.) Ministers had a right to get information; but to employ persons who, by their inflammatory language, excited to the very acts which ought to have been prevented, and then to drag the unhappy victims of their delusion to the scaffold, formed a mass of atrocious villainy which never stained the annals of this country before. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord promised to satisfy them that no agent of government had done such acts. God grant that the noble lord might succeed, for the credit of the age; but he could not whitewash spies, or detach them from everlasting infamy! This was a task beyond the reach of his splendid oratory. He would state the whole merits of the subject before them in two questions.—Who were now upon their trial? Who appointed the committee to decide upon their conduct? (Hear, hear.) All secret committees were appointed by the government. He meant no reflection, it was the uniform practice that the treasury should send the list of names to form the committee to their friends, and that they should throw those lists into the glass upon the table. Would a committee thus appointed afford any satisfaction? Why should this committee report? They had a right to report only the contents of the bag. He was curious certainly to know the contents of the bag, but any one man could do this as well as another: but that same committee were to give a report on the subject. He begged to repeat: a committee, a secret committee, specially chosen by ministers, were to try, to judge, and to report the conduct of ministers. (Hear, hear.) Ministers were invested with most extraordinary authority. They suspended the habeas corpus—they acted under the suspension as they pleased—they were now going to cover themselves with a bill of indemnity. This was a juggle to screen themselves, to find indemnity against themselves. To shut our mouths, they say, "Here is our bag, touch it who dare." (Hear, hear, hear.) He would proceed no further: he had said enough to satisfy the house and the whole country, that there never was a measure brought before parliament that exceeded so much the bounds of fairness and common decency. (Loud cheering.)

Mr. Bathurst begged to remind the right hon. gentleman that he had himself been one of the administration that brought forward a similar measure in 1801; and although a right hon. gentleman then opposed it, it passed. The committee were not bound to report according to the pleasure of ministers; the words were "to report as it shall appear to them, to the house." In the former instance to which he had alluded, there had been a suspension and an indemnity. Not only was an indemnity prudent, but it was absolutely founded on the necessity of the case. The right hon. gentleman had recourse again to the old argument, that none of the higher ranks had been implicated in suspicion. This had not been pretended. In the reports of both houses they were described as middle ranks, lower classes, or some such terms. Ministers had a right to refer to what had been prevented, as well as to what had been resisted. When they called upon them for convictions, they had a right to shew the peace of the country preserved. In the trials which terminated in convictions, the right hon. gentleman could only see the great talents of one of the counsel. As to spies, the government might throw the odium upon inferior magistrates who sent their informations to them. There was a great mass of people whose object was not any particular reform, but the overthrow of the government. This was explained and proved in several instances; but the right hon. gentleman had no other memory of these but the abilities of one of the counsel. All were convicted upon trial, or confessed their guilt. They had expected support from various parts of the country, and that support was prevented by the suspension of the habeas corpus. Those taken up in other places were the leaders, according to the information of persons locally best acquainted with them. It had been said that a committee by ballot was appointed by the treasury. It was, however, only the recommendation of certain persons to the house. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.) The objections had been ably answered by the late Mr. Windham; he would not repeat his answer. It was only the choice of the majority against the minority. In all former committees, there were many gentlemen of different sentiments and opinions from ministers. Some, too, had often been proposed to be added, and the sense of the house taken. The decision of the majority was the decision of the house, and gentlemen on the other side might take the sense of the house if they pleased. The right hon. gentleman had traduced persons alluded to, in language not parliamentary, and particularly if he alluded to a person (Oliver) to whom he supposed allusion to have been made. That person had excited to no improper act, and done no harm, but he had done much good to the public. A late lamented member of that house (Mr. Ponsonby) had been satisfied that such was this person's conduct. He had, by accident, come into the society of persons who plotted against the government, and ministers wished him to continue to associate with them, in order to obtain a knowledge of their plans. It was necessary that he should seem to approve of their conduct; but he denied that he had, in any way, instigated them to violence. He would not follow the right hon. gentleman through every part of his speech, for that would draw him into too great a length: but he would tell the house, that the only question was, the reference to the committee, and to that no objection was made.

Mr. Tierney explained. He had never so reflected on the legal proceedings at Derby as to say that no evidence of criminal proceedings had been produced. What he had said was, that the facts which came to light were such as shewed the suspension act to have been utterly unnecessary.

Mr. F. Douglas said, he could not pass over this opportunity of entering his solemn protest against the form of proceeding which it now appeared to be the intention of ministers to adopt. He held it to be equally dangerous and disgraceful to the character of the House of Commons. If the noble lord was determined to account to no other tribunal than that which should be so composed, he should prefer to see a committee formed entirely of his own friends, and carried by the undisguised force of a majority. (Hear, hear.) Any course would be better than that of attempting to palm upon the country, as a fair and impartial inquiry, a contrivance of this description. He saw no resemblance between the cases of the proposed committee and that of the year 1801; for the present seemed to have no other object whatever than that of laying the foundation of a bill of indemnity for sheltering the ministers of the crown from the legal consequences of their own acts. It was argued, that if there was any appearance of management and fraud in this proceeding, it was generally known and understood. For his own part, however, he thought all such appearances, and what were sometimes called pious frauds, were much better avoided. Although they might be points of notoriety amongst themselves, they were considered as points of detection by the country, and whether justly or unjustly, served to bring into question the honour of the house, which, like the honour of a woman, should be maintained above suspicion. He objected altogether to the principle of forming committees by ballot; but in no case could it be so exceptionable as in that now under consideration. If the former committee of secrecy had been selected for the purpose of conferring a certain degree of despotism on the ministers of the crown, were ministers likewise to have the power of naming those who should investigate and decide upon their conduct in exercising such a trust? (Hear, hear.) He had even heard what it was with difficulty he could believe, that it was intended to place some gentlemen who were actually in office upon this committee, or, in other words, that the criminals should sit in judgment upon themselves. This, he must say, would be an open insult on the understanding of the people; and he put it to the candour, and to the high and honourable feelings of the noble lord himself, whether he would not consider it due to his own character, if that should be individually brought into question, even by the most obscure accuser, to appeal to the most impartial tribunal, and demand the most extensive inquiry. Why, then, as a minister, owing a responsibility to the representatives of the people, should he now shrink from an investigation by means of these petty contemptible expedients? It was the duty of that house to consider well the important rights that were about to be involved in these proceedings. On the verdict of this committee would depend, whether the individuals who had been arrested and kept in confinement by virtue of the suspension act should, by their action of false imprisonment, recover compensation for the injuries they had sustained; and what might be still more valuable to them, recover their station and character in society. The members of it would, therefore, have a judicial as well as political function to discharge; and every individual who should be affected by their decision had a right to be heard in his own vindication. (Hear, hear.) They had a right to know that their claims and interests were not disposed of by the very persons of whose conduct they complained. He must repeat, that he would rather see the committee altogether composed of a junto of the noble lord's friends, amongst whom he might be sure of triumph, whilst he,

> "Like Cato, gave his little senate laws,
> "And sat attentive to his own applause."

(A laugh.) But if he really desired to be acquitted to the satisfaction of the country, he would consent at once to the formation of a committee chosen impartially and armed with effectual powers.—He should not have detained the house with any further observations, had it not been for one or two points in the speech of the right hon. gentleman who had last spoken. Although he certainly compassionated the fate of the unfortunate men who had been brought to punishment at Derby, he knew of nothing in the trials or convictions to which any blame could be attached. The existence of a conspiracy, arising out of Luddism, and the preceding apathy of government, was sufficiently established. But it afforded, at the same time, the strongest proof that no new legislative measure had been required for the correction of the evil. The insurrection had, in fact, been put down, not by the civil or the military power, but by the energy of a single individual—the overseer of the Butterley iron-works, who scolded half the conspirators away. He must here allude to another circumstance which had a strong tendency to bring those prosecutions into discredit and disrepute—he meant the extraordinary array of counsel provided for conducting them. (Hear, hear.) The crown was not content on this occasion with retaining the counsel who usually practised on the midland circuit, but retained others from London, so as to excite a suspicion that it was done, not for the advantage of their talents, but for the purpose of neutralizing them, and preventing their being brought into action on the other side. With regard to Oliver, he was far from thinking that the right hon. gentleman had made out his case. He could easily understand the employment of spies in places with which they were necessarily acquainted, and to which they had easy access; but a stranger could not act in this capacity, without carrying letters of introduction, and conveying favourable intelligence as to what was passing in other quarters. It was his belief, that the spies had done all the mischief; that they had made representations which they must have known to be unfounded; and that when they found disaffection, they produced conspiracy.

Mr. Bathurst observed, that what he had stated was, that Oliver went down in company with one of the principal conspirators, and by this means became acquainted with the designs that were in agitation among them.

Sir S. Romilly perfectly concurred in opinion with the noble lord that an inquiry was necessary, but he totally differed from him with regard to the nature of it. He believed that the proposed mode of proceeding was quite unprecedented, and though at times adopted without any direct message from the crown, never, except in contemplation of some precautionary legislative measures. Now, they had the highest authority for knowing, that no such measures were intended, for they had been declared to be unnecessary in the speech of the lords commissioners, representing the crown, on opening the present session of parliament. No man could believe that ministers proposed to apply for new powers, after the surrender of what they were before in possession of, and after the Attorney-General had moved to discharge the recognizances of persons who had previously entered into them, as the price of their liberation. The only object, then, of appointing this committee must be to lay the groundwork of a bill of indemnity, which, it was felt, must necessarily be preceded by at least the appearance of an inquiry, in the present state of public opinion. If any thing could surprise him in the conduct or language of ministers, he should have been surprised at hearing the noble lord describe a bill of indemnity as a sort of natural and necessary consequence arising out of the important trust which had been reposed in the servants of the crown. He wished those who generally supported his Majesty's ministers to reflect upon the situation in which they were placed. When they were first called upon to vest these extraordinary powers in the hands of the executive government, the noble lord told them, that ministers were deeply sensible of the awful responsibility which would attend the exercise of this trust. (Hear, hear.) Now, however, that the administration of the trust was to be considered, the house were informed that a bill of indemnity always followed a suspension of the constitution. He hoped the house would see the necessity of an ample investigation; that they would not suffer themselves to be deluded; that they would inquire when the danger, if danger there had been to the state, had ceased to exist; and whether parliament ought not to have been assembled at an earlier period. His Majesty's ministers had thought proper to use their own discretion, instead of appealing to the judgment of parliament with respect to the continuance of these extraordinary powers; and in not fulfilling the implied assurance, that they should not be retained one moment longer than was deemed necessary by parliament, had, indeed, assumed to themselves, to use their own expression, an awful responsibility. It appeared to him likewise important, that the grounds upon which the suspension act was passed should be re-examined, particularly as the report of the former committee had been avowedly founded upon the evidence of informers, with respect to whose proceedings there now existed no doubt whatever. The house should recollect the responsibility which itself owed to its constituents, and not be deluded into a belief that a ballot was proposed for any other purpose than for securing a bill of indemnity. The common and decent forms of the house were abandoned, when ministers, whose conduct alone was in question, were themselves to select the judges of it. When a charge was brought against an individual member, after making his defence, he usually retired, without any further share in the discussion, or interfering with the result of it by his vote. He was surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman assert, that the trials at Derby had fully established the necessity of the suspension act; for if there was one thing more remarkable than another in the course of those trials, it was, that the counsel for the crown studiously avoided, although challenged to it by the prisoners' counsel, to say one word about the origin of the conspiracy, or in disproof of the allegation of its having been caused by the agents of government. He must say, that he thought the Attorney-General, by this conduct, had discharged his duty to ministers better than his duty to the public; and it was not wonderful that it should have confirmed the suspicions which had been previously excited. How could the convictions which had taken place at Derby shew that the habeas corpus act had been wisely suspended, when the ordinary administration of the laws in this case had produced its full effect in the discovery and punishment of guilt? It was too plain, indeed, that the guilt had been suggested and encouraged by men who, with the zeal of religious missionaries, but with a very different design, went about propagating evil, insinuating themselves into the confidence of the poor and the distressed, visiting them at their looms and forges, and with hypocritical sympathy inflaming discontent to desperation. Ministers were seldom slow to convert disaffection to themselves into disaffection to the constitution, or to reward as for good services those who laboured to convert the one into the other for the purpose of afterwards betraying their victims. He could not believe that the house would discharge its duty, or satisfy the expectations of the country, if it did not, by a minute inquiry and the fullest disclosure of all these transactions, make some atonement for the dangerous precedent which they had been induced in the last session to establish. Great as the evil was which had been inflicted on the unhappy persons who had been torn from their families and cast into dungeons, it was little when compared to the mischief which had been done to the constitution. He was anxious to see the poison of the example in some degree taken away, lest it should become the fruitful parent of still greater evils in future times. The house should consider how precedents were always looked to, and ask of themselves, whether the ministers of the crown would last session have encountered the opposition which was made to the measure, if any such a precedent had been previously in existence? Might not some future prince, perhaps of the house of Brunswick, but choosing to act upon the principles of the Stuarts, preferring the imitation of foreign despots to the acquirement of the affections of his own subjects, assisted by ministers who would not scruple to make themselves the instruments of his designs, pervert to some fatal use a precedent of this nature, established at a period when no war, no foreign invasion, no domestic rebellion, no pretender to the throne, could be urged as the excuse or justifying cause? The calamity might, perhaps, not occur, till the grave should have closed over both those who now enjoyed the favour of the crown, and those who were endeavouring to discharge an unthankful duty. But were they on this account to lose sight of the interests, the happiness, and the liberty of succeeding generations? It had been truly stated by an hon. baronet, (Sir F. Burdett) that if the habeas corpus act was to be suspended on such pretences, it might as well be rescinded altogether from the statute-book. (see page 71.) Of what advantage was it to the subject, except in periods of agitation, when grievances were severely felt, and when the prevailing discontents, as must always be the case in a free country, were loudly expressed? In times of perfect tranquillity, a government had no motive for depriving individuals of their liberty. A most dangerous example had, however, been now, for the first time, established under the regency of his Royal Highness; and if its evil tendencies were not corrected by parliament, it might, at no very distant day, materially change the constitution, and with it, the character of Englishmen for ever. He should only add, that there was no reason whatever for secrecy at present; and that the only object, therefore, of a secret committee must be to procure a bill of indemnity.

Mr. Philips observed, that one of the charges against the disaffected was, that they laboured to bring the House of Commons into contempt; but nothing could so effectually reduce them in the public opinion as the partial election of a tribunal which was constituted for such a purpose as that now under consideration. With regard to the assertion, that the suspension act had secured the tranquillity of the country, he was persuaded that that tranquillity had never been disturbed, except at the instigation of informers, whose dismissal from their employment would of itself have immediately restored it. It was understood, that the conspiracy had first been entered into in the county of Lancaster. He had no doubt that the plots and conspiracies in Lancashire might be traced to spies and informers. So far as his own inquiries extended, he found reason to rely firmly on that opinion. The county, he allowed, had been disturbed, but it had been disturbed chiefly by the measures taken by government, and the agents they employed for the purpose of tranquillizing it. He thought his Majesty's ministers might have learned a lesson on the late occasion, from what happened in 1812, when dreadful confusion ensued from the employment of the same means that were last year resorted to. It now appeared, that the plots which then alarmed the country were principally to be traced to the agency of the persons sent to detect them. The letters of Dr. Taylor, who was then residing at Bolton, and who now lives at Liverpool, proved satisfactorily, that the plots in question were to be attributed to spies. He allowed that great weight was due to the opinions of the magistracy of the country, and to the information they communicated; but he did not think that, in all cases, their opinion or their information was implicitly to be relied upon. The magistrates themselves were liable to considerable delusion from the principles by which they were actuated, and the rumours to which they listened; and therefore, honestly intending to perform their duty, could not always be depended upon in their reports of the state of their districts. If, for instance, a magistrate professing himself a member of an Orange society, resided in districts abounding with Roman catholics, his impression of the conduct of the people in his neighbourhood ought to be received with some degree of suspicion, and his representations interpreted with latitude. The Lancashire plots in 1812 excited the greatest alarm; but to shew that they were alarming principally from the misrepresentations which were given of them, and the means taken to suppress them, it was only necessary to refer to the opinions of those who had made the most inquiry concerning them, who all concurred in considering them as grossly exaggerated. Great incredulity now prevailed with regard to their existence in the part of the country whose tranquillity they were said to have endangered. He had no doubt that the late plots would turn out equally to have been fabricated by the agents employed to detect and expose them. If conspirators, who were spoken of in the report of the committee as having entertained the design of overpowering the civil authorities and of burning Manchester, were really guilty of having formed such an atrocious project, and were arrested on proper evidence of their guilt, why were they not brought to trial? Should men engaged in such plots have been liberated and restored to society to hatch similar atrocities? Should they have been sent back to their places of abode, without any attempt to make them expiate their alleged crimes? Nay, by the course pursued with regard to them, they had now become more dangerous than ever; and if guilty, it was a more imperious duty on the government to bring them to justice. They now returned with the character, not of conspirators, but with the reputation of martyrs in the cause of liberty; and their dangerous influence, if there really had ever been any danger, was incalculably increased by their imprisonment. From the means employed by government to preserve tranquillity, and from the wicked agency of the persons they sent to the agitated districts, he was rather surprised that, where so much distress and discontent prevailed, real mischief did not ensue, than that there was so much disturbance. This, he was convinced, would appear when a proper inquiry was instituted; not by a secret committee deciding on papers produced and assorted by those whom the inquiry would affect, but by a committee of a different description. As far as he could learn the state of the county of which he was speaking, the people were in the greatest distress from scarcity of subsistence and want of employment; and in this crisis were taught to associate their sufferings with the measures of the legislature, and to expect relief from parliamentary reform. While between 8 and 900,000 people were in this situation, and looking out for any means of relief, spies and informers were sent among them, to exasperate their discontents, and to encourage them in their delusions. Had a different course been adopted, had means been employed to enlighten their minds on the causes of their distress, and to sooth their feelings by confidence and kind treatment, the late measures would not have been necessary, and the public tranquillity would have been preserved, without the suspension of the great bulwark of our rights.

Mr. Wynn thought, that though the question now before the house opened a door for the discussion of the whole subject regarding the state of the country since the last session, yet that it might be convenient to postpone so general a topic to another opportunity. After the votes he had given last session, he felt himself called upon to state his opinion of the conduct he then pursued, as far as the grounds of it had been affected by events that had since occurred; and he was free to declare, that his conviction of the necessity of the suspension act remained unchanged; that it had been confirmed by every thing that passed in the country, and by all the evidence that was disclosed on the trials alluded to; that it had averted threatened danger, and that by it the country had been preserved from confusion. (Hear, hear.) It had been said, that if the ministers had taken advantage of it, they might have prevented the disturbances that broke out in Derbyshire. (No, no, from the opposition.) He had understood an hon. and learned friend to say, that by apprehending the ringleaders of the insurrection in Derbyshire at an earlier period, under the suspension act, the mischief would not have followed; but however that might be, it was not a proper argument against a measure of prevention, that the evil did not occur which it was intended to prevent. If no disturbance had subsequently happened, the preservation of the public tranquillity might be owing to the very cause, the operation of which was attempted to be proved unnecessary, by the existence of that tranquillity which was its effect. It had been said on the trials at Derby, that the prisoners expected co-operation from the north and from various quarters. He believed that their hopes were not without foundation. He believed, from evidence gained on other trials, and by other means, that bands from Manchester, Yorkshire, and other places, were prepared to break out about the same time. In Yorkshire, an insurrection did take place; an armed mob fired upon the King's troops, and the greatest disturbances were threatened. If it be replied to this, that there was no conviction, he would say, that though, from the darkness of the night, and the difficulty of identifying the persons who had assembled to commit the acts of violence, a verdict could not be obtained against them, yet the fact of the insurrection was no less true and undoubted. It had been asked by an hon. and learned friend of his (Sir S. Romilly,) why the evidence connecting the prisoners at Derby with other associations had not been brought forward on the trial? He thought this question was easily answered without affecting the truth of such a combination. Enough was brought out, enough was proved to convict the unhappy men in question; and it would have been superfluous to have called more evidence. He even saw the propriety of not trying these men for the plot, when sufficient facts could be established for their conviction. Supposing the prisoners had been taken up immediately after their meetings and arrangements, supposing that the only witnesses against them had been those admitted to a knowledge of their secrets and intended projects, and supposing the charge of treason alone to have been grounded on their machinations against the public tranquillity without any overt acts, there was such an odium in the country at the time against accomplices who turned witnesses, that they would not have been believed. They would have been branded with the names of spies and informers, their evidence would have been heard with disgust, and their testimony entirely rejected. When the overt act and the intention could be proved, there was no necessity for going into all their previous counsels. He, therefore, thought that the prosecution behaved properly in not calling such extraneous evidence, and that no suspicion could be thrown on the policy of the suspension act by withholding it. This measure was extremely useful in preserving the public tranquillity, till the circumstances of the country were altered, and till the people, by the attainment of a more prosperous state, were withdrawn from the influence of those who exasperated their discontents into disaffection. With regard to the propriety of the ballot on the present occasion, he would merely observe that the ballot was resorted to for the election of a committee, because it was thought that some members who would not choose to act ostensibly against the administration, would yet vote against them under this cover of secrecy. He did not know if this would be the case, but at least such was the ground of its adoption. He did not, therefore, see how it could be more favourable to ministers to elect a committee by ballot, in preference to one by motion. If they had a majority, in both cases their committee would be appointed, and their favourable chance would not be increased by the former mode of nomination.

Sir W. Burroughs said, he did not at first intend to have addressed the house on the present occasion, but it appeared to him impossible to sit still while the suspension act was under discussion, and not to attempt an answer to what had fallen from the hon. and learned member who spoke last. That hon. member thought that subsequent events had completely justified the measure. He (Sir W. Burroughs) was of a different opinion, and he would state the grounds of that opinion. Looking at the reports on which the suspension act was grounded, he found, in the first, that a conspiracy was alleged to have been formed in London to burn the barracks, to storm the Tower, to seize upon the Bank, to destroy the bridges, and, in short, to overturn the government, and to subvert the order of society. But what were the facts that appeared on the trial of Watson in Westminster-hall? How did the evidence given on that occasion support the representations of the secret committee? The conspiracy was found to have been formed by two surgeons without employment, a man of broken fortunes, two cobblers, and the bully of a brothel. It did not appear that any person of respectability or influence favoured their projects, or partook of their counsels, or that they had any connexion with other conspirators or agitators in the country. Then there followed a second report, which omitted all mention of the conspiracy of the metropolis. The hand-bills, exciting to the murder of the Prince Regent and of the noble lord opposite, of which five thousand copies were said to have been prepared, were no where to be found. The seat of the conspiracy was, therefore, transferred to the north, and the disturbances which afterwards gave occasion to the trials at Derby were brought forward. But it appeared that this formidable insurrection was dispersed by the ordinary efforts of the magistrates; that the ringleaders were arrested, imprisoned, and brought to trial. The rising took place in June, the trials came on at Derby in October, and nothing happened in the interval to excite any alarm, or to call for the exercise of extraordinary powers. It was said by the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Wynn) that the evidence of previous plots and meetings was not necessary on these trials, but he begged leave to differ from him. The judges, in addressing the juries on that occasion, laid down the law, and very properly, in his opinion, that a rising for a general and public object constituted the crime for which the prisoners were indicted; and that the only questions on which they were called to decide, related to the overt act of the insurrection, and the general purpose. Now, to have established by evidence the connexion of the prisoners with other conspirators in different parts of the country, frequent meetings and common objects would have at once decided the nature of their design, which was the only thing on which there could remain a doubt, and the non-existence of which was the only circumstance on which their counsel rested their defence. If it had been shewn that they were acting in concert with persons at Manchester, at London, at Nottingham, or in Yorkshire, for overturning the government, the fact of their having committed high treason could not have been doubted for an instant. Why, then, was not such evidence brought forward? It was not difficult to discover the reason. Had the prosecution gone into testimony for this purpose, it would have appeared, that the insurrection had been arranged and encouraged by the agents of government. One of the unhappy men convicted on this occasion, nearly at his dying moment, when he might have been supposed to be inclined to speak the truth, and when he was assured that a falsehood could have no influence on his fate, imputed to the instigation of Oliver the crime for which he was about to suffer. But, said the Solicitor-General on a former night, why did not the learned counsel for the defence of the prisoners bring forward and examine this person, if his evidence was so important? The reason of this was obvious. He could not have been examined as to their consenting to commit treason, without proving the treason for which they were arraigned. He must have been the most dangerous witness they could have called; and, if they had produced him, they must have produced the means of their own conviction. The admission that they had consulted with him to overturn the government, would have amounted to a confession of their crime, and deprived them of all the means of defence. In the second report of the committee of secrecy, the scene was shifted from London to Manchester, where the conspirators were to burn the town, and massacre the inhabitants. If such were the designs of the men apprehended under the suspension act, how could ministers account to their country for having liberated them without a trial? On what plea could they be discharged, at first with the idle farce of taking their recognizances, and afterwards from their recognizances? If this was not a confession that the ministers had nothing to produce against the alleged traitors at Manchester, and that the evidence on which the report of the committee in which they were arraigned was unfounded, they incurred a heavy responsibility for sending back such dangerous characters into society. Their conduct was inexplicable on the supposition that the report was true, and the suspension act could not be justified on the ground that it was not. No events had happened since to justify such a measure. If he might advert to a melancholy event which had united the nation in one common expression of sorrow, he might draw from it an irresistible inference, that the minds of the people were sound, and that their attachment to the house of Brunswick remained unshaken. Never in any country was there more sincere or more general sympathy, and never did any nation more unequivocally testify their affection for the family of their sovereign. He could not agree that the election of a committee by ballot was so favourable to free inquiry as one by motion. Suppose a committee were to be elected by motion, the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst), as it was to decide on their own conduct, might feel a little delicacy in nominating themselves: whereas a ballot totally destroyed this feeling; and though the list was made by themselves, they might still be on it without offending any sense of propriety. That the proposed committee was intended to bring in a posthumous justification of the suspension act, there could be no doubt. Could any other object be conceived in the inquiry but an indemnity bill? The suspension act was abrogated; it could not be their intention to renew it. Did they mean to recommend the continuance of the seditious meetings bill? Was this to hang over the head of the people during the ensuing general election? An indemnity bill would certainly be the first measure, and the injustice of it required no exposition. It had been admitted by the hon. gentleman opposite, that the suspension act gave no new powers, but only authorised ministers to arrest persons, and postpone their trials till they could be brought on with greater security. This was the whole operation of the act, but the noble lord allowed that certain violations of law had taken place under it, and for these a bill of indemnity would be necessary. The consequence was, an admission that the parliament had confided to them certain discretionary powers which they had abused: that they had imputed suspicion to persons who had committed no crime: that they had imprisoned them, and after having exposed their characters and their lives, would allow them no legal redress.

Sir J. Sebright confessed that he gave his vote for the suspension bill last session, and that he did it with the most perfect belief of its necessity. In looking back at that vote, he could not impute any blame to himself. When he read the report on which the proceeding was grounded, he found he could not have acted otherwise: he was one of those who would always rally round the constitution, and strengthen the hands of government in any real danger, to put down conspiracy and treason. (Hear, hear, hear, from the ministerial benches.) He thought it now the more necessary to declare that he had read all the evidence that had come out on the trials which had subsequently taken place, and comparing that evidence with the report, he found that he had been grossly deceived. (Loud cries of hear from the opposition benches.) He did not mean to impute blame to the ministers, or to those who voted along with himself on that occasion: he believed that they might be deceived, as well as himself: nothing had since occurred to shew that there was even a pretence for suspending that great bulwark of our freedom. So far as he had been able to see, he thought there was no discontent or disturbance in the country, which might not have been checked by the regular powers of the law, and the ordinary vigour of the magistrates. The events, in his opinion, did not at all justify the extraordinary remedy which had been resorted to. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Ellison, adverting to what had been said by Sir William Burroughs respecting the confession of one of the convicts at Derby, said, that what Ludlam had mentioned about Oliver in his dying moments, was a gross falsehood put into his mouth, and which was believed to be false by all who heard him. He could state, that in the quarter from which he came, emissaries had been sent from Derby and Nottingham to disturb the quiet people of his neighbourhood. The suspension act was, in his opinion, necessary; but if ministers could not make out a good case of justification as to the exercise of the discretionary powers intrusted to them, he pledged himself that he would vote against them.

Mr. Saville considered the country as much improved since last year, in its commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests, but he could not altogether give the ministers credit for its amelioration. The hints, the strong hints which they had received from parliament, induced them to take the measures of economy and retrenchment which had been so successful. He would always give this influence of parliament on the conduct of ministers as an answer to reformers, both within and without the house. So long as ministers attended to the voice of parliament, they should have his support: he wished to be considered as an independent man, and when he gave his support to ministers he gave it on general grounds. He had never wished to be considered as desiring a place from ministers. (A laugh.) He came into parliament perfectly unbiassed, and he should always consider an independent voice in such an assembly as a greater glory than any situation that could be conferred upon him. He had no wish to stand well with ministers. (A laugh.) He wished to stand well with the respectable part of mankind in general, and was not indifferent to the vox populi. He thought every man should be considered as independent, however he might change his opinion, who did not go from one side of the house to the other for his own benefit. (A general laugh.) He had now had a seat in this assembly for eleven years, and he could safely say, that he had never got any thing for his vote. (A laugh.) He had been accused of inconsistency, for having voted against the ministers in the last session; and he had been told that his opposition was imputed to a refusal on the part of ministers of a situation for a diplomatic friend of his. He disclaimed such a motive. He had got a seat in this assembly on independent principles: he had received an independent fortune from his father, and he would never disgrace either by sacrificing his independence. (Laughter.)

Mr. Forbes did not think that the measures which his Majesty's ministers had adopted had been by any means uncalled for or unnecessary, though he considered that some different use might have been made of them. If they had been employed in stopping the proceedings of many of those persons who had been in the habit of attending public meetings, and of making inflammatory speeches to the public, it might have been better. The persons to whom he alluded went about encouraging the lower orders to rise in opposition to all order; and he could not but confess, that he would rather have seen some of those men apprehended, than some who had been only excited to do what they did, by their speeches. Had such been the case, he was convinced that it would have met with the approbation of a very large portion of the country. He trusted that that house would never again be called upon to join in the passing of such measures; but if they should, he hoped that they would do their duty as they did upon the former occasion, and meet as they did with the highest approbation from all those who might be considered sober and upright people.

The question was then put and agreed to, as were the questions that the committee should be a committee of secrecy, and should consist of 21 members.

On the question "that the committee be chosen by way of ballotting,"

Mr. Brougham rose and said, he did not mean to press any other motion upon the house, but merely to state to them the grounds on which for one, he could not agree with that then under consideration. He passed over all the very cogent reasons which had been urged by the hon. member for Banbury (Mr. Douglas) on the subject, as well as what had been said by other hon. members. But upon a question so solemn and serious, and so really and vitally important, he wished to be satisfied upon one point: and that was, how the house could be got out of one difficulty by the mode of ballot. To those who approved of the motion for a secret committee, and that that committee should consist of a certain number, and that the papers should be submitted to that committee, he would offer this question: was the noble lord (Castlereagh) a fit person to sit upon such committee? He would put it to the noble lord himself, whether he was the fittest person in the world to sit upon that committee as a member to try whether or not certain persons should be deprived of their right of action against himself? He might ask, why it was not probable that he might not be one of the parties to any action that might be brought by any of these men? Why might he not be a party upon the face of the very record itself? Suppose any member should wish to put the question to the house, that he or any other man should be a member of that committee, he wished to know how the mode of appointment by ballot left them at liberty to discuss such a question? And if the noble lord would point out to him any source or means by which the sense of the house could be obtained, that method being pursued, then the objection would lose the force which at present it seemed to him to possess. But according to the mode adopted last session, and according to the common method, there was no possibility of discussing any question, upon any individual name.

Mr. Canning said, he did not mean to occupy the house at any length, but he really considered that the difficulty which the hon. member had stated might be very easily removed. It was not to be supposed that the name of any member would be found upon the list for any committee, unless a majority of the house should have decided that it should be there; and what the difficulty was, but that in that case the minority could not turn round upon the majority, he was unable to comprehend. The question seemed to him to be easily set at rest, when it appeared that, in every instance where the House of Commons had had to take similar subjects into consideration, the committee had been appointed in this way; and, indeed, he confessed that the argument was very conclusive in his mind against the hon. member; for if there were one method more than another adapted to the purposes of those who might agree to enter on an individual discussion, or a discussion upon a question on an individual name, and to do that in a way in which there might be least difficulty, it was the method by ballot, from the very nature of the invention, by which that might be accomplished. It was true, they managed these things now without all that mysteriousness which had belonged to them in former times. He was old enough to remember the time when there were two lists in circulation, instead of one, upon every ballot.—(Hear, hear, from the ministerial benches.) He was old enough to recollect, that as regularly as one list came from the treasury, another proceeded from the opposition; and those two lists were handed through the house, producing a wonderful correspondence between the parties, much more, indeed, when the committees were appointed in that secret manner, than if they had been proposed by any other method. The power of discussing a question upon an individual name was plainly just as great, one way as another. There might be some question raised in connexion with the orders of the house; but the thing was hardly worth arguing; he thought, indeed, it was needless, considering that it had been uniformly the practice, to have such committees appointed as the present was proposed to be.

Mr. Brougham thought that the right hon. gentleman had entirely misunderstood him: he was entirely mistaken, (and if Lord Sidmouth were to be present, he would have addressed himself to him, or to the right hon. gentleman not in his place, whom he considered as more immediately connected with the noble lord's department)—he was mistaken in supposing that the noble lord's name would not be in the committee, unless the question were put and decided by a majority of the house. The noble lord would only have a relative majority: and he might well be considered in a minority, with a very hollow majority, if it came to be thoroughly examined; for he had only to put more voices than other persons had upon the ballot, and his object was accomplished.

Mr. Tierney (amidst loud cries of question) said, he did not think that his hon. friend's question had been satisfactorily answered. It struck him to be, whether any time would be allowed for discussing the propriety of the noble lord being suffered to sit on the committee, supposing the noble lord should be appointed a member of the committee. That, as it appeared to him, was the question to be decided.

The house then divided—

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Feb. 6.

IRISH GRAND JURIES ACT SUSPENSION BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and committed for Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 6.

The Right Hon. Frederick Robinson, president of the board of trade, and treasurer of the navy*, took the oaths and his seat for Ripon.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Lord Folkestone presented the following petition of John Knight, of Manchester, in the county of Lancaster, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

"That although the petitioner is unconscious of any crime or breach of law by him committed, yet in the night between the 8th and 9th of March, 1817, his house was forcibly entered, his family, which consists of a lame wife, five children, and a dependent niece, disturbed and terrified by a posse of police officers, who searched his house, and carried off such books and papers as they thought proper; that, after this nocturnal visit, the petitioner was prevailed upon to quit his home and family and retire to the house of a friend; that, on the evening of the 29th of March, the petitioner was arrested by a constable of Sowerby, in the county of York, and by him taken to his the constable's house in Sowerby; that this constable refused to shew his warrant, and when urged thereto by the petitioner, he talked of his pistols, and shouted for his assistants; that about one o'clock in the morning of the 31st of March, the petitioner was called out of bed by Mr. Naden, the deputy constable of Manchester, and by him was ordered to be handcuffed, and so conveyed to the New Bayley, Manchester, where he was confined in a cell eight feet by six and a half, (in which were two beds) from Monday morning early until late on Saturday night, during which time he was not four hours out of doors; that his chief food was bread and cheese and a quart of beer per day; that his wife was not permitted to see him; that he wrote to the magistrates one day, and the next day to the boroughreeve and constables, requesting to be informed of what and by whom he was accused, but received no answer from either of them; that on Sunday morning the 6th of April, the petitioner was heavily ironed, and so conveyed to London, 182 miles; that whilst in a public house in Bow Street, the landlord thereof said to the petitioner, that if he had any friend in town to whom he wished to write, his son should convey the letter; in consequence of this proposal the petitioner wrote two letters, one of which he addressed to Sir F. Burdett, the other to the hon. H. G. Bennet, which letters he saw in the hands of the under secretary of state the same afternoon, when he was ordered to Tothill Fields Bridewell until the ensuing Wednesday; that on Wednesday the 9th of

* On the appointment of this gentleman to the office of treasurer of the navy, the salary was reduced from 4,000*l.* to 3,000*l.* a year.

April the petitioner was again brought to the secretary of state's office, where no questions were asked him relative to his supposed offence, nor any thing stated to him on that subject, yet he was committed to close and solitary confinement on suspicion of high treason; that about four o'clock in the afternoon of the 10th of April, the petitioner was taken from Tothill Fields, where he had been kindly treated, and was removed to Reading gaol; on the road the petitioner saw a newspaper which mentioned his arrival at the secretary of state's office the day before, and added, that the papers found in his trunk were of a treasonable nature, although in fact the only papers therein at that time were a list of the articles of raiment it contained, and copies of two love-songs, which songs so pleased the keeper of Tothill Fields Bridewell, that he requested the petitioner to give him copies of them, which he did; on shewing this newspaper paragraph to Mr. Atkins, the Bow Street officer, and asking him how such a falsehood could get there? he said, "that a guinea might do such a thing as that;" the petitioner, astonished, then asked him if any body would get a guinea for writing such a downright lie? he replied, "he should not wonder if they did;" that on the petitioner's arrival at Reading gaol, together with two other state prisoners, about half-past nine o'clock in the evening, it was with the utmost difficulty, and after much expostulation, that they obtained a supper, although they stated to the keeper that they had come about forty miles without food; that on the following morning a turnkey came to the petitioner, and said the governor could only give them the county allowance (i. e. bread and water) until he got further orders; the petitioner then requested to have some coffee to breakfast, and also to see the governor; the three state prisoners were then conducted into a common prison-room, into the upper story of which were put for their use two beds stuffed with straw, and no bolsters whatever; in this manner they were lodged, and here they remained for sixteen days; coffee was brought for breakfast, and in the course of the forenoon some mutton, potatoes, &c. &c. which they cooked for themselves; during these sixteen days, the petitioner paid for some things, others they procured from (what is called in prisons) the shopman, and some others the keeper sent in; on the 16th of April, they were informed that their allowance was a guinea a week each, and which they might lay out as they pleased; then they thought they could save some money towards clothing, or for their families; for sixteen days they had nothing but water to drink, and never could obtain either reckoning or settlement with the governor, nor could the petitioner get reimbursed the money he had paid for the joint use of the three state prisoners, until the very moment he left that place; on the 27th of April, without their being consulted or their consent asked, they were informed that in future they were to have dinners from the governor's table, and have a pint of beer per day, breakfast, &c. they must cook for themselves as heretofore; at this time they were separated, and put into different and better rooms, the sash-windows of which were previously and purposely nailed down, although they were well barricadoed on the outside with strong iron bars: for eighteen days after the petitioner and his fellow prisoners were separated, they had only a pint of beer per day, afterwards they had two pints per day; here the petitioner never could obtain a candle, even at his own expense; that on the 9th of July the petitioner was removed to Salisbury gaol, where he was put into a small, gloomy, stinking felons' cell, and surrounded by noisy, brutal prisoners of that description; that on his arrival at this gaol, all his letters and papers, even to a roll of blank paper, were taken from him; here, for several days, he could obtain only water to drink, nor ever could procure either knife or fork to eat with; this place was so ill ventilated that it ruined his health in a few hours; he spoke to the gaoler, and requested a better room; was told there was none to be had; on the 11th of July, the petitioner wrote to the secretary of state, informing him of the situation in which he was placed, and of the ruined state of his health, requesting also to be removed: which request was, on the 18th of the same month, complied with, when he was removed to Worcester; here again the petitioner was confined two nights and one day in a small cell, whilst a room was prepared for his reception; in this room his health soon recovered, because it was much larger than the Salisbury cell, the air was good, and he could admit it at pleasure; here, however, he was never more than half an hour per day out of doors, and many days never out at all; here also the petitioner had to write four times to the governor before he could obtain a candle, and at last only obtained a small one for each night, which would not burn three hours, even in the depth of winter; that a short time before the petitioner's liberation he wanted a garment made, and so rigorously strict were his keepers in keeping him from his fellow-creatures, that before a tailor could have access to him it was deemed necessary to produce a justices's order for that purpose, and the petitioner was told that this delayed the tailor's visit more than a week, and whenever the petitioner mentioned his want of clothing to his keepers, he was told he might have the prison uniform whenever he pleased; that on the 31st of December, after more than nine months' close, and, generally, solitary confinement, the petitioner was informed that his liberation was come, and that he would be instantly discharged on the same terms as others, that is, by giving his own recognizance for 100*l.*, to appear in the Court of King's Bench next term, which condition he accepted; he was only allowed two pounds for his journey home, more than one hundred miles, and which would not pay the inside fare of the coach, although it was in the depth of winter, and the petitioner advanced in years, and also after such a long and close confinement; that during the petitioner's confinement, several letters, which he addressed to his wife and children, and also several which they addressed to him, were never delivered according to their superscriptions; that on the 6th or 7th of January, 1818, the petitioner wrote to the secretary of state, requesting to be informed whether his attendance in the Court of King's Bench would be required, but receiving no answer, therefore he deemed it necessary to hold himself in readiness to attend the said Court; that about twelve o'clock on the 21st day of January, the first day of term being the 23d, the petitioner was verbally informed that the secretary of state had sent a letter to the police office, Manchester, which said, "that the state prisoners mentioned therein need not go to London, as they would not be called upon;" that in consequence of this information, although himself and three others had engaged a coach for London, the petitioner, with Samuel Drummond, went to the police, and was again told he needed not to go to London; he then asked if the recognizances were set aside or nullified; they were then told that they would have printed copies of his lordship's letter that night; the petitioner and Drummond said, "that would not do, as they had engaged coach for three o'clock, they must therefore be satisfied on that point immediately, or they would feel themselves obliged to go to London;" they were answered they "might go to hell if they pleased," and ordered out of the room; they however staid whilst the letter was sent for and brought, but were not permitted to read it; however, it was read to them; after which the petitioner again inquired if they, the magistrates, were authorized by that letter to set aside the recognizances; Mr. Evans, a magistrate and counsellor at law, in a rage replied, "We will not tell you, it is not our business to put any construction on his lordship's words;" having said so, he hurried out of the room; that therefore the petitioner, at a great and inconvenient expense, and at the great hazard of his health, came to London; that being arrived there, Mr. Johnstone, Mr. Bagguley, Mr. Drummond, and himself, addressed a note to Lord Sidmouth, requesting an interview on the subject of their recognizances, but his lordship refused to see them; they therefore immediately went to the Court of King's Bench, and individually claimed of the court either to be tried or to have their recognizances set aside and discharged; they were informed (to their astonishment) by the court, that they (the court) could neither do the one nor the other, having no charge against them, nor having the power to nullify their recognizances; that therefore at a great expense the petitioner felt it necessary to attend the said court from the 23d to the 31st of January, 1818, when the attorney-general was prevailed upon to move for the discharge of all the state prisoners' recognizances; that the petitioner has been repeatedly wantonly and wickedly vilified, calumniated and slandered in the public papers, his business quite deranged and ruined, his body vastly impaired by his long and close imprisonment, and his family and pecuniary affairs incalculably injured, and that this is the second time he has so suffered, and for the same cause, namely the promotion of a reform in the house; that in the year 1812, the petitioner when in company with more than thirty others, for the sole purpose of forwarding petitions to the Prince Regent and the house, were broke in upon and seized by the police officers of Manchester, aided by armed soldiers, who conducted the whole to prison, and on the deliberately wilful and false oath of an hired spy, they were committed to Lancaster, being thirty-eight in number, most of them heads and fathers of families, and there stood a fourteen hours' trial on an ignominious but groundless charge; and, although acquitted, the petitioner was thereby separated from his family twelve weeks, and also his affairs completely deranged." The petitioner, therefore, earnestly prayed that the house would take his case into their serious and candid consideration, and not only refuse to pass the indemnity bill, but bring those ministers and magistrates to justice who had so wantonly and cruelly violated the liberties and privileges of Englishmen in the person of the petitioner."

Lord Folkestone then presented the following petition of Samuel Haynes, of Nottingham, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—"That the petitioner was on Thursday morning, June 19th, 1817, without any provocation on his part, taken out of a bed of sickness, handcuffed and guarded to a prison, and locked up in a dreary, damp and gloomy cell; what then must have been the surprise and astonishment of the petitioner when he was locked up in such a horrible den of misery, and in a bad state of health, when at the same time he was conscious he had never done an injury to any man? On the Saturday following it was communicated to the petitioner that he was to go to London; the petitioner civilly asked when and what for, but received no answer, but on Saturday afternoon a chaise came to the prison door, when the prisoner was fetched out of his den of misery, and chained hand and foot to a person of the name of Francis Ward, and was conveyed to London to Lord Sidmouth's office, when his lordship rose and addressed the prisoner in nearly the following words: 'You, Samuel Haynes, are brought here, charged upon oath of high treason: you will be taken from here into close confinement, and there kept till you are delivered by a due course of law, and you will have due notice to prepare for your trial, and you will have the names of evidence against you, &c.; and if you have got any thing to say we will hear you;' the petitioner told his lordship he had nothing to say for he knew nothing about any body's business but his own; his lordship then sat down, and the petitioner retired with a heart that leaped with gladness, for he fondly though vainly thought he should soon be brought before some tribunal of justice where he would have proved his innocence as clear as the noon-day sun; but on the Monday following, Mr. Atkins, keeper of Cold Bath Fields Prison, informed the petitioner he was to be sent to Lincoln Castle; when the petitioner with two other state prisoners arrived at Lincoln Castle, the petitioner with his two fellow prisoners was ordered to strip, and was strictly searched by the turnkey; the turnkey took the petitioner's watch, though not without the petitioner remonstrating with him at such an arbitrary proceeding; the petitioner was with his two unfortunate fellow prisoners put in a dismal-looking little habitation; the petitioner and his two fellow prisoners gave the turnkey some money to get some bread and cheese and some beer; when the petitioner with his two fellow prisoners had got their bread and cheese and beer, and had just begun to eat, the gaoler came in and said, the petitioner and his fellow prisoners must be separated immediately; the petitioner intreated the gaoler to let him and his unfortunate companions be together for half an hour while they partook of their refreshment; but no, the bread and cheese was pulled in three pieces and divided with the beer, while the petitioner with his two unfortunate companions gazed on each other with wonder and astonishment, and was instantly separated in three dreary apartments, and as it seemed then never to behold each other any more; what the petitioner felt at such merciless treatment, the house can better conceive than he can describe to them; night soon came on, and the petitioner was taken from his dreary habitation to a cell to sleep; having passed a melancholy and sleepless night, the next morning the petitioner was taken to his daily den of misery again; the petitioner being in a bad state of health, soon felt the pernicious effects of close and solitary imprisonment, for in five or six weeks he was reduced to a mere skeleton; it was then he began to contemplate his wretched situation, and could then perceive that Lord Sidmouth's promise concerning a trial was a mere delusion; in that dreary habitation that the petitioner had to pass away his murdered hours by day in cruel solitude, there was nothing but a wooden block to sit on; the petitioner's debility had so increased that he became so weak he could not sit up, and he asked several times for a chair, but he might as well have asked the winds for a chair; so the petitioner contrived to put his block in a corner of his den, and prop himself between the two walls; the petitioner requests the serious attention of the house to this point; now let them fancy for a moment they are peeping into the dismal habitation of the petitioner in Lincoln Castle, there beholding a poor forlorn and helpless fellow-creature, brooding over his misfortunes in gloomy solitude; ah! cruel remembrance! the petitioner in this deplorable situation, his death being daily expected, wrote a letter to Lord Sidmouth, intreating his lordship to let his wife come and see him before he died, and at the same time solemnly declared his innocence to Lord Sidmouth, and told his lordship, that that base charge that he charged him with would never be proved against him, no, neither on earth nor in heaven; in a few days after the petitioner was liberated, and when he came home his ghastly appearance quite shocked his family and friends, and they all thought then that before this time he would have been sleeping in his grave; the petitioner has sent this petition to the house for their consideration, whether he must bear with such an outrageous, cruel and unprovoked attack on his person, as to be savagely dragged out of his bed in the dead of the night, and sent to a prison from a comfortable home, from a wife and six helpless and unprotected children, in this our boasted land of liberty and christianity; and the petitioner humbly requests leave to state to the house, that he views with regret the conduct of his oppressors, men who pretend to be true followers in the faith of him who expired on the cross in bitter agony by cruel torture on Mount Calvary; but whatever their pretensions may be to christianity, could they have a christian feeling when they coolly and deliberately ordered a fellow-creature into solitary imprisonment, there to remain, day after day, and week after week, in a bad state of health, as was the case of the petitioner, though in that deplorable state, pent up in a miserable dungeon, and deprived of the dearest privilege of society and the felicity of friendship: under all this oppression the petitioner must confess that he had some pleasing reflections in contemplating his own innocence, trusting that a time would come when he would be at liberty to lay his case before the house for their humane and serious consideration; the petitioner seeks not the punishment of his oppressors, though he has been distressed and brought to indigence by them, but he appeals to the humanity and protection of the house, to redress his injuries in being so wrongfully and cruelly persecuted; but if there are any members in the house who have a doubt on their minds as to the truth of this petition, then the petitioner most earnestly implores them to hear him at the bar of the house, as he is ready to prove every assertion contained in this petition."

WATCHMAKERS.] Lord Ossulston presented a petition of clock and watchmakers of the county of Berwick, respecting the distressed state of their trade, and praying that the tax of four pounds twelve shillings imposed on dealers in plate might not be exacted from them.

Mr. Brougham observed, that he could have wished to have heard some explanation as to the object of this petition from the other side of the house, and some assurances on the subject. The petitioners were artisans of a considerable county in Scotland, and felt their interests much aggrieved. Petitions to a similar effect had been presented to the house last year. The complaints related to a part of the system of heaping up taxes, in cases wherein ministers did not feel inclined to come in a direct, open, and honest way before parliament. The act by which the tax was imposed could never have been intended to apply to country watchmakers. Its intent was clearly applicable to dealers in plate. Now, the most eminent of such dealers, for instance, Messrs. Rundle and Bridge, paid only four pounds twelve shillings for a licence, which was no more than was required from a poor country watchmaker, who might sell one silver watch, worth but little, in the course of 12 months. That inequality could never have been intended. Acts of this description sometimes lay almost dormant, till it suited the convenience of ministers to resort to them with the view of taxation.

Mr. Lushington said, that government were not to blame for enforcing a tax which existed before they entered into office. It was exceedingly difficult in imposing such taxes as the present to make a graduated scale to meet such cases as the hon. member represented to be grievances.

Mr. Brougham explained. The act could not have been intended to apply in this way to watchmakers. It appeared that Mr. Pitt did not entertain that idea, as he understood that at one time that right hon. gentleman wished to propose a very moderate but general duty on the watchmaking trade; but that he had not thought that the licence for dealing in plate was applicable to watchmakers generally.

Mr. Long observed, that if there was any thing wrong in the matter, the proper way might be to move the repeal of the original act as far as it affected the question. But he could not see that, while the law existed, there could be any just accusation against government for acting upon it.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for ballotting for the secret committee, to which the papers on the internal state of the country were to be referred.

Mr. Tierney said, that in ballotting for the secret committee, the house would have very little trouble, as all the lists were proposed by ministers themselves. He hoped, however, that no gentleman would be named who was not in the habit of attending the house, and on whose attendance in the committee they might therefore calculate.

The order having been read, the clerk proceeded in the usual way to call over the names of members alphabetically. The first ministerial members who came forward with their lists were received with cries of hear, hear, from the opposition benches. The opposition members did not deposit any lists.

Mr. Speaker then observed, that the usual course of proceeding was, to read the names over again. (Several members of the opposition said, there was no occasion.)

Mr. Speaker stated, that this was usually done in order to give gentlemen an opportunity of stating any matter, as they might not have been present at the first reading by the clerk.

The clerk then read the names again; after which a committee was appointed, "to examine the lists, and to report to the house upon which twenty-one persons the majority had fallen." Mr. Brogden, Mr. Calcraft, &c. were named on this committee, and were ordered to withdraw immediately.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] Mr. Curwen moved for the following accounts:

1st. "Of all exchequer bills issued between the 5th January 1817, and the 6th January 1818, specifying the acts of parliament on which they were issued, and the amount issued under each of the acts."

2d. "Of all exchequer bills paid off within the same period."

3d. "Of all exchequer bills which remained to be issued on the 6th January 1818, specifying the acts of parliament, and the amount which remained to be issued under each of the acts."—Ordered.

WAYS AND MEANS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the order of the day, for the house going into a committee of ways and means.

Mr. Speaker having left the chair,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that he was about to call the attention of the committee to a subject of which he had already given notice. He had informed the house, that it was not his intention to propose, at this early period of the session, the grant of any other sums than the taxes which the house had been in the habit of granting from year to year, for a great length of time back, and a grant of exchequer bills to replace other exchequer bills now outstanding. The house would recollect, that in a committee of supply, they had lately voted 24 millions to make good exchequer bills issued last session and outstanding and unprovided for; and 6 millions to pay off the loan of the Bank to the government in 1816. He should now, however, merely propose the grant of the land and malt duties, and an issue of 30 millions to replace the above 24 millions of outstanding exchequer bills, and to pay off the loan from the Bank in 1816, of six millions. It would not be necessary to trouble them with any other vote till a later period of the session, when all the different services would be before the house.—He concluded with moving the following resolutions.

1. That towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty, "The duties upon malt, which by an act of the 57th year of his present Majesty have continuance to the 24th day of June 1818, be further continued and charged upon all malt which shall be made within Great Britain from the 23d day of June 1818 to the 24th day of June 1819."

2. That "the sum of four shillings in the pound and no more, be raised within the space of one year from the 25th day of March 1818, upon pensions, offices and personal estates, in that part of Great Britain called England, Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed."

3. That "the several duties imposed on sugar by three acts made in the 27th, 34th and 37th years of his present Majesty, on malt, by an act made in the 27th year of his said Majesty and the duties of excise on tobacco and snuff, by an act made in the 29th year of his present Majesty, which by an act made in the 57th year of his said Majesty have continuance until the 25th day of March 1818, be further continued until the 25th day of March 1819."

4. That "the sum of thirty millions be raised by exchequer bills for the service of the year 1818."

Mr. Tierney said, it appeared that the grant requisite would amount to 39 millions.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted, that the whole sum voted in the committee of supply on Wednesday last, was 39 millions:—24 millions for outstanding exchequer bills, 6 millions for the loan from the Bank, and 9 millions for outstanding exchequer bills. He now proposed to take only one vote of 30 millions, and to leave the remaining sum of 9 millions till a later period of the session.

Mr. Tierney said, it was desirable to know whether the 30,000,000*l.* would be enough to cover the expenses of the public service, so that no further application for money would be required before Easter. With respect to the amount for exchequer bills, it was for services voted, and for other purposes. Bills outstanding and unprovided for were to be paid off; but if such bills came in, he wished to know whether they would absorb the sum proposed. Would the grant, when added to the land and malt duties, be found sufficient for the purpose?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that payment of the exchequer bills was part of the service of the year.

Mr. Tierney said, that his wish was to know whether, if the bills came in before Easter, they would absorb the sum to be voted? Respecting the replacing of the outstanding bills, there was to be added to the grant, the produce of the land and malt duties. There was a sum to be paid off. Would the bills voted to be paid off absorb the sum voted, before Easter?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he understood the question of the right hon. gentleman; but it was difficult and scarcely possible to give it a precise answer. He could not exactly state what amount of exchequer bills might come in. They were liable to be paid off in four months.

Mr. Tierney was desirous to know whether the 6,000,000*l.* to the Bank were to be paid off in money? If they were paid in exchequer bills, the situation of the Bank with the public would remain the same as it was. His object at present, under all the circumstances, was to inquire and see, from day to day, what steps had been taken by the Bank towards the resumption of cash payments. He should assume, for any thing he knew or wished to know to the contrary, that it was the intention of the Bank to resume cash payments according to the act of parliament. For this object he was not informed of any step they had taken, except one, which he readily admitted, was a material one too—he meant their endeavours to prepare themselves with gold for issue; but, on the other hand, if the matter was to be brought about by the issuing of notes, then he must deny that any proper steps of preparation had been taken. Gentlemen opposite might smile at his observations; but he should say that his desire was for the reduction of paper issues. He had been told that the Bank had pressed for the repayment of the 6,000,000*l.* The only favourable change he could perceive in payment by exchequer bills would arise from the difference of 4 and 5 per cent.: but no material difference would be made if the 6,000,000*l.* were paid off in exchequer bills. He could see, in that case, no security for an alteration as to the issues. The Bank, in the present system, could decline the renewals of discounts. But if they took exchequer bills, they would exercise no control over their notes, as they did not sell exchequer bills. Their rule was not to sell such bills. He doubted, whether, according to their charter, as it prevented them from dealing in government securities, they had a right to buy exchequer bills. That, however, was an old subject of dispute, which he did not then desire to revive. He was aware that it would be said, that they did not deal in what they did not sell. Unless he found that proper measures were taken, he should consider it his duty to move on the subject from week to week, to obtain the only security that could be obtained for restoring the old, natural and wholesome practice. Without such measures, they might just as well read the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, or any other book, as listen to the monstrous doctrine, that for state purposes a paper issue could be continued safely which was not convertible into cash. He believed, from his opinion of the character of the Bank, that they wished to resume cash payments. But on the other hand, it was to be considered that there was a powerful body of persons, living on the fluctuations of the day, but having the ear of certain people—persons who did not regard what might happen in another year, but who wished to turn such considerations to their own interest. He would put it to all who were not gamblers or speculators, whether they must not feel that it was their duty, from day to day, to exercise their vigilance and activity in examining into concerns so material to the interests of the country.

He should not trespass further on the attention of the house. (Hear.) It would be for the house to determine whether, after three years of peace, this should be the only country in Europe to which the stigma applied (for it must be considered a stigma, if the restriction was continued as a measure of state policy) of resorting to an artificial circulation as the means of maintaining public credit.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that he had no objection to reply most explicitly to the question of the right hon. gentleman, and he was ready to admit that the house and the public were entitled to the fullest information which it was in his power and consistent with his duty to afford. With regard to the immediate subject of the right hon. gentleman's inquiry, he had not the smallest hesitation in declaring, that it was the intention of his Majesty's ministers that the repayment to the Bank of the loan of 6,000,000*l.* should be made in money, and not in exchequer bills. (Hear, hear.) Upon the other more general subject which had been adverted to, although not now before the house, he was desirous of making one or two observations. If it should become necessary to propose to parliament the postponement of the resumption of cash payments, it would not be from any purpose of consulting the convenience of government, but would be submitted on grounds perfectly distinct. He could not agree that it was desirable at the present moment to reduce the issues of the notes of the Bank of England; and he considered the repayment of the 6,000,000*l.* in money as expedient, not to enable the Bank to lessen their paper in that proportion, which appeared to be the view of the right hon. gentleman, but to enable them to extend accommodation to trade, and to support the commercial interests of the country. It was upon this consideration that he should probably feel it his duty to propose some arrangement for the final repayment of this loan. Much had been already saved by the arrangement made originally, and the present rate of interest would cause a saving to the country of not less than 1,000,000*l.* out of the 6,000,000*l.* composing the loan. The right hon. gentleman, he believed, had done no more than justice to the Bank, in expressing his conviction that they were sincerely desirous of resuming their ordinary course of payments: but the interests of the public, and the security of commerce, might, in a particular state of things, form a very reasonable ground for the interference of parliament, to delay the period at which that resumption should take place. The subject was not, however, now under consideration, and he should not, therefore, enter into any argument upon the different points involved in it with respect to which questions might be raised: but he begged leave to re-state, that whether the resumption of payments in cash on the part of the Bank of England should commence in the present year or be delayed till the ensuing, the measures of government would be equally directed to forward and encourage it.

Mr. Tierney thought the right hon. gentleman's explanation perfectly satisfactory as far as related to the repayment of the 6,000,000*l.* in money to the Bank, because it would enable the Bank to do what in his opinion they ought to do—reduce the amount of their issues; but he had witnessed with great dismay, the sort of levity with which the right hon. gentleman treated the very serious question, whether the Bank was to return to its regular payments this year or the next. He was glad to hear that it was not the convenience of government which it was intended to consult; but that the understood ground upon which the house might expect, that some measure for extending the time at which the currency was to be restored to its proper state, would be proposed, was, that great loans were to be advanced by individuals in this country to foreign powers. The nature of these loans was no secret to any body; and could the right hon. gentleman entertain a doubt that the money of which they consisted was at the present moment going out of the country, or that the contractors were not already availing themselves of the high price of stocks, in order to make large remittances at the most favourable rate? Without mentioning names, he might allude, by way of example, to a certain individual, with whom he had no doubt the right hon. gentleman was extremely well acquainted, and who would scarcely suffer the present opportunity to pass by him unobserved. He apprehended that this course of things would continue to go on, and that before the five months which still remained previous to the expiration of the present restriction had elapsed, the whole amount of the loans might be transferred. In that case, to postpone the resumption would be to provide against a danger that no longer existed. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman shook his head; it was possible that the right hon. gentleman might be right, and that he himself might be deceived; but to take an instance which was notorious—the loan of 3,000,000*l.* to Prussia—were he one of the lenders, he should be strongly inclined to take advantage of the present state of the funds. What he understood from the declarations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, that nothing existed in the internal or external situation of political affairs which created any obstacle to the restoration of the old circulating medium. The whole question therefore became narrowed to this point—could a foreign loan operate of itself unfavourably on the price of gold in this country? He was satisfied that it could not, and his conviction was the stronger from looking at the operation of the two great loans to Austria in 1795 and 1798, which loans produced no such effect. What he desired to see was, the Bank liberal in their accommodation, but still cautious in their issue of paper; he desired to see the gold coinage again in circulation; and if in three months after that event, the mint price of gold was not equal to its market price, he would pledge himself never again to trouble the house on this subject, a circumstance which he had no doubt would give them infinite satisfaction. (A laugh.)

Mr. F. Lewis said, he must avow himself to be extremely anxious to see the circulating medium of the country replaced as soon as possible on its only secure basis. The facts which had come within his own knowledge had convinced him, that if there was any difficulty or inconvenience in resuming our ancient and natural currency, those difficulties would be enhanced, and not diminished, by any additional delay. In the discussion of this subject, he feared the operation of the country banks was not in general sufficiently attended to. It was not easy to discover the causes which regulated the extent of their issues. It would, however, be found, upon inquiry, that in as short a period as two years and a half 25,000,000*l.* of country bank-notes had been withdrawn from circulation. He would leave it to the house to judge of the effect which this must have produced upon individual credit, and upon all the transactions arising out of the internal commerce of the country. He called now upon every member of the house to inquire in his own district and neighbourhood, and he would venture to say, that the result of that inquiry would correspond with his own, and would shew that the paper so suddenly withdrawn was now re-issuing with no less rapidity. (Hear.) Could it be doubted for a moment, that these transitions must have a most material influence upon the prices of all commodities, or that it was not of vast importance for the house to pause and deliberate well, before they adopted any measure which might favour the continuance of these fluctuations? He believed it impossible to point out any reason why the whole, or a much larger amount of country paper, would not be thrown into circulation, unless the Bank of England exercised its control over every other, by issuing no paper which was not immediately convertible into gold. If this should unfortunately be the case, whatever difference of opinion might exist on minute points, none could prevail with regard to the extent to which prices must be universally affected. He trusted that the house would not be induced to go back to a point from which they had thus far receded through much confusion and distress. No man could deny that an increased issue of paper would in its immediate advance facilitate commercial transactions, and raise the value of commodities; but against this partial and temporary advantage must be weighed the insecurity and the sudden fluctuations to which property of all kinds was subjected by so extraordinary a mode of regulating the circulation.

Lord Castlereagh rose for the purpose of suggesting the inexpediency of entering fully into a discussion upon a question not before the house, and to which alone such a discussion could belong. His right hon. friend was as sincerely desirous as any man that the Bank should resume its cash-payments without any delay beyond the period appointed by parliament; and no consideration, except that of some special case, arising out of peculiar circumstances, would be regarded as an argument for postponing so desirable a result. He viewed the consummation of that event in the same light as the hon. gentleman, and was disposed to act with reference to it in the same spirit. He knew none who were more interested in seeing it brought about than his right hon. friend, whose duty it was, however, at the same time, to protect the Bank against those injurious consequences, of which it might be productive to its interests if it took place at an inauspicious period, and under circumstances obviously disadvantageous. If, however, foreign loans should be negotiated in this country, loans that might cause a large exportation of specie at the time when the Bank were commencing to pay their notes in coin, it was impossible, he thought, to deny that a further delay of those payments might become a measure of indispensable policy, perhaps of paramount necessity. Over the loans to which he alluded, of whatever magnitude they might be, the government had no control. If they had, he would not say that it might not be wisely exercised. There might be circumstances, indeed, that would make it an imperative duty to take notice of them; but the right hon. gentleman ought not to suppose that the Prussian loan, or any loan of no greater amount, constituted the danger against which it would perhaps be necessary to guard. He was not at liberty to disclose to the house all the information which he possessed on this subject, but he was perfectly ready to admit that nothing in the foreign political relations of the country formed any ground for continuing the restriction. The only doubt was, whether a loan of a certain magnitude, concluded at the time of the Bank opening their cash-payments, might not disturb all the arrangements previously made for restoring the old legitimate circulation. This was a question which it might be proper should engage hereafter the consideration of parliament as future circumstances should determine. He must distinctly deny the proposition of the right hon. gentleman as to the probability of great remittances being made before the period of the resumption. No belief could be more fallacious. The contractors of the loan to which he more particularly referred, did not themselves know the precise terms upon which it was to be concluded, and still less the periods at which the different instalments were to be paid. He regretted the prevailing disposition for vesting capital in funds abroad, and was anxious that the country should seriously contemplate the possible consequences of placing too much confidence in foreign security. (Hear, hear.) But when money might be raised at two per cent. upon exchequer-bills at home, and an interest of nearly four times the amount might be obtained abroad, it was obvious that, without interfering with the freedom of commerce and property, a great transfer of capital must take place to other countries. He begged the house to take, at the same time, into their consideration, the immense sums which the loans in negotiation would draw from the circulation, and reflect whether a case might not arise of the foreign exchange being so influenced by remittances to other countries, as to withdraw whatever quantity of coin the Bank might issue in the resumption of its payments. All, however, that he required at present was, that the object should not be discussed by anticipation; that the house would keep its mind open for an impartial view of the case, such as it might arise, and give credit to ministers for not submitting it to consideration upon any grounds which did not appear to them to involve some of the most important interests of the country. He did not deny the necessary tendency of large issues; but on the other hand, he must contend, that the true policy of the Bank and the interests of commerce required that the circulation should not be starved, but should be supported with liberal encouragement. He must repeat, that it would afford the utmost satisfaction, as he might be allowed to say, it would constitute a triumph to his Majesty's ministers, to witness the resumption of cash-payments by the Bank; but they had another duty to perform, the duty of defending and promoting the commercial interests of the country.

Lord A. Hamilton stated, that the grounds on which the further restriction of cash payments was now recommended, appeared to him nearly as alarming to the country as the measure itself. The negotiation of a foreign loan in London was, this year, held out to the house by ministers, as regulating their conduct in one of the most vital points of national interest, while, last year, the same ministers sanctioned, not to say approved, a similar measure, in a loan for France. Their present argument was, therefore, grossly inconsistent with their conduct last year; and whether it was a false pretext or a real motive, was alike discreditable and humiliating to themselves.

Mr. Hammersley expressed his hope, that ministers would not be found to have any intention of giving encouragement to the proposed loans to foreign states, or to the investment of British capital in foreign funds. He was sorry to understand that such encouragement was inferred from certain provisions in the treaties of 1814 and 1815, as he himself had calculated at the time those treaties were concluded; he meant with regard to the reimbursement of British subjects who had lost the property they had vested in the French funds. A distinct declaration from the noble lord, upon this subject, would be of considerable utility, especially if ministers had not the intention to which he had alluded. If it should be declared that the provisions in the treaties to which he had referred, were owing to special circumstances, not likely again to occur, and that the case was not to form a precedent upon future treaties, great good would be done. It was extremely desirable, indeed, to remove the delusion which prevailed on this point, for too many persons were at present disposed to conclude from the treaties alluded to, that the faith of our government was pledged to procure the restoration of any property they might invest in foreign funds, and especially in the funds of that country with which we had been lately at war.

Lord Castlereagh said, that he had no difficulty in stating that the debts alluded to in the treaties of 1814 and 1815, stood upon particular grounds, and that therefore they formed the subject of a special provision in those treaties. By the treaty with France in 1787, it was covenanted, that in the event of war, every British subject should be allowed one year for the removal of his property from that country, and it was in direct violation of this treaty that the debts alluded to were contracted. It was therefore declared by the treaty of Amiens, that those debts should be paid by the French government. The treaties, then, of 1814 and 1815, only provided for that which originated with the treaty of 1787, and was sanctioned by the treaty of Amiens. Those claims were indeed of such a nature, that if provision had not been made to secure their liquidation, the government, which concluded the treaty of 1787, would be exposed to the charge of having entrapped British subjects to invest their property in France. But this formed a special case, and afforded no encouragement to British subjects to vest their property in foreign funds. He was ready, then, to go along with the hon. gentleman, that those who should make such investments had no claim whatever upon the British government, and that in the event of a war, or on the conclusion of a peace, no such transactions would be entitled to the consideration of the British government. It would, indeed, be an extraordinary principle to admit that the government of any nation should have its faith pledged, or its operations regulated, by the spontaneous transactions of individuals.

Mr. Hammersley expressed himself perfectly satisfied by the declaration of the noble lord, which would, he had no doubt, serve to dissipate a great deal of mischievous delusion; but as to Lord Auckland's treaty of 1787, he (Mr. H.) had always understood that the provisions of that treaty, alluded to by the noble lord, referred to commercial transactions only, and had no reference whatever to property vested in the funds of France.

The resolutions were then agreed to, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the committee appointed to scrutinize the different lists of names for serving on the committee of secrecy, when it appeared that the election had fallen on the following 21 members:—

Lord G. Cavendish.	Mr. Canning.
Mr. Williams Wynn.	Mr. Yorke.
Lord Castlereagh.	Mr. Egerton.
Lord Viscount Lascelles.	Mr. Wilberforce.
Mr. Bathurst.	Mr. Bootle Wilbraham.
Mr. Lambe.	Mr. W. Dundas.
Sir A. Pigott.	Mr. Peel.
Sir W. Scott.	Sir W. Curtis.
Sir J. Nicholl.	Admiral Frank.
Mr. Attorney-General.

Upon the name of Lord George Cavendish being mentioned,

Sir M. W. Ridley stated, that the noble lord was at present nearly 300 miles from London, and under such circumstances, he was persuaded that his lordship would not be able to attend the committee. He therefore proposed that the name of Mr. Tierney should be inserted in lieu of that of Lord George Cavendish.

No notice was taken of this observation, but upon the names being read over,

Sir M. Ridley repeated his proposition.

Lord Castlereagh expressed his doubt, whether, as the election was made by ballot, any other member could be nominated as the substitute of the noble lord. Such a nomination would, he apprehended, be inconsistent with parliamentary usage, as well as with the principle of a ballot. From the personal character of the noble lord, as well as from his peculiar opportunities of information, no one could be more eligible on this committee, and therefore he very much regretted the noble lord's inability to attend.

On the mention of Lord Castlereagh's name,

Mr. Brougham rose, and disclaiming any thing invidious, protested against the attempt to constitute the noble lord a judge upon this question, whether the noble lord himself and his colleagues had not behaved improperly towards individuals, who had perhaps already commenced actions against ministers, for depriving them of liberty, and stigmatizing their characters.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that if the proposition of the learned gentleman were admitted, namely, that because he was a minister he ought not to become a member of this committee, he wished to know to what functions he was competent in that house? For, were he precluded from giving an opinion or promoting an inquiry upon any question in which the administration of government was concerned, he hardly knew what business he could have to transact in parliament.

Mr. Brougham said, that, with regard to the absence of his noble friend, he would put a case which might, by possibility, happen,—that of none of the members chosen by ballot being able to attend; and ask what course would then be pursued? He apprehended that another ballot must take place, and the inability of his noble friend to attend the committee, was, pro tanto, as good a reason for another ballot, as the extreme case which he had supposed. The attendance of the noble lord was, no doubt, peculiarly desirable, not only from his personal character, but from his acquaintance with the transactions in Derbyshire. But the noble lord, it appeared, could not attend; and was the committee to have no one in his place? Sir Arthur Pigott also was among the names returned in this ballot; but it must be remembered that his learned friend, when chosen upon the committee of last session, declared his unwillingness and inability to attend. It was probable, therefore, that he would be equally unwilling and unable to attend upon the present occasion. The house would then find that they were left almost to the parties themselves, and the decision in the committee was to be made by the solicitor-general, the attorney-general, and the noble lord, several cabinet ministers, and several almost cabinet ministers, who were of the profession of the law, and others; and it was to these that the important question for which the committee was required was to be referred. He had been told, indeed, that what they would have to examine took in a much wider range than had been imagined. Now, if the noble lord came before the house, they would meet him openly, they would confront him, but it was not so with a secret committee; it was not so where there were many who would not attend, and others who might, for various reasons, act along with particular persons; there they were acting behind backs, and, as he had said the night before, there were members on that committee who were parties to actions, who were on the face of the very record; and these were pitched upon as members of this secret tribunal! Would any member declare that it was proper that such should be the case? Was it just that the right hon. gentleman, my Lord Sidmouth's relation, that the noble lord, and several others whom he had named, were to sit in secret upon the Evanses and Cliff, and he did not know how many others, who were all bringing actions against them? Were these to decide the question in their own favour, and to say that the records were to be torn to pieces, and the expenses to be borne by the persons who had brought the actions? This was the case, however; and he trusted that, such being the case, the house would permit him to move, either that the ballot should be recommenced, or that some other method should be adopted of forming the committee. Indeed it would be much better to found a motion upon the particular names, but he understood that the ballot was not concluded.

Mr. Wilberforce wished to say a few words upon the subject of the putting of names into the glass. He could not but say, that he differed from some of those honourable members who had expressed an opinion on that matter, because he considered that there was a power of substitution left to members who had lists. When any member came to propose the appointment of a committee, unless there should be some sort of understanding, it was impossible to know exactly to whom they were about to intrust business of the greatest importance. They had heard of lists prepared for the purpose of putting into the glass; but after all, he could not but think it the best mode of constituting a committee that could be devised. There was one thing that should be observed, and they all knew it amongst themselves, that though they had all perhaps a list given to them, there was a power of erasing names; at least in former times, he had scratched out certain names and inserted others in their room. He did not believe that any member shewed his list either to the secretary of state on the one hand, or to any member of the opposition on the other. On the whole, he thought the system of mutual understanding which the mode of ballot afforded was the best for all such purposes. A member might erase any name, and insert another, without any person knowing whose list had been altered when they were all put into the glass. It appeared to him, that unless there were some sort of understanding, by which it might be said, you, and you, and you, will put in certain names, he might put in a number of names; but then he might ask, would no one else put in the names, and if not, he was throwing away his power. It was very desirable, in his opinion, that such an important committee should be formed by lists of persons who were proper for the trust to be reposed in them. It was necessary that there should be on the lists people who were willing and able to attend, and if there was any member now about to be proposed, to be substituted for any member who it was supposed would not attend, he should vote for any such person.

Mr. Speaker stated, that with respect to the proposition for the substitution of one name for another, he believed there would be found no precedent on the journals of the house: indeed that single and individual circumstance of putting one name in the room of another would be in a manner jumping over several of the principal orders; and first, that one, that the committee be appointed by ballot. Now, he submitted, that if one name was substituted for another, that would not be done by ballot. He was only stating to the house what he thought was the proper practice, and in making such a statement, he thought he was only doing his duty. (Hear, hear.) He could not find any trace of such having been the practice. He did not perceive that any member had been left out, except it was by absolute parliamentary disqualification, a physical impossibility of attendance; as to any other disqualification of attendance, there was, as far as his knowledge extended, no account of any case having arisen. He had thought it right to state thus much to the house. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Calcraft thought, that without contradicting the orders of the house, it might be regular to fill up the places of the persons who it was supposed would not attend. He wished to say a word or two with regard to the appointment of a committee by ballot. On that method he could safely say, that the influence of ministers by means of it was greater than by any other mode. He had himself been a scrutineer upon the appointment of committees by that method. He did not suppose there was any thing secret in what he was saying, but if there was he would not proceed. (Cries of no, no.) He had not been sworn when he was a scrutineer. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) There were, upon that occasion, 103 persons who had put lists into the glass, and amongst those lists were 97 written in the same hand. Whose hand it was, or whence the lists came, he would not presume to offer a conjecture, nor would he say any thing further on that point, though he had some information on the subject; but the fact was, that there were the same names in all the lists, and all written by the same hand. And if his hon. friend had considered for a moment, he was persuaded he would have inferred, that the quarter whence they came was not very doubtful. He thought some steps might certainly be taken to supply the places of those gentlemen who would not attend, though he should be the last man to propose any member in place of his noble friend; for he thought he was one of the best persons in that house to become a member of such a committee.

Mr. Wilberforce explained. If any member, who had a list given him, thought any one was not a fit person for such a committee, he might have erased the name, without its being even suspected who made the alteration.

Mr. Canning observed, that he should not say any thing about the propriety of substituting names in a particular way, after what had fallen from the chair; but if it were necessary to take any step with respect to the list, there was one obvious course for the house to adopt. They could insist, that any member not prevented by a physical impossibility should do his duty. For his own part he should protest against any other proceeding till that had been attempted.

Mr. Speaker quoted the case of Sir Joseph Jekyll, who was chosen by ballot to serve on a committee. An objection was made to his appointment, on the ground that he had not taken the usual oaths at the clerk's table, but the house, on a division, decided that he was qualified, and refused to substitute another name.

Sir W. Burroughs maintained that there might be a parliamentary disqualification to exclude a member from serving on such a committee. The case of the noble lord (Castlereagh) was one of those; there could be no reason why he should sit as judge of his own acts. The precedent just alluded to by Mr. Speaker established this principle, that the house might review the ballot, in order to correct its own proceeding where it might be wrong. He begged to remind the house of the motion made by the noble lord yesterday, which determined that the committee should consist of twenty-one members. Suppose then that Lord G. Cavendish could not attend, would not that vote be defeated? Suppose Sir A. Pigott, whose state of health and professional avocations were likely to prevent him from attending, was also to absent himself, could it be said that the house was not competent to supply his place? In the last session of parliament, the name of the present Solicitor-General was added to the committee. It would, he thought, be desirable to know, though perhaps it would not be quite fair to ask of the friends of Lord G. Cavendish, whether he was absent at the time he was nominated, or whether he had since left town. Perhaps the best course they could adopt, under the circumstances, would be to postpone the meeting of the committee until the noble lord could be personally present, as there was no urgent necessity for their meeting immediately: and he trusted that some steps would be taken to remedy so great an abuse as the appointment of a committee by ballot, which was the worst mode that could be employed. Had they been elected by nomination, the choice would then have been made from the members who were present, and the inconvenience now experienced would have been avoided.

Sir M. W. Ridley begged to assure the house, that the absence of Lord George Cavendish was by no means voluntary. It was certainly not his own wish, but a real necessity, that occasioned his absence on that very important occasion.

The following motions were then agreed to:—

That the committee should meet in the Speaker's chambers to-morrow.

That they should have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That seven should be the quorum; and that they should adjourn from time to time, and from place to place; and report their proceedings from time to time; and sit during the sitting, and notwithstanding any adjournment of the house.

And that the secret papers presented on the 3d of February, and the reports of the 19th of February and 20th of June, 1817, be referred to the said committee.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 9.

Irish Grand Juries Act Suspension Bill.] This bill went through a committee, and was reported without amendment.

Gold and Silver Coin.] A person from the Mint presented the accounts of the gold and silver coinage, which were ordered on Thursday last, on the motion of Lord Lauderdale.—Ordered to be printed.

Spies and Informers.] Lord Holland said, he had to apologize to their lordships for taking the liberty of troubling them with a few words, on a subject which he had not the opportunity of bringing regularly before them. He wished to inform them that a petition had been transmitted to him, in order to be presented to the house, at a time when he was engaged in the performance of a private and melancholy duty (alluding to the funeral of the Earl of Upper Ossory) which petition he regretted to say he had unfortunately mislaid or lost. The petition itself, and the circumstances under which it was to be presented, were of great public importance; but he was sorry to say, that after the most diligent search it could not be found. It had been the wish of the petitioners, among whom were many highly respectable persons, that it should be presented to their lordships' house in time to be referred to the secret committee. It had been sent to him for that purpose by Mr. Taylor, of Manchester, and he still hoped that he might receive another copy before the committee made their report. He felt it, however, to be his duty, thus publicly to acknowledge his negligence, and express his regret at not being able to comply that day with the wish of the petitioners. Though he had not read the petition which reached him with sufficient attention to recollect its contents, yet, having had access to another petition from the same persons, intended for another place, (see the proceedings in the Commons) he was able to state to their lordships its general purport. The allegations it contained were very strong; and though he would not pretend to vouch for their accuracy, he must say that, coming as they did from persons of respectability, they were such as merited the attention of their lordships, and a strict investigation on the part of the committee. The petitioners stated on their own knowledge, that all the disturbances in that part of the country, and all disorderly proceedings which had attracted the public notice, had been the work of hired spies, informers, and agents of the government. From their local situation, they had opportunities of ascertaining the facts which they stated, and had made it their business to inquire into and trace the disturbances to their source; but when, in the course of their investigations, they pointed out any individuals as objects of suspicion, such persons either disappeared from that part of the country, or, if carried before magistrates, were soon released. As he had said before, he could not answer for the truth of these allegations, but they were stated by 26 persons of respectable character in that part of the country, who were most anxious to support their statements by evidence at the bar of their lordships' house, or before the committee. He thanked their lordships for the indulgence which they had granted him on an occasion when he was departing from the usual order of their proceedings, for he had no motion to make. Another petition would be transmitted, and he trusted that an opportunity would be afforded for presenting it, before the committee to whom the papers on the state of the country had been referred came to a final decision.

No observation was made on his lordship's statement, on the conclusion of which the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, Feb. 9.

SPANISH SLAVE SHIPS.] Dr. Phillimore presented the following petition of William Henry Gould Page, merchant, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

"That the petitioner is legally constituted and appointed by divers merchants, planters, and ship-owners of the Havanna, to obtain satisfaction from the British government, and to take whatever measures should be found necessary to obtain redress, for various illegal captures and condemnations of Spanish vessels and cargoes engaged in the African trade; that the petitioner, being so duly authorized and appointed, did on the 11th day of November, 1813, read a notice published in the gazette of the regency of Spain, purporting that on the 30th day of October preceding the British secretary of state for foreign affairs (in answer to a representation which had been made to the British government, complaining of certain captures made under the pretence that the vessels were not Spanish but American built), had signified that the purchase of American built ships by subjects of Spain being perfectly lawful, the restitution thereof, and of their cargoes, as well as the competent indemnity for whatever damages had occurred, owing to their having been arrested on their voyages, would depend upon the evidence of their being such as claimed to be, when the cases should be judged according to law; that it thus appearing to the petitioner that the British government required that the owners of the said ships or vessels should establish their claims to restitution by the ordinary legal process in the court of appeals, the petitioner immediately retained proctors and counsel (in the cases of two vessels, namely, the Esperanza and Juan) who brought them in regular form before the court; but it appearing that distribution had been made of the Esperanza and cargo, the court decided that the appeal came too late, and consequently that no redress could be obtained but by an application to the liberality and justice of the British government; that the petitioner, in consequence of that decision, presented a memorial to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent in council, on behalf of the owners of the above-named vessels, and of many other Spanish vessels and cargoes similarly circumstanced, explaining that the delay in appealing had been owing to the want of information on the part of the owners at Cuba, relative to the proceedings of the Court at Sierra Leone, in which court the condemnations had taken place, and praying in the said memorial, 'that the owners of the captured ships and cargoes might have the right of appeal granted, notwithstanding that, from causes beyond their control, the period of twelve months allowed by the English law for appeals to be entered, might have expired; so that each individual case might be decided on its own merits, and that the owners might be respectively enabled to shew the losses to which they had been unjustly exposed; and that on proving that the capture and condemnation of their property had been unjust, due compensation might be made for their said losses;' that the petitioner was informed the object of the said memorial was submitted to the law officers of the crown for their legal advice, and that they were of opinion, 'that there did not appear to be sufficient cause to induce his Majesty's government to make any special communication to the court of appeals, so as to meet at present the wishes expressed in the said memorial:' that the petitioner being thus excluded from the court of appeals, made application to government, 'that justice might be done to the suffering Spaniards, whom he represented, by an act of liberality on the part of government, in like manner as had been done to the Portuguese similarly circumstanced;' that in answer to the said application the petitioner was informed, by his Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, 'that such an application for favour could only come from the Spanish government, it being an object of negotiation and not of right;' admitting by this and by a previous communication, (namely, 'that the courts of this country have invariably been very unwilling to exclude appellants in cases of the description of the petitioners, merely on account of the expiration of the time usually allowed for entering appeals, and that if there had been any case in which the application had been refused by the superior court on account of the actual distribution having taken place, or any other cause, it was not consistent with the practice of this country that the government should interfere with the rules which that court may have thought it expedient to adopt;') that where our law tribunals can grant redress there can be no discussion between the governments, and that the government would only extend its liberality to those cases where the parties were precluded by the forms of law from a legal interference in their favour; that the petitioner being thus informed by his Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, that his claims for these spoliations were of two distinct and opposite characters, namely, that where no appeals had been made from the sentence of the vice-admiralty courts within the time limited by the prize act, they became a matter of discussion between the two governments as a favour and not of right, but that where the time for appeal against the sentences of the vice-admiralty courts had not expired, he must appeal to the law tribunals; the petitioner, thus instructed, took his measures accordingly; he informed the cabinet of Madrid that such cases of spoliation which might have been redressed by an appeal to our law tribunals within the limitations of the prize act, having been lost through a want of this appeal, must become a matter of discussion between the two governments, and to be settled by treaty or convention, but that where in those cases of spoliation the time allowed and provided by the prize act was still open to an appeal to our law tribunals, these courts alone could decide on the case, and that his Majesty's government had not the right or inclination to control such decisions of the said tribunals; that the petitioner made these appeals according to law, and has obtained judgments in divers cases (a list of the said cases being annexed to his petition) from the lords commissioners of appeals, the claimants in such cases having complied with the necessary requisitions of an act passed in the 55th year of his present Majesty, chapter 172; and that the petitioner has further made application to the commissioners of his Majesty's navy for satisfaction of the said judgments, but which said judgments have not been satisfied, owing to an impression on their minds that the fourth article of the treaty entered into between England and Spain, which treaty was signed on the 23d of September, 1817, is a barrier to the satisfaction of the said judgments, but which construction of the said article, the petitioner humbly contends, is erroneous, the same being contrary to law, and to that line of conduct pointed out by his Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, as the only proper one the petitioner could pursue; the humble prayer of the petitioner therefore is, that if it be intended to put such construction upon the fourth article in the treaty above-mentioned, he may be heard by counsel at the bar of the house, to establish that no construction of the treaty can overpower the judgments of our law tribunals; but if the contrary should be the decision of the house, the petitioner then humbly prays that such a deduction may be made from the 400,000*l.* provided for by the treaty above-mentioned, as in amount will satisfy the judgments already pronounced, as well as what may be the judgments on those cases of appeal which are now in a state of progression."

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Mr. Boswell presented the following petition of noblemen, gentlemen, freeholders, justices of the peace, commissioners of supply, and other heritors of the county of Ayr, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed:

"That in the last session of parliament, a bill was brought in to provide proper places for the confinement of lunatics in Scotland, which bill the house permitted to pass through certain stages, but ordered the same to be printed, with a view, as the petitioners have been informed, of giving time and opportunity for the mature consideration of a measure of so much importance, before the same should be passed into a law; and that the petitioners, from the first moment that they were made acquainted with the principle and provisions of the proposed bill, were deeply alarmed for their own interests and those of Scotland in general, by the introduction of a measure uncalled for and inexpedient; novel in its application and arrangement, and substituting regulations of compulsion to the exclusion of the more salutary exertions of spontaneous charity; and this too at a time when by the gradual progress of enlightened philanthropy so many admirable institutions have been so lately established in various parts of Scotland by voluntary contribution; and that the petitioners are most willing to pay every just tribute of respect to the humane views which may have dictated the proposed measure, but they are satisfied that it must have owed its origin to exaggerated and false representations of the state of the lunatics in Scotland, and an unjust and groundless assumption of a want of humanity in the people of Scotland towards objects afflicted with so severe a calamity; the house cannot fail to remark that the proposed bill recognizes a systematic assessment which it has been the wise policy of our forefathers to avoid in practice, and that too to an amount at the discretion of commissioners ignorant of local circumstances, and perhaps the dupes of misinformation; entertaining, as the petitioners do, deep and well-grounded repugnance to the means proposed for carrying this measure into execution, partly injudicious and partly degrading to the landholders of Scotland, for it does appear to be a humiliating, and the petitioners may venture to say an unconstitutional act, which would place the whole landholders of Scotland in the situation of being taxed for any object and to any amount, at the discretion of any set of commissioners whatever; the petitioners therefore confiding in the wisdom of the house, humbly pray that the proposed bill for providing places for the confinement of Lunatics in Scotland may not pass into a law."

WINDOW TAX (IRELAND.)] Mr. W. Quin presented the following petition of the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood of Strabane, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed:

"That the petitioners humbly beg leave to state, that in submitting, without complaining, for so many years to the tax on windows, they did so in the hope that on the return of peace they should be released from that oppressive impost, an expectation which they the more confidently cherished from the pledge given to that effect by the late Mr. Corry, chancellor of the exchequer, a pledge which the petitioners conceived would have been regarded as binding on his successors; in addition to the reasons which urge the repeal of this tax on the justice of the house, the petitioners presume to call their attention to a fact which appeals no less imperatively to their humanity; they beg to refer the house to the returns of the excise office of the district of Strabane, by which will appear the immense number of hearths and windows which have been closed since January, 1815, a circumstance which warrants the petitioners attributing the prevalence of the contagious fever to such an alarming extent in the province, among other causes, to the want of ventilation, occasioned by the shutting up of so many hearths and windows, and they look to the repeal of the tax as a powerful means of arresting the progress of the disease so fatal at present, and preventing its recurrence in time to come; the petitioners rely therefore on the wisdom of the house for the repeal of a tax so obnoxious and oppressive in its nature, so unequal in its bearings, and so injurious in its effects, to the comforts and well-being of the population of the country."

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.] Mr. Bennett rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent the employment of boys in climbing chimnies. He did not feel that it was necessary for him to enter at large on this subject, or to go into particular details, after the evidence which was produced before the committee last year. This bill was, indeed, a transcript of that which he brought forward last year, with the exception only of that provision which related to the total and prompt abolition of the employment of climbing boys, and which provision, perhaps, prevented the bill from being carried. The preamble of the present bill stated, therefore, that "the necessity of employing apprentices to cleanse chimnies, by climbing them, no longer exists, in consequence of the invention of various machines for the purpose, which may be adapted to every construction of flues; but as a proportion of such flues may require some previous alteration, it is therefore expedient that the climbing of chimnies be further permitted, under certain regulations, for a time to be limited." He was happy to say that since last year a desire to abolish this odious practice had been expressed at public meetings in all the great towns throughout the country; those meetings unanimously adopting resolutions that the employment of climbing boys ought not to be any longer tolerated, especially as a mechanical instrument was found efficient for the purpose. Within the last year indeed, no less than five fatal instances had occurred to shew the effects of this barbarous custom. One of these instances in England, and another in Scotland, were attended with circumstances of peculiarly aggravated cruelty. The masters, or properly speaking, the owners of the unfortunate children employed in this business, were rarely susceptible of the common feelings of humanity; but, even if they were, it would be impossible to have the business done without a sacrifice of those feelings. For, from the manner in which chimnies were constructed, especially in London, with a view to save fuel, the flues were often no more than seven or eight inches in diameter, and consequently, in order to clean such chimnies, it became necessary to employ children of the tenderest age. For that purpose, indeed, children of less than seven years of age were often employed—nay, female infants had been actually so engaged, probably from the smallness of their persons. (Hear, hear, hear.) The house, and every man of feeling in the country, must naturally be shocked at such a fact; but he hoped that the repetition of it would be effectually provided against. The object of his bill was, without disturbing the present apprenticeships, that no master chimney-sweeper should hereafter be allowed to take an apprentice under 14 years of age. The hon. member concluded by moving for leave to bring in a bill "for the better regulation of chimney-sweepers and their apprentices; and for preventing the employment of boys in climbing chimnies." — Leave being given, the bill was brought in and read a first time.

SPIES AND INFORMERS.] Mr. Philips presented the following petition of merchants, manufacturers, and others, inhabitants of the towns of Manchester, Salford, and the neighbourhood.

"That the petitioners heard with great pain and uneasiness the alarming statements which were currently circulated during the early part of the past year, as to the evil designs entertained by the labouring classes in their neighbourhood, and concealed under the disguise of an anxiety to obtain a reform in the representation of the people; that the petitioners have found themselves obliged to conclude that the impression produced by the statements to which they have now referred, greatly influenced the decision of the house in concurring with the proposals of his Majesty's ministers, entirely to suspend some, and materially to abridge other, of the most valuable rights and privileges which Englishmen derive from the bravery and wisdom of their ancestors, and which afford their best safeguards against the encroachments of arbitrary power and the abuses of intolerant party spirit; that although firmly convinced, at the period when those measures were proposed by his Majesty's ministers to the consideration of the house, that the circumstances of the times did not require, and that constitutional vigilance could not acquiesce, in the suspension of the act of habeas corpus and the other restrictive enactments adopted by the house, the petitioners thought it most proper to defer the expression of their sentiments upon this important subject to a period, when the heat of political feeling being somewhat allayed, they might be enabled to examine with mature deliberation, with more scrutinizing caution, and with more rigid impartiality, the truth of the information upon which, judging from the reports of its secret committees, the house must be presumed to have acted; that the petitioners could not avoid feeling that the character, not only of the towns in which they reside, but of the very populous district that surrounds them, and perhaps even of the county of Lancaster at large, was involved in the charges of disaffection, disloyalty, and treason, which were so lavishly heaped on the most numerous and the most industrious class of its population; that the petitioners take leave to assert to the house, not only that the conduct of the labouring part of their fellow townsmen at that period did not exhibit the slightest tendency to insubordination or violence, but that they sustained an unparalleled extremity of distress with fortitude the most exemplary and heroic; that without stating themselves to concur in the propriety, or to defend the prudence of all the political conduct of the working classes in their neighbourhood, the petitioners have no hesitation in assuring the house, as the result of their careful and assiduous inquiries, that the proceedings of that part of the population have been completely and most grossly misrepresented; that as far as regards the meeting of the 10th of March, familiarly known by the designation of the blanket meeting, nothing could exceed the quietness and order with which the populace proceeded to it, and demeaned themselves throughout its continuance; that it had been publicly announced several days; that not the slightest intimation of its imputed illegality was given; that no attempt was made to disperse it by means of the civil power, but that, without warning, and, as the petitioners very believe, without even reading the riot act, doubtful as it is whether under such circumstances that statute could legally be enforced, the dragoons, acting under the orders of the magistrates, dashed impetuously amongst the multitude, and compelled it to seek safety in flight, although magistrates at that period did not possess the discretionary power over public meetings with which the house has since invested them; that between two and three hundred persons, who were proceeding on the road to London with petitions, were, in the course of the before-mentioned day, apprehended and lodged under circumstances of great hardship, in a prison which contained, even before their arrival, nearly three times the number of prisoners it was originally calculated to receive; and that eight of the persons then arrested, who refused to give bail for their future appearance, were committed to Lancaster Castle, and, after being detained in gaol amongst prisoners of the most profligate and abandoned description for nearly six months, were at length discharged without trial; that on Saturday the 29th of March public apprehension was most generally and painfully excited, by the appearance of an advertisement issued by the magistracy and police of Manchester, bearing date the preceding day, and in which they stated, that 'information, on which they could place the fullest reliance, had reached them of a most daring and traitorous conspiracy, the object of which was nothing less than open rebellion and insurrection;' that 'the town of Manchester was one of the first pointed out for attack, and the moment fixed upon for the diabolical enterprise was the night of the 30th of March;' that as the petitioners could not think it possible that the magistrates or police would wantonly or thoughtlessly trifle with public alarm, by making so horrible a charge on dubious or insufficient grounds, they confidently expected to see such daring and desperate offenders, as those implicated in this 'diabolical enterprise' must necessarily be so supposed to be, brought to early trial and condign punishment, particularly as on the 23d of April, when the examination of the supposed delinquents must, as the petitioners conceive, have brought the evidence against them under his magisterial cognizance, the Rev. W. R. Hay, stipendiary chairman of the Salford quarter-sessions, did, in his address to the grand jury, allude to the subject in the following terms: 'as judicial inquiries would be instituted against the offending parties, it would not be just to enter much upon the subject, but he might be permitted to say, should such inquiries take place, purposes of the blackest enormity must be disclosed to the public, and that those who professed to doubt their existence would finally be constrained to admit the existence of the whole of them;' that the suspension of the act of habeas corpus being, as appears by the terms of the bill itself, applicable only to persons 'suspected of entertaining designs hostile to his Majesty's government,' the petitioners conceive that it was never intended by the house to supersede the necessity of public judicial inquiries into charges of treason, distinct and specified in their character, and of unparalleled atrocity in their complexion; that the petitioners are therefore persuaded that the house will learn with astonishment, that all the persons arrested as participators in this alleged conspiracy have been discharged without trial: and they would further represent to the house, that if the slightest suspicion of the guilt of the parties still remains, it is most dangerous to the welfare and tranquillity of the country at large, to restore to liberty, and consequently to the capability of doing mischief, men who have connected themselves with a design of such dreadful wickedness; whilst on the other hand, if there is no foundation for the diabolical conspiracy imputed to them, every principle of justice and humanity imperiously demands that they should be publicly and legally delivered from the charges to which they have been so foully and falsely subjected; that the attention of the petitioners having been aroused by the discharge of these alleged conspirators without trial, some of them have entered upon an extensive and rigid investigation of the grounds upon which traitorous and rebellious proceedings were imputed to the parties taken into custody, and the result of that investigation is a most positive and irrefragable conviction that no such conspiracy existed, that no violent designs were in contemplation, and that no measure dangerous to public tranquillity was ever proposed or discussed at any of the meetings which took place, except by hired spies and informers; that whilst the petitioners are convinced that no effort was left untried by these wicked and detestable emissaries, to ensnare and delude the labouring classes into acts of riot and insubordination, they cannot but think it will be satisfactory to the house, to reflect that the illegal schemes and exhortations of these miscreants, though addressed to men suffering the most distressing privations, have been so eminently and uniformly unsuccessful; that the conviction of the petitioners as to the activity of the spies, in endeavouring to engage persons known to be petitioners for parliamentary reform, in their villainous machinations, does not rest on general and indefinable impressions; but the petitioners believe that their habitual violence, their endeavours to seduce individuals to the commission of specific crimes, which would deservedly subject them to capital punishments, their officiousness in appointing meetings in different parts of the country, their activity in procuring a large attendance at such meetings, their assumed names, their apprehension and immediate discharge, and their connexion with the magistracy or police, can be clearly and indisputably demonstrated; the petitioners would further state to the house, that during the early part of the last year, nocturnal domiciliary visits by subordinate agents of the police, without the exhibition of warrant or authority for such proceedings, during which the greatest abuse and inhumanity was displayed, were of disgracefully frequent occurrence; the petitioners therefore, conceiving that the house could neither foresee nor intend to sanction such proceedings as they have enumerated, and that the employment of spies in the manner and to the extent to which it has prevailed in the neighbourhood of the petitioners, is pregnant with the most dangerous consequences to his Majesty's peaceable and well-disposed subjects, and anxious also to vindicate to the country at large, the loyalty and good character of their extensive and populous district, do humbly, but most earnestly intreat that the house will be pleased to institute a strict inquiry into the truth of the matters stated in this petition, and also into the general proceedings, not only of the labouring classes, but of the magistracy and police of Manchester and its neighbourhood, during the early part of the past year; and the petitioners do hereby pledge themselves to use the utmost diligence and alacrity in furnishing the house with such evidence as they confidently believe will most fully and completely establish the conclusions they themselves have formed on the subject."

Mr. Philips then observed, that it must be obvious that he could not pledge himself to the accuracy of the facts referred to in the petition, and on which it was founded, but he was informed that they had been most diligently and cautiously investigated by some of the persons who had signed it, and particularly by one gentleman, known to him to be a man of intelligence and active benevolence. His own opinion was, that the facts would be proved, on investigation, to be such as they had been reported to him. Before he proceeded to a detail, which he feared would be tiresome to the house, he wished to say that he did not at all mean to reflect on the intentions of the magistrates, or municipal officers of Manchester. If they had been instrumental in deluding ministers, and through them the house and the country in general, it was because they had been first deluded themselves, for he had no doubt that they sincerely believed in the representations which they had made. He conceived them to have been deluded by their own spies and informers, and those of the government. The utmost that he had ever said on this subject was, that if the poor people were liable to delusion from their own prejudices on the one hand, magistrates who were treasurers, or zealous supporters of orange lodges, and societies, could not be considered as exempted from the delusion of their own prejudices, on the other hand. He deprecated strongly the encouragement given to such associations, whose tendency could only be to inflame religious and political animosities, to call into exercise the worst passions of our nature, and to make one class of his Majesty's subjects hate and persecute the other.—The hon. member stated, that there had been several meetings, more or less numerous, in Manchester and the neighbourhood, before that of the 10th of March, familiarly called the blanketeer meeting, for preparing resolutions and petitions on the subject of a reform of the representation.—These meetings had been very peaceably conducted. To shew that the poor people really meant what they professed, namely, to petition for a reform of parliament, with which they had been taught to associate the relief of their own severe sufferings, he stated, that they had in the first instance applied to some persons in Manchester, in a station superior to their own, and begged them to unite in a requisition to the boroughreeve and constables, for calling a meeting for that object. This being declined, and their own requisitions to the town officers being rejected, they called meetings themselves by public advertisement. They did so in the instance of the blanketeer meeting of the 10th of March, which was called by public advertisement, no intimation having been given of its imputed illegality. Their petitions to parliament not having been received in the way they expected, it was proposed to petition the Prince Regent, and to carry up their petitions themselves, and present them in such numbers as the law allowed. This foolish proposal was objected to strongly by the generality of those, who, from their superior intelligence and activity, were regarded as their leaders. He did not understand, that, though considered as leaders, they were formally delegated as such. Out of a number consisting of about 17, not more than three or four supported the blanketeer expedition. Of the others, one objected to it in language likely to be misinterpreted with violence by spies and informers, but which appeared to convey very just reasoning. This man said, that if the people determined on that expedition, of which he attempted to demonstrate the folly, they must make up their minds to one of two things. They must either cut their way, sword in hand, for they would certainly be opposed, or if they did not do that, they must submit to be dragged to the New Bayley Prison, where they would as certainly be taken. Another said, that if none but the most virtuous description of people should set out from Manchester, they would be joined on the road by persons of a different description, who would take advantage of the opportunity of doing mischief, which mischief would be imputed to them, and in its effect injure the cause which they wished to serve. The meeting, however, was resolved on, and took place on the 10th of March. The behaviour of the people attending it was peaceable, as stated in the petition. The dragoons (the petitioners state, as they believe, without even having the riot act read) dashed in among the people, seized a number in Manchester, and others towards Stockport, on their road to London, and conveyed them to the New Bayley Prison, already occupied, according to the representation of the petitioners, by nearly three times as many people as it was built originally to receive. Their sufferings, it was natural to suppose, must have been severe from confinement under such circumstances. Eight of these men, who refused to give bail for their appearance, were afterwards sent to Lancaster, and had since been liberated without trial. The hon. member declared, that although no man was more aware than himself of the extreme folly of this blanketeer expedition, and of its liability to become the occasion of confusion and mischief, he really believed that the poor people themselves generally, had no other object in it than what they professed. They had, as he had before observed, been taught to look for relief from their severe sufferings, through a reform in the representation, and it was for that reason that they were zealous in the pursuit of it. It might be fortunate that they contemplated such means of relief; for, perhaps, the prospect might make them more patient under the extraordinary privations of that period. Some of the poor people, when examined by the magistrates as to their object in going to London, stated, that they intended to offer their petition to the Prince Regent, throw themselves down at his feet, explain their real situation, and implore relief.—After stating his opinion of this meeting, which he always considered as harmless with respect to the intention of the people in general, the hon. member alluded to the other plot of the 28th of March, namely, the reported plot for burning Manchester. The history of this plot could not be understood, without introducing to the acquaintance of the house three spies, who used all the means in their power to collect the people in public and private meetings, to reconcile their minds to schemes of mischief, and to excite them to the commission of the most abominable crimes.—These spies were Lomax, Robert Waddington of Bolton, and a man who called himself Dewhurst. The reason why he designated them as spies was, that they were most active in calling meetings, in urging the people to attend them, in running about the country, or sending others, to propose schemes of violence and mischief, such as burning factories, attacking barracks and prisons, and setting Manchester on fire; and that while the persons, who rejected these villainous proposals with horror, were sent to prison, and kept there, these wretches were either not taken up at all, or, if taken up, were liberated the next day. The first person whose proceedings he would state to the house was Lomax. A person of the name of Acres, and his brother-in-law, on their return from Stockport, where they had gone to see some of the blanketeers on their road, went into a public-house, the Ark, and there found this man, Lomax, haranguing some people in a very violent manner, and proposing to send delegates to different towns in the neighbourhood, in order to call secret meetings. Acres repeatedly checked his violence. On going away with his brother, Lomax proposed to accompany them, and on arriving near his own house, he invited them in, saying, he wished to have some conversation with them. After talking with them for a few minutes, he took a pen, and wrote these words, to which the hon. member wished to call the attention of the house, as they might probably be found in one of the green bags.—"England expects every man to do his duty—Arise, Britons, and free your brothers from prison—God save the king."—Upon shewing what he had written to Acres, he recommended him to throw it into the fire. This he refused, and said he would take it to Ogden to print. He went with it to Ogden's house, and desired his son (Ogden himself having been sent to prison) to print it, but he refused to have any thing to do with it. On the next day (11th March), Acres was told by Lomax, that there was to be a meeting of delegates that day at 1 o'clock, at the Elephant, and was requested to go along with him to it, with which request he complied. They found about 30 or 40 people assembled. After some conversation had passed, Lomax said he would go into the room where the secret committee was sitting, and inform them of the good attendance.

Acres asked if he might go with him, but Lomax said, he could not be admitted. Beginning to be suspicious of him, Acres was determined to watch him, and having observed what room he went into, he followed him into it in a short time, and found, as he says, "the committee secret enough, for it consisted of Lomax alone." Lomax appeared confused, stammered out some excuse, returned into the room where the rest of the people were assembled, and then collected about 17 shillings for the purpose, as he said, of sending delegates to different towns to consult what should be done. He distributed this money among people with whom Acres was totally unacquainted.—(Here the hon. member remarked, that the house would probably find the origin and explanation of the secret committee, of which they had heard so much.) A villain of a spy talked of, and pretended to consult a secret committee, of which there was no existence. On the same day this wretch (Lomax) requested Irwin and George Barton (Acres's brothers-in-law), to attend a meeting that night at 11 o'clock, which was to be held under an aqueduct, to arrange a plan for setting the factories on fire. They expressed their horror of the scheme, and threatened to inform against him if he ever mentioned such a thing again. Lomax replied, "We are sure to be taken up, I am at least, and we may as well have our revenge beforehand." The two Bartons mentioned this the same day to Acres, who was confirmed by it in his suspicion that Lomax was a spy. On the evening of the same day this wretch went to Oldham, and on his way gave a person at Hollingwood 2*s.* 6*d.* to shew him the house of one John Hague there. On his arrival, Hague was not at home: Lomax was anxious that he should be sent for, and expressed great disappointment on finding that his family did not know where he was. He said, "he must see him, for that something very particular was to happen that night." Being asked what it was, he replied, "Manchester will soon be set on fire, and the factories will blaze within two hours as a signal." The people supposed that he was mad. On going away he met Hague in the street, with some other persons, and told him in their presence, that he must summon his committee immediately on business of importance. Hague asked, "what business?" he replied, "You must come armed,—we are going to set fire to the factories at Manchester,—release our friends from the New Bayley Prison, and seize the barracks."—Hague exclaimed, "That fellow is a rascal; come away from him, men, or he will bring you into a scrape." Finding that he could not seduce them into mischief, he went away. This wretch Lomax, this infernal scoundrel, not contented with attempting himself to lead people into the commission of crimes, sent emissaries round the country to do the same thing. On the same day, (11th March) a person called on Healey and Bamford, at Middleton, and said he was sent by Lomax to make an important disclosure to them. They sent for some other persons to be present, and, upon promising secrecy, he told them, "it was intended to set fire to the factories, and release the blanketeers from prison that night, that they must muster the Middleton people, and come armed to St. George's Fields, where they would be joined by a division of the Manchester people." Upon expressing their horror at the scheme, and refusing to concur in it, the young man seemed greatly alarmed, lest they should inform against him; but they let him go, supposing him to be merely the tool of Lomax. Though rejected wherever he went, this villain, Lomax, seemed still to persist in his proposals of mischief. About the 24th of March, he went to two men, named Charles Wollen and Joseph Tapley, and requested them to walk with him as far as Mr. Eccleston's factory. When they got there, he produced a rocket, tinder, flint and steel, and wanted them to set fire to the factory; but they refused to be concerned in any such diabolical business, and left him. He afterwards went again to them, and urged them to go with him to Mr. Potter's factory, and he himself would set it on fire. He produced a crow-bar, which he said was for the purpose of forcing the window shutters; but they refused to have any thing to do either with him or his villainous project.—It seemed to be the plan of these spies to reconcile the minds of the people to mischief, by repeating the proposal of it. One object they accomplished, namely, that of making some people believe that there was a scheme in agitation to burn Manchester, because so many persons had heard of it. This circumstance had been stated to the hon. member himself, as a proof of the existence of the reported conspiracy. The facts which he had detailed would explain both the origin and progress of the rumour. Lomax did not attend the meeting of the 28th of March, when the persons charged with being concerned in this incendiary plot were arrested and taken to prison; but though absent from the meeting himself, he sent other people to it. He was, however, arrested that day, and liberated the next; while the people who had rejected his infamous proposals were confined for a considerable time in prison.—The hon. member then stated, that another of the spies, who called himself Dewhurst, having been seen in Sir John Byng's gig, was challenged with the fact, which he admitted, stating, that he had come with Sir John Byng as his servant, from London, where he had been desired by the reformers to act as their delegate. This man took every opportunity of becoming acquainted with those whom he had heard were advocates for parliamentary reform. He introduced himself to one Sellars, a cutler, by offering a knife handle to have a blade put to it on two successive days; and by pretending to be a friend of one Benbow, then in confinement, to whose wife he desired Sellars to give a shilling for him. Perhaps these knife handles, to which Sellars was to put blades, might account for the rumours of instruments of destruction being in the possession of the disaffected reformers.—This man (Dewhurst), availed himself of an opportunity of becoming acquainted, on the 17th of March, with one Nathaniel Hulton. Finding that Hulton was a tailor wanting work, Dewhurst told him that he was a tailor also, and would give him work if he would go with him that day to a meeting to be held at Middleton. Hulton went with him. In their way, they called on Sellars, who accompanied them with another man. The meeting, which consisted of 10 or 12 persons, was called for the purpose of raising money to support the families of the men who had been imprisoned, and for feeing counsel for them. No regular business was transacted, and no chairman appointed, but two or three people together seem to have talked to one another. Dewhurst was overheard recommending at this meeting some measures of violence. As the meeting consisted of so small a number, it was resolved to have another, on the 23d, at Chadderton, in the neighbourhood of Middleton. Hulton went there with Dewhurst, who treated both him and another person, in order to induce them to accompany him. The meeting being so small, and no money being subscribed, Dewhurst appointed another meeting for the 28th of March. "This," he said, "was being too kind to the country people; they ought to have come after dusk, as they themselves had gone to Middleton." Hulton declared that he had often heard Dewhurst, when talking with other people, assert, that "now (meaning, no doubt, after the imprisonment of the blanketeers), nothing but physical force would do." Possibly these expressions might be found in some of the green bags, for they had been often alluded to. On returning from this meeting, Hulton heard Dewhurst say to another person, that he knew where there were thousands of guineas in Manchester, and he could take them all, and would soon be out of the country, if they could not pull through." He added, "that there was an old lady who lived alone, and had a great deal of silver plate; he wished he had it, he would then melt it down, and set things a-going." Upon Hulton's remonstrating with him, he pretended it was all a joke. Thus (said the hon. member), when these wretches find that their infamous schemes, instead of meeting support, only excite horror, they practise on the simplicity of the poor people whom they wish to ensnare, by representing themselves as having been all the time in jest. One of the objects of Dewhurst and Robert Waddington, was to give an air of secrecy and mystery to meetings whose purpose was open and avowed. They agreed to give to different people pieces of paper cut in a triangular form, and corresponding with each other, on the production of which the bearers were to be admitted into their meetings. Dewhurst having learned from Sellars, that he had determined not to attend any more meetings, and to dissuade his friends from attending them, in consequence of hearing that spies were proposing schemes of mischief, sent Hulton to Middleton to invite the people to attend the meeting which he had appointed on the 28th of March. He gave him a shilling for his expenses, saying, "I am a ruined man, I have but one shilling in the world, but I will give it thee." He added, that it was very hard, after he had spent so much money, that the people would not come forward, and attend meetings. Hulton went to Middleton, and saw one Lancashire there, who said, the people did not much like coming, but they would come once more. (Here the hon. member remarked, that when the people were beginning to be tired of public meetings, the spies used all the means in their power to prevail on them to attend.) Waddington pursued the same course. He went to Tylexesley, Chowbent, and other places, to urge the people to come to the meeting, and told Hulton, on the 28th of March (to use his own words), that "they were such d—d soft fools, they durst not come forwards. He wished they would but join the Bolton people, and they would soon level Bolton, for he knew where the soldiers at Bolton put their arms at night, and could take them all himself." The meeting of the 28th was appointed at the Royal Oak, but Dewhurst thinking most probably that the people might be more easily arrested at the George and Dragon, at Ardwick, proposed that those already assembled should go there, and he would remain to take the rest. Robert Redeings came there at the desire of the Failsworth people, to protest against any violent resolves, or proceedings. This he told to Dewhurst, who attempted to persuade him to pursue a different course. Dewhurst said, that "Nathaniel Hulton had been to view the barracks, and the New Bayley Prison, and had laid down a plan by which they could be taken without difficulty or loss."—These plans he offered to shew to Redeings, who refused to look at them, saying, that the Failsworth people would have nothing to do with any such scheme. The very same night, this villain Dewhurst gave these pretended plans of Hulton's to another person (who luckily for himself threw them afterwards into the fire), saying, that "they came from Lord Cochrane, Sir Francis Burdett, and Major Cartwright." Soon after Redeings had gone to the George and Dragon, and Dewhurst had ordered them all into one room, Waddington began to talk with him, and to urge the plan of burning factories, of which Redeings expressed a just abhorrence. Waddington then said, "It is now time I should tell you my information: I have a letter from London this morning, and all the people in that neighbourhood are up. There are 80,000 at Chalk Farm, 100,000 at another place which he mentioned, and 60,000 or 70,000 at a third!" Redeings said, he did not believe a word of it, on which Waddington declared,

"there are many letters in town to the same effect." He affected to rummage his pockets, and to look for the letter, which he said, "he had left at home." Redeings said, "it did not matter, he would not believe it, whatever letters he had, for he was sure they were all forgeries." Soon after this, Dewhurst, being accused of being a traitor, left the room, saying, he would go and light his pipe. One person exclaimed, "I know he does not smoke." Upon his disappearance, the police officers came into the room, and seized them all. Waddington was seized along with the rest, and liberated the next day. Some persons having seen him in prison, or in his way to it, stated the fact, and were threatened with actions for defamation in consequence. Attempts were also made to induce them to retract what they had said, but there were too many witnesses to the fact, and Robert Waddington, of Bolton, was now publicly known as a convicted spy and informer. (Here the hon. member read the hand-bill published by the magistracy and police of Manchester, dated the 28th of March, in which they stated, that "information, on which they could place the fullest reliance, had reached them, of a most daring and traitorous conspiracy, the object of which was nothing less than open rebellion and insurrection."—"The town of Manchester was one of the first places pointed out for attack, and the moment fixed upon for the diabolical enterprise was the night of Sunday next the 30th instant.") Eleven men, including Waddington, were arrested at the meeting of the 28th. On Sunday the 30th, Manchester and the towns supposed to be pointed out for attack were perfectly tranquil—Wakefield (the hon. member believed), was one of them. Notice of this dreadful conspiracy had been sent there, and one of the magistrates being consulted as to the proceedings to be adopted, stated his conviction that all preparation to resist attack was unnecessary, for he was sure no attack was meditated. He, however, recommended the propriety, in deference to the information received, of being prepared, without making any demonstrations of preparation. No such demonstrations were made, and no disorder ensued, because none had ever been meditated. The same would, no doubt, have been the case in Manchester on the 30th, if not a man had been seized on the 28th. The seizure of 11 men, the spy included, was not a cause sufficient to account for the entire tranquillity of Manchester and the other towns, if the alleged conspiracy had ever really existed. If such a wide spread conspiracy had been prepared, there would surely have been some tendency to disturbance either in Manchester or somewhere else; but, after all the rumours of treason and rebellion, not even a breach of the peace occurred.—The hon. member then stated, that on the 23d of April, the Rev. Mr. Hay, stipendiary chairman of the Salford quarter sessions, alluding to this subject in his charge to the grand jury, made use of the following words:—"As judicial inquiries will be instituted against the offending parties, it would not be just to enter much upon the subject, but I may be permitted to say, should such inquiries take place, purposes of the blackest enormity must be discovered to the public; and that those who profess to doubt their existence, will finally be constrained to admit the existence of the whole of them." The magistrates, in their hand-bill, dated the 28th of March, declared the existence of a daring and traitorous conspiracy. The chairman of the quarter session, on the 23d of April, after time had passed for due examination, reasserted the fact, and used terms implying almost a disbelief of the possibility of any man honestly doubting it. Yet no conspiracy had been proved, nor had any conspirator been tried, though every one of the persons arrested had been liberated. (Hear, hear.) If there were any suspicion of their guilt, how great must be the danger of suffering men, implicated in such enormous crimes, to return to society? If they were not guilty, let them, as the petitioners required, be publicly and legally acquitted. (Hear, hear, hear.) The hon. member, after apologising for having so long detained the house, concluded by stating his intention of moving, on some early day, to refer the petition to a committee.

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

WAYS AND MEANS.] The report of the resolutions of the committee on the 6th instant was brought up and agreed to by the house. A bill was ordered to be brought in on the first three resolutions by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Brogden, &c. and a bill on the fourth resolution, by the same gentlemen.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] On the motion of Lord Castlereagh, the house went into a committee of the whole house, to take into consideration the treaty between his Britannic Majesty and his Catholic Majesty, for preventing their subjects from engaging in any illicit traffic in slaves. (See page 63.)

Lord Castlereagh next moved, that the address to the Prince Regent of the last session,—earnestly entreating his Royal Highness, that he would be pleased to pursue with unremitted activity those negotiations into which he had already entered on this most momentous subject,—be then read. (See Vol. I. p. 1793.)

His lordship then proceeded to observe, that, in looking at this subject as it now presented itself, he thought he could do nothing better than lay before the house the state of the abolition at the close of the last session, and then shew what had been done since that period. He begged the house to bear in mind that there were two distinct questions involved in this subject. First, What was the actual state of the abolition as a great international law? Secondly, What was its state with a view to giving effect to the whole principle on which it was founded? He would first shew the state of the law on this subject. Great improvements had been made in the law from year to year; but in no year was the improvement greater than in the last year. (Hear, hear.) To prove this at once, he had only to state, that all the crowns of Europe, except Portugal, so far as the south of the Line was concerned, had either abolished the slave trade, or entered into stipulations for its abolition at some future period. (Hear, hear.) The house would agree with him, that our own abolition of the trade, and all our enactments against it, were nothing, without exerting all our power and all our influence to put an end to it among other nations. There was, however, no other power whose continuance or discontinuance of the trade was of more importance than the power with whom the present treaty had been concluded. When he recollected the disappointment felt by the house at the continuance of the trade by France for a period now nearly elapsed, when he recollected how strongly this disappointment was felt and expressed, he was assured of the satisfaction it must give them to find Spain, infinitely the most important of all the European powers in this view, both for local authority and extent of colonies, stipulating for the final abolition of the trade. While Spain carried on, and protected by her trade and flag, this traffic both on the northern and on the southern coasts of Africa, all that France, Holland, and the other powers of Europe could do for the abolition was nugatory. There was no slave trade now to the north of the Line; it could be carried on by possibility only to the southward of the Line from May, 1820. After that period there could be no slave trade to the north of the Line; there could be no slave trade carried on with the West Indies. (Hear.) Till this treaty was effected, the legal and illicit trade were so mixed up, that the one gave ample protection to the other; but now there was a broad line of demarcation. There was a wide practical distinction between the abolition by treaty, or by the act of any particular state, and the giving effect to the principle of abolition. The congress at Vienna, if it had no other ground of merit or distinction, was entitled to the gratitude of mankind on this subject; for there, all the great powers of Europe made a declaration which stamped the slave trade as disgraceful, and made every state anxious to get out of it, as soon as circumstances would conveniently admit. The disgraceful practice and the unmanly theory of this trade were from that moment denounced. It was obvious, that, since the war ceased, the illicit slave trade was carried on with greater facility, under the colours of whatever state continued to carry it on. If this illicit trade did not extend as far as at any former period, it carried greater cruelty and malignity with it. The peril, the alarm, the violence of the illicit trader inflicted cruelties unknown when the more humane regular trader was concerned. In this state of the trade, more disgraceful and more painful circumstances occurred than before. We had no reason now to complain of any government on this point of the subject, for no government gave any encouragement to this illicit trade carried on under its flag. To France, in particular, he must do the justice to say, that she had done every thing in her power to check this illicit trade under her flag. The illicit trade was infinitely more easy in peace than during war. In the time of war, this country had extensive possessions in several parts of the world. No man would say that we ought to have retained these in our hands for the purpose of excluding slave traders. In time of war, our ships had the right to search neutral ships, and this, too, was a great check. He admitted all these difficulties as they had actually existed. We had now come to the last stage of the stipulations to put down this trade. The power with whom the present treaty was contracted, had afforded by its flag more protection to illicit slave traders than any other nation. This resource was now taken from that baneful evil. The house must be perfectly sensible of the jealousy which was felt by every maritime power, and of the prejudices that were always created by every proceeding which bore the appearance of an encroachment upon an independent flag. The government of Portugal was the first which had conceded the right of visit, under certain arrangements and regulations, to other nations. A sum of money had been paid to that power by virtue of a treaty similar in principle to the present, the consideration for which was made up of this concession, and of an indemnity to claimants for restitution against British captors. The Portuguese government had been, however, at that time called upon to determine at what period it would be prepared to adopt measures for the final and entire repression of the slave trade. These representations on our part had been continued with increasing success, aided by the favourable disposition and exertions of the Portuguese resident at the British court; and a treaty had at length been signed by which a certain period was fixed for the total abolition of this evil. The ratifications had not yet been exchanged, but it gave him satisfaction to communicate, that he had received an official notice that it had been approved of by the government, and that the ratifications might be immediately expected. (Hear, hear.) The house would thus see, that a disposition had been unequivocally evinced on the part of Portugal to abandon the traffic in slaves altogether. But it was obvious, that this desirable result could not have been brought about without concessions founded upon a principle of reciprocity: and that, whilst we, as acting in the discharge of a duty, claimed the right of searching Portuguese vessels, for the purpose of detecting an illicit trade, we necessarily subjected ourselves to a counter-claim of the same nature. The prudential inference from this admission of a reciprocal right was, that it must be for the interest of both parties to place the exercise of it under such regulations as should provide against vexatious disputes, and be so plain and intelligible, that it must be difficult for questionable points to arise in the ordinary course of executing the laws upon this subject. It was desirable, no doubt, that the grounds of detention should have been made more extensive; but he apprehended, that the policy of narrowing the exercise of this authority to some particular and palpable cases, would appear to be no less manifest. By the present treaty of regulation, no detention under the newly stipulated right of search was to take place, except in the case of slaves being found actually on board. There was reason to apprehend, if this right were carried to any further extent, that many doubtful acts, involving questions of a high and difficult nature, would arise. That apprehension alone appeared to him to prove satisfactorily the prudence of such an arrangement. There was, however, another special reason for appointing this limit to the principle of mutual interference. It was necessary that all nations should have an equal right of discovering the illicit practices carried on by the subjects of each other; and he could assure the house, that it would be a great error to believe, that the reproach of carrying on the slave trade illegally belonged only to other countries. In numberless instances, he was sorry to say, it had come to his knowledge, that British subjects were indirectly and largely engaged; and it was reasonable to suppose that there always would be sordid individuals, who would pursue their own interests under foreign disguise, and by the most criminal means. He wished to see the power of abolishing this illicit trade as universal as the law itself. (Hear, hear.) He hoped he should hereafter see the spirit of this universal law wrought into the moral feelings and habits of the whole of Europe. But this effect could not be expected to follow immediately upon the promulgation of the law; some time must be allowed to elapse, as we all knew it had been allowed to elapse in this country after the abolition, before the mind of the public could be prepared to regard it in that view which was now generally entertained respecting it by other powers. The object, therefore, of narrowing the right of detention within the limits he had described, was that of inducing all the different states of Europe to enter into a common system in that form which was most consistent with their own safety, and to which they would have the smallest difficulty in consenting. The absence of that full moral sympathy to which he had alluded was not the only obstacle which the situation of Spain and Portugal had presented to the exertions of his Majesty's ministers for the accomplishment of this end. They were powers whose territories comprised a vast extent of colonial coast, the superintendence over which was not within the reach of any administrative functions which had hitherto subsisted. With regard to France, he believed that, when the decree of abolition was passed by her government, it was intended to be carried into effect in the largest sense in which that term could be understood. The French cabinet was now engaged in considering the question of acceding to those arrangements which had at length been concluded between Great Britain and the courts of Portugal and Spain. On the subject of making the traffic punishable as a crime, he must observe, that this country was the first to set the example. Portugal had the credit of being the first to imitate it, and the Spanish government had the same purpose in contemplation. But even after these legislative penalties should have been enacted, there would still remain a great and obvious danger, if the flag of one nation were to be considered as a protection against the cruizers of every other. (Hear, hear.) If the abolition of the trade in slaves was of infinite importance to humanity, those regulations by which alone it could be effectually accomplished were not less worthy of consideration. A rational hope might be entertained that the different states of Europe, by combining their efforts and their rights, upon the same general arrangement, and in pursuit of the same end, would ultimately succeed in preventing the flag of any one state from being abused as a cover of their crimes by the subjects of another. Without some system thus efficacious and universal in the principles which it recognized, the house, he thought, would agree with him, that they should only have exchanged a regulated for an illicit trade, and that the abolition would only have caused it to be carried on in a more malignant form, and tinctured with a deeper character of atrocity. It was not merely important to obtain a recognition of the principle fully established by the treaties under consideration—he meant the principle of a mutual right of visit—but it became necessary to stipulate also the means of adjudication in cases of detention under the exercise of this right. No independent power could be expected to allow that the property of its subjects in time of peace should be seized and condemned to the extent of confiscation by the judgments of a foreign tribunal. Yet it was obvious, that to leave all such cases to the decision of that court to which the party captured would choose to resort, and which would naturally be that of his own country, would be far from satisfactory. The question thus arose, whether some tribunal of a mixed nature was not that which was best calculated to conciliate confidence; and the example of the one appointed by the treaty with France for the determination of colonial claims, afforded an encouraging belief that similar institutions would not operate unsuccessfully in this instance. It had appeared to him to be the best mode which had suggested itself of bringing such questions of forfeiture as should occur to an amicable as well as a just determination. All these arrangements, he could assure the house, had been the work of much time, and of protracted negotiation. That negotiation had continued in progress nearly three years, in consequence of the many difficulties which it was necessary to surmount, although the ability and diligence of Sir H. Wellesley in pursuing them, and of Mr. Vaughan, the minister at the court of Madrid in his absence, had entitled them to the esteem and gratitude of the country. In return for the advantages and concessions at length obtained, the house must of course have expected that some claim of compensation would be advanced by Spain. He might, however, assure them, that the difficulty had not lain in the disposition of the Spanish government, so much as in the prejudices naturally entertained upon this subject amongst a commercial and a colonial people. It was impossible for the government, without doing an imprudent violence to those prejudices, to have terminated the negotiations at an earlier period. With reference to the pecuniary compensation, amounting to 400,000*l.* which it was stipulated by this treaty that Spain should receive, he had to state, that so far from this being the only motive for acceding to it, the merchants at Havannah had offered a much larger sum to the court of Spain, for even a limited allowance of the trade. The house had had some experience as to the general nature of this subject, and former discussions had established certain criteria by which it was now necessary in justice to estimate it. On one occasion, which the house must well remember, when his Majesty's ministers were pressed to disclose what was the state and course of the pending negotiations ont his subject, he had mentioned, that an offer had been made on the part of the British to the Spanish government of the sum of 850,000*l.* upon the conditions contained in the treaty now concluded, together with a loan of 10,000,000 of dollars, in consideration of an immediate abolition; and that this offer had been refused. Not a voice was then raised in parliament to disapprove of this offer as excessive or impolitic. Some members there were, whom he now saw in their places, who declared their persuasion that it was vain to expect that Spain, however she might negotiate, would ever finally consent to a treaty of abolition. He hoped that, with these recollections, the house would take an honest view of this question, and not shrink from the limited pecuniary sacrifice which they were called upon to make. He had already said, that it did not grow out of any aversion before entertained by the Spanish cabinet to the measure at length happily adopted, though unquestionably the sentiment declared at the congress of Vienna had carried its influence to every court of Europe. The government of Spain had referred the question to the council of the Indies, whose decision admitted the principle of abolition, but under such qualifications as rendered it impossible to view it immediately as a question chiefly of moral feeling. A much larger sum was required than his Majesty's ministers thought it right to concede, and they had experienced considerable embarrassment in the settlement of this claim. The original offer of 850,000*l.* and a loan of ten millions of dollars, was a millstone about the necks of the British government in the late negotiation. His Majesty's ministers had been obliged to represent to the court of Spain, that, since the offer to which he had adverted, England had fought in the cause of the world, and that, having achieved its safety, it had been rendered unable, by its efforts, to expend the sum originally proposed; and therefore, that Spain must confine her claims within narrower limits. It was stipulated at length, that 400,000*l.* should be paid in one entire sum, and that the portion of it which was to indemnify claimants under illegal captures should be paid to the Spanish government in the first instance, to whom the claimants would then have to look for satisfaction. This last was the course adopted in the Portuguese treaty, and appeared the more proper, as the claims in question were not upon the British government, but upon the captors. It had been requested, that arrangements and regulations should be made, by which such claims might be substantiated as might be considered just, and that such compensation as was thought advisable might be given for all losses that would be sustained. Claims were made, and claims to a very large amount indeed, which the parties were, however, induced finally to withdraw. The articles were, in consequence, altered to the state in which they now appeared. Under all circumstances, then, he trusted that the sum which had been agreed upon had been reduced as low as possible, and that it went, in reality, very little, if at all, beyond what the general justice of the country might be supposed to afford. Indeed, it seemed to him, that the affair could not now take another course. There was one objection which might be urged against this transaction, and that was, that the money might be appropriated to other, and, it might be said, to better purposes. The house would, however, feel, that that ought to have been taken at a much earlier period in the negotiations upon the subject: for if any such objection had been made, his Majesty's ministers would never have suffered the affair to proceed, if there had been any prohibitions of a pecuniary nature. Differences of opinion might exist with respect to the mode in which Spain intended to apply this money. But he deprecated any mixing up of the South American question (for the consideration of which other opportunities would occur) with the question then before the house. We ought to receive the concessions of Spain, on the important subject of the abolition of the slave trade, with cordiality, and whatever difference of opinion might exist on other points of Spanish policy, on the topic of the abolition of the slave trade, there could be but one sentiment. Every credit ought to be given to the acts of the court of Madrid with respect to it, and nothing should be allowed to occur that was calculated to weaken the bond of union between the two countries on this subject. With respect to the question of South America, he thought it was one of too great magnitude to be discussed incidentally with what was at present before the house. Indeed, he did not think the house could enter into such a discussion for another reason—they had not information sufficient about that country to enable them to consider its bearings upon any question: they did not know precisely the situation in which it stood. That was a question, indeed, that involved too many great principles for any man hastily to discuss it, and all the complicated policy with which it was connected. He trusted, that there was nothing to excite any adverse feelings on the part of any gentleman, but that they would all allow that it was wise and proper to enter into such a treaty; that it was liberal and just; and that, under those feelings, they would not mix it with grounds which could not properly be discussed till they were fully understood. On the whole, he hoped that there would be but one feeling of gratitude to Spain for an exertion which was so much to her honour, and to the benefit of the world—an exertion, he said, for it was a great exertion on her part. He trusted, that when that one great effort had been made, no difference would arise between the governments, but that it would be seen and understood; and that Spain intended not only to abolish the slave trade as far as she was concerned, but to effect what would be, in fact, its complete annihilation. It was evident that it could never have been abolished but for Spain; for though the traffic might have been excluded from our own colonies, and from parts with which we were intimately connected, as long as the Spanish flag should float on her foreign possessions, it would be kept up there, in all the southern provinces of the United States, and in the whole of that depot to which those who employed themselves in such transactions would constantly resort.—He did not know that he had any thing further of importance to state to the committee, but he was glad that we might congratulate ourselves upon drawing so nearly to the close of so infamous a traffic. We had one satisfaction—all had been done that was in our power. By legislation it was known how great had been the exertions of the country. With respect to regulation and treaty, the exertion of that principle had been commenced, and he hoped we should soon see the good effects of the proceedings. He had no doubt but the additional articles which had been prefixed to the treaty would meet with entire concurrence, in consideration of the powers which they reposed in us. From the declaration which the government of Spain had made, that no effort should be omitted on their part for the abolition of the slave trade, he could not help thinking that—great as might be the repugnance of the country to any regulation on the subject—he could not help thinking that it would be a final advantage; and that, guided as they were, the moral feelings which would inspire them would overcome their repugnance, and that we should discover some method by which all nations might become united in the same sentiment with regard to the destruction of this trade. Under these circumstances he should move, 'that the committee should make such provision as should seem to them necessary for the fulfilment of a treaty between his Britannic Majesty and his Most Catholic Majesty, for preventing their subjects from engaging in any illicit traffic in slaves, signed at Madrid, the 23d of September 1817.' And if the house should be of opinion that his motion was such as ought to be entertained, he should move for leave to bring in a bill or bills in pursuance of that motion, and when the house went into a committee of supply, should move a resolution for a sum of 400,000*l.* in consequence of the provisions of those bills. In this, as in all proceedings of a similar nature, it was for the legislature to complete the work. The crown could only take steps subject to the disapproval or confirmation of parliament. But he hoped, that when the great extent of the benefit that would be conferred was put in comparison with the money that was to be paid, or the inconvenience that might be incurred, parliament would not fail to set an example to all the countries of Europe, and to shew, that that power which was so great in point of marine rights, was the first to submit its flag and those rights, so that it might prevent them from becoming the cloak of crime and immorality, and those principles which were now become universally and justly detested by the world. (Hear, hear.)

The motion which the noble lord had read having been put from the chair,

Sir Gilbert Heathcote rose and observed, that the 400,000*l.* might be much more advantageously distributed in this country. It would furnish the means of giving to 8,000 individuals the sum of 50*l.* each. To him it appeared to be false humanity to be thus seeking for channels of disposing of our money, however benevolent our intention. Nor did it appear to him that Spain had the power of expediting the abolition of the Slave Trade to the extent desired. Without touching on the subject, the discussion of which at the present moment the noble lord had very properly deprecated, he might say, that the revolt of the Spanish colonies in South America was notorious, that several of those colonies had established their independence, and that probably the whole of Spanish America would eventually be emancipated. What would then be the situation of Spain with reference to colonial possessions? Those possessions would be confined to Cuba and to the Spanish part of St. Domingo. We should in that case be purchasing honour at too dear a rate. He was astonished that his Majesty's ministers could advise the Prince Regent to accede to such a treaty at such a time. Whether in peace or in war, the people of this country were, it seemed, to be goaded into madness by incessant demands on their pockets. It was impossible that we could thus continue to be the general paymasters of Europe. He was surprised that ministers were not impressed with the necessity of discontinuing so profuse a system of policy. He hoped that this would be the last instance of it, and that henceforth the strict line of economy would be constantly observed. If that house wished to regain the good opinion of the public, of which they had lost much of late years, they must well consider grants of this nature before they acquiesced in them. They must act up to the real principles of the constitution, and shew themselves the faithful and vigilant guardians of the public purse. With respect to the traffic in question, no man detested it more than himself; but when there was so much distress at home, he thought parliament bound to demand from ministers a much more satisfactory explanation, before they acceded to a demand which added at once 20,000*l.* a year to the national expenditure. He wished them to remember the old proverb, "Be just, before you are generous." If our coffers were full, he would allow them to take millions for such a purpose; but empty as they were, he would oppose granting 400 pence to any Potentate in Europe.—He should satisfy himself with strongly protesting against the measure; although he was not a little inclined to move an address to the Prince Regent, praying that that part of the treaty which granted to Spain the sum of 400,000*l.* might not be carried into execution.

Mr. Wilberforce expressed his surprise at the observations of the hon. baronet. He was persuaded that the house would think that the sum of 400,000*l.* could not be better expended than in the way proposed. As to the proposition for granting 50*l.* each to 8,000 individuals in this country, the hon. baronet forgot that if the 400,000*l.* were not voted for the purpose under discussion, it would not be voted for any other. Instead of 8,000 persons, however, among whom this 400,000*l.* might be divided, or on whom, to take another view of the subject, the expense was to fall, the whole population of the Empire ought to be calculated upon, and it would then appear, that the relief in the one case, and the burden in the other, amounted to two-pence halfpenny a man; and the question then was, whether for such a consideration, a national object, an object of such unquestionable humanity, an object so connected with the character of the country, should be abandoned? One thing was perfectly clear,—that the hon. baronet's proposal could not be adopted, and that the treaty, and with it all hope of the extinction of the Slave Trade, must be wholly rejected, or that it must be accepted with the pecuniary engagement under consideration. As one who always wished for the final abolition of the Slave Trade, he considered the noble lord entitled to his highest gratitude for that long course of diplomatic exertion which he had employed in favour of the cause; and for the issue which seemed certain to crown his labours, he was still more entitled to his thanks. It would be a very narrow view of the question indeed, merely to consider it with reference to Spain itself; he considered it as the great moral principle, the total abolition of the Slave Trade (Hear, hear), to complete which nothing more seemed necessary than to carry into execution what was now proposed. The hon. baronet was taking a very incorrect view of the subject, if he thought the payment of the sum stipulated so much money lost to the country. Supposing that we were really determined to effect the abolition of the Slave Trade without the treaty, there could scarcely be any thing more likely to give rise to disputes between this country and others, and a single armament would cost more than the whole amount of this very sum; (Hear) and were we to conclude that we were ever to hope to see a commercial connexion formed with that country which had only hitherto been the scene of cruelty and brutality! He confessed that he was sanguine enough to believe, that he should himself live to see the period when we should derive the greatest advantages from our intercourse with a people no longer classed with the beasts of the field, but invested with that moral dignity which is the undoubted attribute of all human beings. He trusted that this period was not far distant, as there was at that moment upon the coast of Africa a free community living under the influence and protection of British laws, and fast approaching to the condition of a flourishing colony. It would be an interesting, and striking, and glorious scene; and we should form a connexion with the interior, which would more than compensate for all the trouble and expense of our exertions. It was truly said, that much difficulty had been endured in the prosecution of the design connected with this great object; and for the success of the present treaty, he believed that we were indebted in a great degree to the congress at Vienna. But we should not expect too much at once from Spain and Portugal, when we recollected our own former share in the trade, though he had not despaired of making them ashamed of continuing it. When the money was deducted which was to be considered as compensation, there might remain 200,000*l.*; but Spain would not perhaps reckon that as so much paid; and we ought not to think too much of those things, for there might be many who wanted compensation and indemnification, and it was not known exactly to us what might be the state of the commercial interests of that country. There might even some of that money revert to some of our own subjects. The Slave Trade ought to be abolished for ever. It was not sufficient to pass a law that it should be so. When all the powers had agreed to its abolition, he trusted it would be called by its proper title, nothing short of piracy, and be visited with the punishment due to that crime. (Hear, hear.) If such, then, were really the nature and character of that trade; if we carried it on for so many years, and could so long submit ourselves to such a a traffic: if we judged from the tardy justice which we ourselves had rendered; if we could continue the trade as we did when we had the means of providing our colonies—if all these things were considered, was there not something due from us? Did we not owe a sort of smart-money for what we had done? To make up for the injuries we had brought upon Africa, we ought not to be unwilling to make such a sacrifice. He hoped sincerely that when the hon. baronet came to reflect a little, he would not think the money given likely to be wasted, or to be improperly bestowed. If, indeed, we only considered it upon the most simple commercial footing, as a common mercantile regulation, we should find it abundantly recompensed by the result; but when there was a nobler consideration to interfere, such a sum might easily be sacrificed. As an act of generosity we ought to spare it, for, indeed, he considered generosity itself as only justice; and considering the many blessings which the Almighty had showered upon this country, he should be ashamed to refuse such a sum, though it might do much towards alleviating the miseries of our fellow-countrymen. He hoped that other measures would also be adopted. It might be necessary to remind the house that his noble friend was placed in a new diplomatic path, which had not been trodden before, and that, therefore, he was surrounded with greater difficulties. It was not fair to estimate the whole of the benefit to be derived from the measure by looking at it singly; it was in point of fact nothing more than the foundation-stone, or the single arch, from which a building was to arise which would reflect more honour upon the humanity and magnanimity of these times than any other act whatever. He could not but think that the grant would be more than repaid to this country in commercial advantages, by the opening of a great continent to our industry, an object which would be entirely defeated if this traffic was to be carried on by the Spanish nation. Considering it either with regard to interest or generosity, he felt that it reflected honour on his noble friend who had brought it forward, and on the house which was likely to adopt it.

Sir O. Mosley said, he looked upon the hon. gentleman as the saviour of the African slave, and it was, therefore, very painful indeed to say any thing against what he had advanced. He could not agree to the propriety of voting so large a sum of money for such a purpose, and he wished the hon. gentleman would consider the millions which that house were continually voting away. If he was not right, he hoped the noble lord would correct him; but there was something which he recollected, that seemed to shew, that this grant was unnecessary and superfluous. The court of Spain, if he was not mistaken, had stipulated to abolish the slave-trade in eight years, without compensation.—(Lord Castlereagh signified his dissent from this statement.)—He had so understood it, but would submit, if he was wrong; but supposing his impression to be correct, why should they not rather wait for the expiration of that period, than come forward under the present circumstances of the country, with four hundred thousand pounds? He believed the fact to be, that the court of Spain was too politic for us. The slave-trade, after all, was but of little importance to her. She was at war with her colonies; if in that war she was unsuccessful, of what use would it be? And what would be the consequence, as far as the object of this vote was concerned? Why, we should in all probability be called upon to vote the same sum to that separate independent government, which, in such an event, would be established. He hoped in God that such a separation would take place. It was the interest of mankind that it should: it was particularly the interest of this fine and commercial country, that other countries should be free, and in a condition to reciprocate commercial advantages upon liberal and enlightened principles. His hon. friend on the bench below (Mr. Wilberforce) had spoken of the great commercial advantages to be derived from an establishment on the coast of Africa. He would beg leave to remind him what that had cost already, what sums of money had been expended on the colony of Sierra Leone, and how many lives had been lost. His hon. friend had further stated, that the question amounted to this—whether the slave trade should be abolished or not? He could by no means agree with him in such an interpretation. He had himself voted for the abolition, and he felt as much pride of heart as any man who had so voted, in having contributed to put down that abominable and inhuman traffic. The question appeared to him to be this—whether they would grant such a sum to enable Spain to carry on the war against her colonies? And in deciding upon this question, they would do well to consider, whether, by redeeming by such an expedient one African slave, they did not in effect impose slavery upon thousands now struggling for freedom in another quarter of the world? He should not trespass any longer upon their time by giving his opinions, which would probably be attended with no effect; but he felt it a duty incumbent on him to state to the house, that he regarded the treaty, as far as concerned the point to which he had directed his observations, one of the most impolitic, nefarious and ruinous that ever was entered into; and, entertaining such opinions, he should feel himself under the necessity of pressing the question to a vote.

Lord Castlereagh, in explanation, said that Spain was under no pledge of the nature alluded to by the hon. baronet. The Spanish minister had stated eight years as the period when his Catholic Majesty might find it convenient to enter into arrangements with a view to the abolition of the slave-trade, but there was no positive engagement which pledged the Spanish nation to the discontinuance of the traffic at the expiration of eight years. He (the noble lord) attached far more consequence to the articles of regulation in the present treaty, than to the formal concurrence of Spain in the abolition.

Sir J. Macintosh professed that he should have contented himself with a silent vote on the present occasion, as he thought nothing could be added to the eloquent and able address of his hon. friend, the member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce), if he did not wish to express his opinion on the slave-trade abolition act, and to answer some observations which fell from two hon. baronets who had spoken against this treaty, and who, he was sure, felt the same abhorrence of the inhuman traffic which it abolished as he did. Concurring with the last speaker in his opinion of the faith of Spain, and in his wishes with respect to the South American cause, he could not agree with him in his remarks on the impolicy or the inefficiency of the present measure. The slave-trade abolition was the greatest question which could come before the house, and to accomplish effectually such an object, no sacrifice could be reckoned too great, involving, as it did, not only the greatest prospective advantages to the nation, but the national morality and character. (Hear, hear.) The hon. baronet who spoke last, in his censure of the treaty upon the table, had omitted, as had been remarked by the noble lord opposite, the most important part of the case, by not adverting to the circumstance that it was not only a treaty of stipulation, but of regulation. (Hear.) He (Sir J. Macintosh) wondered how any one who doubted the good faith of Spain, who thought that any engagement entered into with that power could not be relied upon, should yet profess himself contented with a bare stipulation to abolish the traffic at the end of eight years, and forget those regulations, the regulations for enforcing this engagement, which constituted the most important part of the treaty. (Hear, hear.) He (Sir J. Macintosh) concurred with the noble lord in the objections he felt to grant the right of searching British vessels, except on very strong grounds. He felt for the glory of the country as warmly as any man; he felt for the honour of the British flag; he was proud of that commercial prosperity which it covered, and of those triumphs which it had gained: but while he considered that it had never been disgraced by defeat, or lowered to an enemy; while he reflected that we had clung to it in danger; that it had carried us through the storms that assailed us; that it not only constituted our national security, but was the source of our national honour, he thought that it now rose to higher honours by bending to the cause of humanity and justice. (Loud cheering.) Our pride for a moment was suspended, our feelings of jealous ambition gave way, when we saw that which had braved the storms of war, and appeared triumphant on every sea and against every opponent, bending to protect the feeble, and oppressed, and the ignorant; whose gratitude we should aspire to deserve, though they were perhaps not sensible of our efforts for their welfare. (Hear, hear.) He heard with infinite satisfaction from the noble lord, that there was a general desire among the governments of Europe to take the most effectual means to secure the abolition. He heard these assurances with more pleasure as regarded France, as appearances in that country were rather unfavourable. He could not forget, that after Prince Talleyrand in July, 1815, had declared the abolition by the French government, and after the same measure was solemnly stipulated in the treaty of November of the same year, the British admiralty, on inquiring last year what had been done to carry the treaty into execution, found that no act had been passed till January 1817. These were circumstances that had created great uncertainty in his mind, with regard to the favourable disposition of France to this great cause, and he was happy to find that the noble lord had obtained the assurances which this night he had expressed. The conduct of Holland, he was happy to see, was very different; and the measures of the government of that country were the more honourable to it, as they appeared connected with a great apparent sacrifice of national interest, and ran counter to strong national prejudices. The habits and principles of that people were more colonial and commercial than those of any other nation; the slave-trade appeared one of the great sources of their prosperity, and of the most important means of cultivating their settlements; and the abolition of it, therefore, was to be regarded as the triumph of principle over interest. (Hear, hear.) There was no doubt, from the pledges they had already given of their sincerity, that they would concur in any regulation for the most effectual abolition.—Adverting to an observation of the last speaker, that he originally concurred in the act of abolition in this country, but would make no pecuniary sacrifices to procure it in others, the hon. member said, that in this averment the hon. baronet did not appear consistent in reasoning; for in voting the abolition as regarded Great Britain, he had certainly voted an apparent pecuniary sacrifice. He had agreed to a measure which its opponents declared would ruin our colonial prosperity; and which certainly, in the mean time, affected extensively some of our commercial interests. It had in the end been so far from producing any injury, that it really had turned out to the national advantage. If such was the case with the British abolition act, if it had at first appeared a sacrifice, and had ultimately become not less beneficial in its operation than it was honourable in its motive, might it not be expected that the apparent sacrifice of pecuniary interest required by the present treaty would redound as much to our advantage as to our character and consistency? (Hear, hear.) He had nothing more to say but to express his approbation of the provisions of the treaty under consideration. He did so, because it gave the right of mutual search, the only security against illicit traffic; because he thought it embraced the only effectual means of putting an end to the barbarities of the African trade; because it was only calling upon parliament to redeem the pledges which it had given in its numerous addresses to the throne, condemning the trade, expressing its desire of seeing it abolished, and imploring the Prince Regent to take effectual measures with his allies for that purpose; (Hear) because, as long as the abolition was partial, greater evils must arise to the natives of Africa from an illicit traffic, than those from which we had rescued them; (Hear) and because every step taken in this great cause was an advance to its final success. The hon. member in concluding said, he would take the liberty of giving an explanation of a passage of an eloquent, able, and learned judgment of a right hon. gentleman, (Sir W. Scott) whom he was sorry not now to see in his place, which as applied to the right of search had been misapprehended. The judgment was given in the case of the French ship Louis, by the first authority in Europe, and a general observation in it had been misunderstood. In opposition to the interpretation put on the passage to which he referred, he would contend, that if, after this treaty, the commander of a British cruiser sees a ship engaged in the slave-trade which he believes to have Spanish property on board, and if it really turns out that it belongs to the subjects of another nation, any fraudulent use of the flag could not protect it against the operation of the ninth article of the treaty. That article stipulates the right of mutual search, and the officers of each nation may visit suspected vessels. If slaves are found on board belonging to Spanish subjects, the condemnation is a matter of course. If they belong to Spaniards, though under the Dutch, Hamburgh, or other flag, the owners could not be heard.

Mr. C. Grant, jun. expressed his satisfaction at the judgment adverted to by his hon. and learned friend, but did not see how it could be mistaken. The property of Spaniards in slaves, under any flag, could not be protected from capture. He might illustrate this position by a reference to the rights of neutrals and belligerents in time of war. A suspected vessel in the latter case, though under a neutral flag, might be detained, and if it carried enemy's property might be condemned. He would not trouble the house with many observations, as it appeared to be unanimous in approving of the present treaty. The hon. baronet who spoke last but one, had alluded to the application of the money to be granted by the present treaty, and had insinuated that Spain entered into the cause of the abolition merely with a view to this advantage; but he ought to have recollected, that if the Spanish government had merely looked to pecuniary advantages, it would have received a greater sum from its own subjects for leave to continue the trade, than it now obtained from us for abolishing it. The merchants of the Havannah would have given 2,000,000*l.* for such a licence. He congratulated the house and the country on the great progress which the cause of humanity had made within the last century, and the extraordinary change which had taken place in public opinion. In the beginning of the last century, we deemed it a great advantage to obtain by the assiento contract, the right of supplying with slaves the possessions of that very power which we were now paying for abolishing the trade. During the negotiations which preceded the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, we higgled for four years longer of this exclusive trade; and in the treaty of Madrid, we clung to the last remains of the assiento contract. A new era had now dawned: we looked in vain for the barbarities that desolated Africa, which, at the beginning of the last century, was the scene of a consecrated rapine, the asylum of legalized violence. Our laws now declared the trade to which we formerly clung to be a crime. Our efforts had been successful in awaking other nations to the same sentiments of humanity with which we were actuated. Much of this favourable disposition of foreign governments to the cause of the abolition was to be attributed to the congress of Vienna. We had there engaged the Sovereigns of Europe to stipulate for the abolition of the trade in slaves; we had since made the abolition an indispensable article in all our treaties and negotiations; we had spread light on those cruelties from which we called upon all civilized nations to rescue Africa. The universal abolition was not far distant. The trade had continued so long to disgrace European commerce, because the atrocities in which it originated, and which it tended to perpetuate, were not known in all their enormity. Even in England the public did not for a long time believe them, or view them in their proper light. The ignorance in which the other nations of Europe lay with regard to this subject was now nearly dispelled, and we might expect the burst of feeling which appeared in England to become general. Then, and not till then, would our labours be closed, and our end attained. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bennett gave his cordial approbation to the treaty, and thought that the pecuniary sacrifice was insignificant, compared with the magnitude of the object in view. He declared, that he believed there could be no difficulty in raising the sum for such an object, though it were only by a subscription from house to house. (Hear, hear.) He rose, however, for a different purpose than to make any observations on the present treaty. He wished to bring under the view of the house the conduct of France in this great cause. He could not but say, that we had been used in the most scandalous manner by the government of that country. The house would remember the declaration of France through her minister Talleyrand, in favour of the abolition of the trade, immediately after the battle in which so much British blood had flowed to restore the monarch of that country to his throne. After this, there were complaints that the trade was still carried on by French subjects; and when, nearly two years afterwards, our minister at the French court applied to know what had been done to carry the abolition into effect, the answer was, that some colonial regulation had taken place; but it had subsequently come out in court, that no such order or regulation as was intimated had ever been issued. It made no difference that the trade was not carried on in British vessels, if it was carried on by British capital. An active trade in slaves was well known to have been carried on up to a very recent period by French subjects, since the delivery of Senegal to France. The trade had revived in that part of Africa, and had given rise to all those evils with which it was formerly attended. It had armed nation against nation — tribe against tribe — Moors against negroes. The kings stripped their villages, to send the people down to the French traders; and these traders were throwing back the settlements into that state of misery, distress and wretchedness, in which they had been antecedent to the time of the abolition. He would ask the noble lord if we were still to allow ourselves to be deluded by the French government?—Was the old French system again to be acted on?—He hoped we should not again, from experience, come to the conclusion that we cannot trust them. Was a treaty to be no security?—And was there always to be some stroke of policy played off—always to be some trick and subterfuge to avoid carrying the stipulations of a treaty into execution?—We knew too well the faithlessness of the rulers of France.—He would not say but that those who now governed that country were better than the man who lately held its sceptre; but we were acquainted with the race that ruled that nation, and we knew how faithless they had always been. He would not, at this time, enter into all the details which had passed on this subject with the person who was now detained at St. Helena; but, under all the circumstances of the case, he called upon the house to say, whether the noble lord did not owe it to the country to explain, whether the slave-trade was not to be carried on by the French government with as much vigour, and to as great an extent, as we knew it had, till within a few months, been carried on?

Lord Castlereagh said, that if any thing could discourage the French government from pursuing that honourable conduct to which they had so fully pledged themselves, and in which all the nations of Europe were so deeply interested, it must arise from viewing their actions in the light in which the hon. member had been pleased to place them. He was not French lawyer enough to know what hold the principles of a treaty between the French government and another power had on French subjects, without the authority of a law of the country to give effect to them. This, however, he could say, that no engagement could have recorded in more explicit and comprehensive terms the abolition of the slave-trade on the part of France. He had considered it his duty, in consequence of difficulties which had been started on the point, to make inquiries whether the law of France could take notice of a treaty entered into with a foreign power, the provisions of which, in so far as obligatory on France, were not incorporated into a law of that country. However that might be, to his certain knowledge, the French government had immediately acted on the treaty, and sent despatches to the different ports for the purpose of securing its execution. He could state also that the governor of the Island of Bourbon had actually been displaced by the French government for allowing the trade in slaves to be carried on in that colony. And he could also say, that whenever any information had been received by him respecting any traffic in slaves on the part of French subjects, he had transmitted it regularly to the French government, and they had never received it otherwise than with every appearance of the most anxious desire to act upon it. He certainly was not aware of any defect in the law, till the question was lately brought into discussion in a court of justice. After an adjudication on that point, he apprehended that France would consider it her duty to adopt such ulterior regulations as the necessity of the case might require; and, indeed, he was prepared to state, that the French ambassador had not only represented the facts to his court, but had also requested him to communicate all the laws which had been passed in this country, at the same time stating, that his government was most sincerely desirous of concurring in every measure which might tend to secure the great object in question. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Gordon considered the right of search a very great advantage gained by the present treaty. He was aware that 400,000*l.* was here given for what could not be received for three years to come; and that this money was given on chance. But he thought the country would very willingly advance this sum, even though they might be deceived; for it would put us in the right, and give us the strongest claims against Spain. He certainly doubted very much the ability of the merchants of the Havannah to advance two millions to the Spanish government.

Mr. Marryat stated, that many vessels belonging to subjects of Spain and Portugal, engaged in the slave trade, had been in time of peace captured by our cruizers, without any treaty to warrant such a proceeding, and condemned in our courts. The value of the slaves per head, of which they were so deprived, might be calculated at 350 dollars. They had not prosecuted their claims, and the bounty money had been paid to the captors. If they had prosecuted their claims, the sum which these persons would have had to receive would have amounted to much more than the sum stipulated in this treaty. With respect to the objection, that this money might possibly be applied towards carrying on hostilities against South America, they were to consider whether the possible chances of such misapplication ought to outweigh the positive advantages which we gained by this treaty, which, coupled with the treaty which was understood to be concluded at the same time with Portugal, put the abolition hereafter in our own power. With respect to the appointment of commissioners on the coast of Africa, and in the Spanish settlements, for the adjudication of causes, pursuant to the twelfth article of the treaty, he conceived that Sierra Leone, notwithstanding all the partiality which the hon. member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce), had for that place, was ill adapted for the residence of commissioners, in consequence of its being at a great distance directly to the windward of the places to which the slave traders principally resorted. He had the authority of Sir James Yeo for saying, that it took frequently ten weeks in beating up to Sierra Leone, and during such a length of time, the mortality in the vessels must be very great. With respect to the conduct of the French government, he could only say, that at Martinique, he had made it his business to inquire into the subject, and he found at that colony, that as soon as could be expected after the treaty, instructions had been sent out in a man of war, and from its arrival no vessels had cleared out from the custom-house of Martinique, for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade. He thought there was no good ground for accusing the French court of insincerity.

Mr. Wilberforce said, he had no partiality for Sierra Leone more than any other place, as a seat of the commissioners. He would readily assent to the nomination of any other place that might be thought more convenient.

Sir W. Burroughs conceived that the grant of this sum was nothing more than an act of justice to Spain, many of the vessels of which country had been captured in peace, when no treaty authorized such a proceeding. No less than 5,000 slaves had been seized in this way, and the value of each was stated at 75*l.*—This alone amounted to upwards of 300,000*l.* without including the value of the vessels, &c. He thought the noble lord and the British ambassador in Spain were entitled to thanks for the able manner in which they had conducted this negotiation; and he hoped that those members who had expressed disapprobation of the treaty would, on better reflection, withdraw their opposition, and that the motion would be agreed to unanimously.

The question was then loudly called for, and strangers were ordered to withdraw. On a division, the numbers were—

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.] On a motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the House should resolve itself into a committee of supply, it was ordered, that the Spanish treaty should be referred to the said committee, and that the same should sit on Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, Feb. 10.

IRISH GRAND JURIES ACT SUSPENSION BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, Feb. 10.

The Right Hon. Thomas Wallace, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, took the oaths and his seat for Cockermouth. (See page 16.)

LONDON NEW PRISON.] Sir W. Curtis brought up the report of the committee upon a petition of the Sheriffs and Common Council of London, respecting the completion of this prison.

Upon the report being read and agreed to, the hon. baronet moved, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for raising an additional sum of money for carrying into execution the acts of parliament for building a new prison for debtors, in the City of London, and for extending the powers of the said Acts."

Mr. H. Sumner observed, that the City of London was as much bound as any other city or town, to build and support its own prisons, without putting its hands into the pockets of the public for that purpose. Therefore, unless strong grounds were laid for the proposed measure, he should feel it his duty to oppose it in limine.

Sir W. Curtis said, that the petition contained an ample explanation of those grounds. The fact was, that the erection and alteration of the new prison for debtors, had cost no less than 130,000*l.* and it was in order to provide for the excess beyond the former grant, namely, for 30,000*l.*, that the motion which he had had the honour to submit was brought forward. The City of London was always ready, as the hon. member for Surrey desired, to support its own prisons; but the misfortune was, that it was too often called upon to support numerous prisoners from other districts. Still, the citizens of London did not seek to put their hands into the pockets of the public, but only the liberty of raising the money required among themselves, through the medium of the orphans' fund, as it was improperly called; for this fund had nothing whatever to do with orphans, and should rather be denominated a fund for the improvement of the city of London. The duty on coals was not compulsive on every body, as people might buy and sell them elsewhere, if they chose. It was a duty for improvement and benefit. Parliament had recognized the principle, and its faith should be maintained.

Mr. Bennet said, that upon this subject it was necessary that the house should consider, first, the propriety of granting the money required, and secondly, the manner in which that money was to be applied. He was enabled, from personal observation, to say, that of all the gaols in England, that in Whitecross-street was the most unfit for its object, and the most incommodious for the prisoners, while it was by far the most expensive in its construction. It was only necessary, indeed, to examine this clumsy edifice, to be satisfied of the fact; for would it be believed, that a prison intended for the accommodation of hundreds of prisoners, was not even fire-proof? He had the honour of being a member of the committee of that house which visited this prison, and recommended certain alterations, but those alterations could not require such a sum as the hon. baronet demanded. The hon. baronet had remarked, that such as did not think proper to contribute to the sum proposed to be raised, might go elsewhere than to the port of London for coals. This was a very extraordinary remark, especially considering the number of comparatively useless turnpikes which had been already erected upon the Thames. He alluded to the new locks, many of which were mere jobs; for although it was said, that they were erected for the security of the navigation and trade of the river, it was a fact that no one who had a barge of coals to convey, could deem it safe from robbery, without employing persons for its special protection. The city of London had been profuse in the expenditure of its funds. Whenever any ministerial object was to be promoted, it was always ready with its presents, its swords, and its snuff-boxes: but it would become this city to be just before it was generous—to rescue its gaols from that discreditable, disgraceful state in which they notoriously were, before they stood forward with ostentatious and unnecessary donations. The state of Newgate was really scandalous; but all the gaols of the city were in a melancholy condition, and especially the Borough compter, in which there was scarcely an unbroken window or pane of glass. Before they agreed to let the corporation of London raise more money for the city prisons, he hoped the house would desire to know how the sums already granted had been disposed of, and also demand a statement of the city funds.

Sir J. Shaw expressed his hope, that neither that house nor the country, would ever be found to concur with the hon. gentleman who had sat down, in condemning the city of London for having given a grand entertainment to the liberators of Europe, on the occasion of their visit to this country. If the house agreed in the principle upon which the money alluded to in the motion was paid, he could not see upon what grounds that motion could be opposed.

Mr. H. Sumner said, that being dissatisfied with the explanation which the hon. mover had given, he should feel it his duty to submit another motion.

Mr. Speaker observed, that there was then a motion before the house, and that the hon. member had already spoken.

Mr. Sumner remarked, that he had merely put a question for explanation to the worthy Alderman, which did not, he presumed, preclude his right of speaking upon the motion. He, therefore, threw himself upon the indulgence of the house, stating, that it was his intention to propose an amendment. He felt it to be his duty to save the pockets of his constituents, and, therefore, he opposed the present motion. The orphans' fund was a charge for the government of the city, and if that fund were found insufficient, the cause of that insufficiency ought to be explained, before any additional grant were acceded to. But the improvident manner in which money was raised by the corporation of London, suggested the propriety of limiting its discretion, and watching its operation; for of the 100,000*l.* which this corporation was enabled by parliament to raise, for the erection of the prison alluded to in the motion, 10,000*l.* was disposed of in an unaccountable manner, and this too at a time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer could raise money in the city at much less than five per cent. Now, as the interest upon loans to the city was quite as punctually paid as that upon the public funds, he could not conceive a reason for such extreme difference. There was, he apprehended, but too much reason to believe that the loans to the city were mixed with a spirit of jobbing, and therefore he proposed to move that the names of the subscribers to the last loan should be laid before the house. The house would be surprised to learn, that among the contingencies upon the last loan, no less a sum than 3,000*l.* was set down for the expense of carrying the bill through parliament, which authorized that loan. How such expense could have accrued, he was quite at a loss to imagine. But there was another charge in the contingencies, which appeared equally unaccountable, namely, 3,000*l.* for the expense of making out the bonds upon this loan. With such facts before the house, was it too much to suspect the existence of a job in this transaction, somewhat similar to that which characterized the plan of building the new post-office? That office ought rather to have been built in Moorfields, where there was plenty of waste ground, than on the proposed scite, which was occupied with houses, all of which it became necessary to purchase at an advanced rate. As to the duty on coals being collected among the city themselves, he must remark, that the county of Surrey was on the opposite bank of the river Thames, but that its inhabitants could not have a load of coals without duty, unless they went for it below Gravesend. Surrey, however, must pay one-fifth of the duty, and that would be about 8,000*l.*; a sum equal to the county rate. He would entreat the house to look at this subject, and see whether it was proper to support the city's acts of munificence, in which it was said they expended 40,000*l.* in one fete, besides losing 0,000*l.* by carelessness. The hon. member concluded by moving to leave out from the word "that" to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "the report be taken into consideration upon Friday the 13th day of March next." He wished that the house might in the interim have an opportunity of examining the accounts with respect to the fund alluded to, and the manner in which the produce of that fund was applied.

Mr. Alderman Wood observed, that he had often been in company with his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet), in the prisons of London, but he must say, that he had never heard his hon. friend point out such faults as he had this night alluded to. With regard to the prison in Whitecross-street, he was enabled to state, that it stood upon as much ground as any prison in London. The yards were spacious, and the apartments as commodious as could be reasonably desired in such a building. But he wished that this, as well as the other city prisons, should be examined by a committee of the house, in order to prove the justice of his representation. It was known that at the Whitecross-street prison, to which his hon. friend particularly alluded, the prisoners were accommodated with coals, bread, meat and bedding, without any expense, and he apprehended that no such accommodation was afforded to debtors in any other prison in Great Britain. This prison was originally intended for the accommodation of about 500 prisoners, and it occupied, including the outer wall, about an acre of ground. Yet, in consequence of a recommendation from the committee of that house, the city committee for superintending the construction of the prison, bought some more ground, at an expense of no less than 17,000*l.* This expense, together with the loss upon the bonds connected with the last loan, formed the ground for the proposed bill. The hon. member for Surrey had dwelt much on the fund of the city, but he had taken no notice of its indispensable expenditure, and was not, perhaps, aware that the annual expense of Whitecross-street prison was no less than 3,000*l.* which, added to the expense of the other city prisons, formed an aggregate of about 30,000*l.* which the city of London annually paid for the maintenance and police of its several goals.

Sir W. Curtis expressed his readiness to furnish the hon. member and the house, with any accounts or explanation required with regard to the city funds.

Mr. S. Thornton said, that he should not oppose the motion, but he thought it rather hard that the city of London should have the power of taxing to such an extent all the adjoining counties.

Mr. N. Calvert agreed with the observation of the last speaker, as to the taxation to which other counties were subjected, merely for the accommodation of Middlesex and the city of London. That was the more to be regretted, as this taxation being imposed upon coals, operated most oppressively on the poorer classes. This tax upon coals was indeed of such a nature, that he thought it peculiarly worthy the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as of the house itself, in order to devise some substitute, or to diminish its pressure.

A division being called for, the gallery was ordered to be cleared, but upon the understanding that the accounts required, with regard to the produce and expenditure of the orphans' fund, should be laid before the house, Mr. H. Sumner consented to withdraw his amendment, and the original motion was carried.

DROITS OF THE ADMIRALTY.] Sir J. Macintosh moved for "An account of all monies received as droits of the crown and droits of the admiralty, and of the manner in which the same have been applied, from the 21st day of Feb. 1817." Also, "A summary account of all monies received as droits of the crown and droits of the admiralty, specifying the nations from which they have arisen, and the general heads of expenditure to which they have been applied, from the 1st of Feb. 1793, to the present time."—Ordered.

BANK TOKENS.] In reply to a question from Mr. Curwen,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that as the bank tokens were not issued by authority of government, and formed no part of the regular coin of the country, government was not under any obligation to call them in. But, according to the act of parliament, they were to be called in by the bank, by whom they were issued, in the month of March next, while the bank would be bound to receive them for two years afterwards. It would be recollected, that no inconvenience had been created by the circulation or calling in of bank dollars, and he could not see that any was likely to result from the calling in of the tokens. The bank was fully able to pay in legal coin for any tokens that might be sent in, and he could not think that any difficulty was likely to arise with respect to those tokens, as none had been produced by the calling in even of the tokens issued by country bankers.

COTTON MANUFACTORIES.] Sir Robert Peel rose to present a petition which, he said, was unanimously signed by a class of men, who had rendered as great service to the country by their industry and skill, as any body of persons of the same order in society. The petitioners had come to him most unexpectedly, but he felt that they were entitled to his peculiar attention. They were aware that the attainment of their object must be attended with a reduction of wages; but, anxious for health, and wishing to enjoy some of the comforts of life, they were willing to submit to that sacrifice. He had had a communication with some of those poor men this morning: and he could not hear their statement, or witness their appearance, which confirmed that statement, without shedding tears. (Hear, hear.) As the house valued the trade of the country, it could not fail to feel for the sufferings and consider the interests of those by whom that trade was supported. How then would the gentlemen who heard him, regard those poor petitioners, who, in rooms badly ventilated and much over-heated, were compelled to work from fourteen to fifteen hours a day. Young persons might endure such labour; but, after a certain period of life, it became intolerable. Premature old age, accompanied by incurable disease, was too often the consequence of excessive labour in such places. He had himself been long concerned in the cotton trade; and, from a strong conviction of its necessity, he brought in a bill for the purpose of regulating the work of apprentices; but since that bill passed into a law, masters declined to take apprentices, and employed the children of paupers without any limitation. Hence the law was evaded, and rendered ineffective for the object which it had in view—the prevention of inhumanity; and he hoped it was not inconsistent with our constitution to legislate for the protection of children as well as grown persons, against the harshness of their employers. (Hear, hear.) Those immediately concerned in the cotton trade, did not perhaps perceive the injury to health which their workmen suffered, as they were in the habit of seeing them every day; but that injury was obvious to every stranger. Such facts were detailed in this petition, as presented an appeal which could not be withstood by any assemblage of gentlemen susceptible of common humanity; and these poor people had no other protection but in that house.—(Hear, hear.)

The petition was brought up and read; it was from labourers at Manchester and its neighbourhood, employed as cotton spinners. It stated, that they were at an early age of life enfeebled by overworking in places badly ventilated and over-heated, and prayed, that the period of employment should be limited to ten hours and a half each day, including the allowance of half an hour for breakfast, and an hour for dinner.

Mr. Curwen declared, that the impression upon his mind, from the evidence and report of the committee upon this subject two years ago, was, that the persons alluded to were not overworked. He deprecated any attempt to legislate between parents and children; and stated, that no children looked in better health than those whom he had seen in the factories at Manchester.

Mr. Gordon expressed his surprise at what the house had heard from his hon. friend. He declared that his impression as to the report of the committee of last year, was diametrically opposite to that stated by the hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.) The committee, he hoped, would be revived, in order fully to inquire into this interesting subject. As to the hon. gentleman's protest against any legislation between parents and children, the hon. gentleman did not seem to be aware that the present was a petition from parents for the protection of themselves and their children from excessive, from intolerable labour. He was assured, that the children employed in these factories, could be distinguished at the Sunday Schools among hundreds of other children. (Hear.) The hon. baronet deserved the highest praise for his benevolent exertions. He was for such conduct entitled, not only to the gratitude of the poor petitioners, but to the benediction of all good men. (Hear, hear.) When a gentleman who had realized a fortune in trade, thus stood forward to extend paternal protection to those who had contributed to his wealth, he could not fail to meet, as he merited, the universal thanks of his countrymen. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Philips stated, that he had on a Sunday gone round for the purpose of viewing the effects of employment in the manufactories on such children as he could see, and of contrasting their appearance with that of children who were otherwise employed. Another gentleman had gone along with him. The appearance of those who had been employed in the manufactories, they found to be fully as good, as the appearance of others who had not been so employed. They went into a school in order to make similar observations. They got those employed in manufactories separated from the rest; among them was one lame person, but he found that he had become lame in consequence of following some soldiers, before he had been employed in the manufactory. There was also one girl, who seemed to be in a declining state of health; but he had reason to believe, that she had been so previously to being employed in the factory. From his own observation he could assert, that those who were employed in factories had the very best appearance. There were others who were employed at a different work, and looked very ill. Upon asking the cause, he was told that they were not well fed. A third party of them were not employed in any work, and they were the worst looking in the school. If, however, the hon. baronet could make out his case, a remedy ought to be applied; but the subject should be referred, not to a committee, but to special commissioners, who could fairly investigate the grounds of complaint, and the best mode of applying a remedy. He gave credit to the hon. baronet for acting from humane feelings; but the hon. baronet's own factories were not found remarkably well regulated, when the state of the factories was examined into; on the contrary, they were found to be very ill regulated. They were indeed so ill regulated as to call forth the observations of neighbouring magistrates. The hon. baronet afterwards stated before the committee, that they were not improved in consequence of the examination. Examples of improvement were, however, set in other factories, and those examples had been followed.—The factories under the hon. member's own management, were well regulated, and all employed by him were comfortable.

Mr. W. Smith rose to order. The hon. member was speaking as if the motion before the house were for a committee, and he was taking the opportunity of making his remarks on the state of the several factories within his knowledge. He now rose to order, because he did not think this the proper time for discussing those subjects.

Mr. Philips replied, that if he was out of order, those who had preceded him must have been out of order, as he had entered into the few observations he made, wholly in consequence of what had fallen from them. He did not wish to press a premature discussion; but must again repeat, that before the house decided on any interference, it should have before it an impartial examination taken by a special commission.

Sir R. Peel said, he had felt no wish to interrupt the hon. member, but he conceived that he had travelled out of his way to attack his character. The petition he presented referred to all the manufactories in question. His own were as faulty as any. On finding the evils that prevailed, and their pernicious effects, he was so struck, that he resolved to bring the subject before parliament, for he was convinced, that nothing but an act of the legislature could apply a remedy.

Mr. F. Douglas and Mr. Shaw said, that from personal examination, they could bear witness to the humanity of the system acted upon in the factory of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Philips). They had both carefully inspected it, and they never saw a more healthy, cheerful, and contented number of children.

Mr. W. Smith rose merely to shew why the petition should be received. He had seen the persons who came up with it, and who looked anxiously for the interposition of the house. He had inquired of them, and found that the petition had arisen from the spontaneous desire of those who signed it. It was signed by 6,000 persons in the town of Manchester. They were all acquainted with its contents before they signed it, and their petition was, therefore, well entitled to attention.

It was ordered to lie on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition of inhabitants of Liverpool, praying for parliamentary reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

STATE TRIALS IN SCOTLAND.] Lord Archibald Hamilton said, that he rose for the purpose of redeeming the pledge, which, on the first night of the session, he had given, expressive of his determination to submit to the consideration of that house a motion, respecting certain transactions connected with the administration of justice in Scotland, and the conduct of the law officers of the crown in a recent state prosecution. He felt as sensibly as any man could feel the importance of the subject to which he had to request the attention of the house, and the duty it imposed on him of treating it with the utmost seriousness. In the discharge of a public duty, he trusted that it should be his uniform practice; but if ever there was a question that more strongly exacted that serious consideration, it was one that branched into an inquiry into transactions connected with the administration of justice, and of the conduct of the law officers of the crown in the prosecution of political offences. This case had every ingredient of gravity and importance. The subject related to the highest concern in this country, the purity of justice—the parties were the highest officers of the law as well as officers also of the crown—the scene of the transaction which he was about to notice, was the highest court of criminal law in Scotland. He was aware that this statement of the tendency and end of his motion was likely to produce a double prejudice. The first was, that being a subject somewhat in the nature of a law question, it might be thought by many of those whom he had the honour to address, that it should have been left to professional men to submit it to the consideration of parliament. To such an objection he would answer, that if only professional men could take up such important questions, involving grave matters of constitutional interest, he should much regret such an impression, as hostile to the best interests of the state. But he would contend that such an objection did not apply to the motion which he should have to submit to the house. It stood in need of no professional or technical qualifications (hear, hear).—it required only the suggestions of plain sense and sound reasoning; it involved no question of law, but the law of common justice—and nothing technical, but what might be artfully introduced into it, in order to perplex and obscure its real nature and its obvious merits; and therefore, however incompetent, on other grounds, he might feel himself for the due exercise of the duty he had undertaken, he would acknowledge no deficiency as arising from the mere circumstance of its not being left to a professional man (hear, hear).—The second and the greater prejudice with which he had to contend, was, that to accede to his proposition, might be construed into an interference with the administration of the courts of justice—a point that long experience had convinced him was one, on which that house entertained universally the greatest jealousy, if he might not say repugnance.—To meet such an objection, and to guard against any such inference, he begged to state, that he did not seek for any interference of that house with the administration of the courts of law in Scotland. His business, that night, was not with the court, but with the law officers of the crown. All he asked was, to direct its attention to what had passed in the court, and to take cognizance of certain transactions which appeared on its records. From these records they would accurately ascertain what was the conduct of the law officers of the crown—conduct which he had no hesitation in asserting justified the charge of a subornation of perjury, and must be regarded as an attempt to procure an illegal conviction (hear, hear). Such a case, in his judgment, most urgently called for parliamentary inquiry; and though it might branch out into a variety of collateral details, the nature of the transaction to which his present motion specifically adverted, had undoubtedly the least connexion with topics of legal subtlety or of professional research. His motion was for the production of the record. He had little to submit but what that judicial document went fully to substantiate; indeed, the whole nature and character of the proceedings could not be better developed than as they there appeared It was, however, necessary to take a review of some circumstances that had occurred in that house, during the last session. It would be recollected that the Lord Advocate of Scotland had, in his place, on that occasion, asserted in the most solemn manner, (see vol. I. p. 352) that the population of Glasgow was contaminated with sedition and disaffection to the state; that from 3 to 400 persons in that manufacturing city, were bound by an oath, which oath the learned lord had, in a manner uncalled for, submitted to the consideration of the house. That some degree of discontent, or degree of disaffection, might exist in a period of great distress, amongst a large manufacturing population, he (Lord A. Hamilton) was not disposed to deny, or to dispute. But he would ask, were it now possible not to feel assured, from the circumstance that had since taken place, contrasted with the statement of the learned lord, to which he alluded, that all that had been said about that disaffection then existing, was highly extravagant (Hear.)? But whether it existed or not, its extent or character was not now the question: allowing that it was as prevalent as the learned lord assumed, it was at least the duty of the law officers of the crown to conduct themselves so, as to afford those whom they brought before the tribunals of the country, were they guilty or innocent, a fair and impartial trial. Such fair and impartial trial the panel M'Kinlay, whose case he was about to detail, had not received (hear, hear). He repeated, that he disclaimed all concern with the guilt or innocence of the persons accused. Even if guilty, the obligation was imperative that the fullest impartiality and fairness should be afforded them on their trials (hear, hear). And here he must observe, that the exaggerated statement of the learned lord, last session, and particularly the improper and uncalled for production to this house of the odious oath which had been disclosed to the secret committee, before the report of that secret committee had been made, tended not only to inflame the prejudices of those who heard it, but must have an influence prejudicial to the accused amongst those who were likely to serve on the juries that would have to pronounce on their guilt or innocence (hear). He must be allowed also to state, that the system which had been for months back introduced into all parts of the country, of employing spies in the manufacturing districts, for the purpose of watching the progress of popular discontent, had not alone produced incalculable mischiefs, but had led to a total misconception of the real feelings of the population of the country (hear, hear). For his part, he had papers totally to deny these sweeping charges of disaffection—there was not one solid ground, he was proud to say, on which such suspicions could be supported. Before he entered into the particulars of the trial, to which the record, for the production of which he should move, referred, he begged to be understood as entertaining no feelings of personal hostility towards the learned lord, whose conduct he was about to arraign. In all that he had yet said, or intended to say, he applied himself solely to the official character of the parties accused, and, with that limitation, he felt that any severity of language he could apply to the case, was amply justified by the case, and by the record of the judicial proceedings; and if, in describing those transactions to which they referred, he was compelled to use strong language, it was, because strong language could alone speak of that conduct as it deserved. He must, however, explain to those unaccustomed with the administration of law in Scotland, and who might imagine, that when he used the term subornation of perjury, he meant to charge the law officers with wishing or endeavouring to bring forward perjured evidence, no such object was in his contemplation. Such a charge would, indeed, infer a guilt of much deeper dye than even that guilt, bad as it was, which he was about to state, and which the record would substantiate. The course of proceeding at the commencement of a trial in Scotland varied considerably from the practice in this country. Writs of error from the high Court of Justiciary were not competent in Scotland—motions to the court to alter or qualify the verdict were, he believed, not known—and cross-examinations at the trial were far more limited than here. As a substitute, however, for these forms of law, but substantial fences of justice, they had in Scotland a solemnity of the gravest importance—he meant what was termed the purgation oaths—and these oaths are administered, by the court, to every witness, in a criminal process, before he can open his lips in evidence. In the case before them, the trial of M'Kinlay, the first witness called was John Campbell, and before he was allowed to enter into the detail of his evidence, three distinct questions were put to him by the court. First, do you bear any malice or ill will to the panel? Should the witness give an answer to this interrogatory in any way ambiguous, it was for the court more closely to examine him. Secondly, has any body taught or instructed you what to say as a witness?— The house would understand that this question was direct. It had no reference to the truth or falsehood of what a witness might be instructed to say, but went to ascertain whether instruction of any kind was given; and if given, the witness was disqualified (hear, hear). The third question was, have you received any reward, or promise of any good deed? It was not that the reward should be conditional, or the nature of the evidence, be it false or be it true—if reward was promised at all, that alone set aside the witness (hear, hear). It now remained for him to advert to the evidence which had been offered to the court, and he felt confident that every man who heard it must admit that it fully made out his case. He had first to premise, that on the trial of M'Kinlay an objection was tendered by the counsel for the panel, to the competency of the witness, John Campbell, on the ground that he had been refused access to that evidence. The counsel had applied to the gaoler for access to Campbell, but was refused under the orders of the Lord Advocate and the subordinate officers of the crown. The court overruled the objection, on the plea that application for access should have been made to the court, and not to the Lord Advocate. But what said the learned lord himself on that point? He said, that he had refused access to the witness, "to prevent tampering" (hear, hear). And yet any man who attended to these proceedings, must acknowledge that the whole evidence of the witness Campbell, exhibited one continued system of gross and palpable tampering (cries of hear, hear) on the part of those very law officers of the crown, who appeared so jealous and fearful of all tampering but their own. How the learned lord could have prevailed upon himself to give that answer, he knew not how to explain; when he must have known that the whole of the law officers had continued access to Campbell; and what took place at these interviews, he, for his part, could call by no other name than palpable tampering. When, however, the oath was put to Campbell at the trial, and the third interrogatory was asked respecting the promise of reward—to the surprise of the whole court, the answer of the witness was, that he had received such a promise. (See Vol. I. p. 1698.) Upon that answer, therefore, he grounded the present motion for the production of the record. From that instrument the house would be able to judge of the tampering in the gaol, and of those other incidents which he felt were fully sufficient to establish the charge he made against the crown officers, of endeavouring to produce against the accused, evidence which they must have known, from their own previous tampering, would have been, if not disqualified by its own confession, perjured evidence, in order to convict illegally the panel. The evidence, Campbell, made an open declaration of the tampering that had been practised. The charge then, that he founded upon this evidence, was twofold: first, this improper, odious, and illegal tampering in gaol; and secondly, the producing such a witness to the court, so disqualified, in order to procure an unfair and illegal conviction. Campbell said, that after having been lodged in Glasgow gaol, without cause assigned, or without warrant, on the 22d of February last, he was examined before the Sheriff-Depute of Lanarkshire, and declared, he did not know for what he was brought before him. He was then left with Mr. Salmond, the Procurator Fiscal, who said to him—"John, perhaps you do not know that I know so much about this affair. I know more about it than you think I do, and here is the oath you took at Leggat's on the 1st of January last." At another interview, Mr. Salmond said—"I assure you, I have six men who will swear you took that oath, and you are as sure to be hanged as that you are alive." Could any threat be more likely to operate on the fears and hopes of a man who was afterwards to become a witness? "But," continued Mr. Salmond, "John, you will ruin yourself if you take this way; take the other way, and you may do yourself much benefit." Was this not gross and palpable tampering? Could evidence thus acquired be described, according to the administration of the law in Scotland, without being chargeable with a subornation of perjury?—Referring again to the evidence, Mr. Salmond said—"The Lord Advocate was in Glasgow, and would come under any obligation he (the witness) chose, if he would be a witness." It was necessary here to remark, that whether in point of fact the Lord Advocate was in Glasgow or not, did not affect the character of this observation; because the functions of the Lord Advocate and of the Advocate Depute were frequently confounded together. After these communications at Glasgow, the witness was sent to Edinburgh, and there Mr. Home Drummond had access to him. Mr. Drummond told the witness, that M'Kinlay was served with an indictment, and that his name was in the list of witnesses—that now was the time for him to determine whether he would be a witness or not. This the witness refused, saying, that if he did so, he could not return to Glasgow. Mr. Drummond's reply was, that he might change his name and go to another town. This the witness would not accede to. "Well," said Mr. Drummond, "I have been thinking of a plan of writing to Lord Sidmouth, to get you a place in the excise." With these facts upon the record, would any man get up and state that no promise of reward was held out to induce the evidence to criminate the accused? On another occasion Mr. Drummond wished to know what the witness wanted to have? and added, that if he gave such information as would please the Lord Advocate (the house would attend to the words) —please the Lord Advocate—he should neither be called upon as a witness, nor be tried. Now, the whole of this unfair tampering he did not exclusively impute either to the learned lord or to Mr. Home Drummond: they acted so in concert, and were, from the nature of their offices, so connected, that he could not separate them, nor their conduct They might abjure one another, and adjust their respective shares of guilt, but it was for the house to deal with the guilt itself, and the production of the record would help them to award a fair distribution of shame and punishment, as they might be due. It was for the learned lord to shew that he was no party to these gross and unjustifiable proceedings. If, in the course of the discussion, the learned lord should in his place feel enabled to say—"True it is, that from the record it appears that these tamperings were practised by Mr. Drummond, but without my knowledge or sanction"—if such should be the declaration of the learned lord, then he (Lord A. Hamilton) was ready to separate the conduct of the one from the other. On the learned lord himself it rested to shew that he did not act in concert with Mr. Drummond. And until he made that declaration, the house had a right to presume that the acts of the Advocate Depute were the acts of the Lord Advocate. (Hear, hear.) It was impossible that this man could be a witness without perjury—not perjury in the cause, but perjury by opening his lips to say any thing as a witness; because the law officers of the crown had themselves disabled him from taking the purgation oath of having received no promise of reward. The next person that appeared in this transaction was Sir William Rae, the Sheriff of Edinburgh. Terms, or rather bribes, had been proposed to Campbell to be a witness—these terms had been reduced to writing, and Sir William Rae was asked to sign this written agreement. Sir William Rae refused to sign the paper, and assured Campbell, that if he were to sign any such agreement, he would not be answerable for it for a good deal: for if when he was brought to his oath as a witness, having signed such an agreement, he were to swear that he had received no reward, or promise of reward, he would perjure himself. (Hear, hear, hear.) In spite, however, of this opinion of Sir William Rae's, the other gentlemen determined, that although the terms were not actually signed, they should be understood to constitute an agreement. Mr. Drummond said to the deponent—"now, Campbell, you know whether you can be a witness on these terms or not. Do you believe we are able to do for you what you expect, without its being put down on paper?" The deponent answered, "he knew they were able if they were willing." Mr. Drummond replied, "can you rely on us for that?" Campbell answered, "may I?" Mr. Drummond said, "you may." To which Campbell replied, "well, then, I shall rely on you as gentlemen." Some days after this the sheriff and clerk came up to sign the declaration, when the sheriff said, "Campbell, when you get rid of this business, go back to your loom, and leave them to rule the nation as they please." On which, however, Campbell observed, that after all that had passed he would rather be served with an indictment than return to Glasgow. He (Lord A. Hamilton) conceived that he had stated enough to shew that a promise was held out to the witness as a reward for his testimony; and that, from the time at which he was apprehended, to the time of his appearance in court, he was under the sole control and influence of the law officers of the crown. He was very happy on a recent occasion to hear the Attorney-General say, that God forbid he, or any one officially connected with him, should have any intercourse with a witness in a case of public justice, for the purpose of influencing his testimony. He trusted that, on the present occasion, a sentiment so exalted would not remain in the hon. and learned gentleman's breast, but that he would repeat it in confirmation of his (Lord A. Hamilton's) opinions. Government had avowedly employed spies and informers, who, it was generally admitted, had in many cases fomented the evil which it was the object to counteract. And he begged now to notice the lamentable condition, to which suspected persons, innocent or guilty, were thus reduced in this frank and free country. Any man was liable on the information of these "fomenting, instead of detecting" spies—out of malice or to earn their pay—to be taken by secret warrant—to secret imprisonment—to distant jail—all access denied him, "for fear of tampering"—a law officer to threaten or bribe—some accomplice to give agreeable evidence:—under such circumstances, what chance had he of bare justice, much less of successfully encountering his enemies? (Hear, hear, hear.) Such proceedings were in direct opposition to all that they had been accustomed to venerate in the British constitution. The facts he had disclosed amounted to subornation of perjury. He could find no other term adequately descriptive of the transaction; and had M'Kinlay been convicted on the evidence of Campbell, he would have had an undoubted right to say, that he had been convicted in consequence of the unfair practices of the law officers of the crown. Had Campbell, stimulated as he had been, given false evidence, he should like to know whether the law officers of the crown would not have been answerable for the crime? He would go one step farther. Had M'Kinlay been convicted on Campbell's evidence, in what situation would the country have been, if he had been executed or transported, and if afterwards it had come out that Mr. Home Drummond had been guilty of the practices in question, and had combined with the Lord Advocate and the Procurator Fiscal in prevailing on Campbell to attach criminality to M'Kinlay, and to suppress all those odious and disgraceful scenes in gaol, the result of which disqualified him from giving evidence at all? He contended, that the monstrous iniquity would have been thus exhibited of an illegal sentence, produced by illegal means, by the very persons who were bound by office to protect favourably rather than oppress unfairly; in plain words, we should have seen a conviction by means of a perjured witness—whose perjury was first manufactured by the law officers of the crown in gaol, and afterwards brought into court as sound and valid testimony, themselves knowing its base nature and illegal origin. It was the duty of the law officers of the crown to uphold the dignity and interest of the laws; and he would ask whether, in the transaction under discussion, the law officers of the crown in Scotland did not violate the sanctity and purity of the laws as palpably, and, indeed, more palpably than M'Kinlay in the crime with which he was charged? (Hear, hear, hear.) What he asked of the house was simply the production of the record of the trial. He could not think that the learned lord could have any objection to be tried upon that document, the more especially when it was considered that it was the manufacture of himself and his legal colleagues. Such as the record was, it was their making, and the detail of what they had done. Guilt might indeed fly from such a document, but surely, any one pretending to innocence could neither resist its production, nor dispute its testimony. He could not possibly anticipate a defence of such practices. It was quite impossible that any thing could be said in justification of them; the only difference between himself and the learned lord must be with regard to facts, to what actually had taken place, and he trusted the house, as in duty bound, would decide that difference by the production of the record.—The noble lord then read the following extract from Hume's Commentary on the Laws of Scotland, on the subject of tampering with a witness. "If the prosecutor, or any for him, have tempted the witness with bribe or reward, this shall equally exclude his testimony in odium corrumpentis, whether the witness have yielded or resisted the temptation. Under this head would fall any promise of pardon for other crimes, provided it came from the prosecutor, or one authorized by him. Any magistrate, who so far forgets his character, and mistakes his powers, as to give assurances of this sort, is indeed guilty of a wrong which may reflect on himself." (Hear, hear.) His lordship concluded by moving, "That there be laid before this house a copy of such parts of the Books of Adjournal of the High Court of Justiciary in Scotland, as contain the several libels or indictments, and the Evidence and Verdict and Judgment, and all other proceedings in the case of Andrew M'Kinlay, who was tried before the said High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, on the 19th of July, in the year 1817."

The Lord Advocate said, that he rose for the purpose of taking the very first opportunity of meeting the charges which had been preferred against him by the noble lord, and of refuting the accusation of having, during the last session of parliament, made a statement with respect to the proceedings at Glasgow, which, if not unfounded, was substantially overcharged. He should begin with adverting to what had been said by the noble lord, respecting the statements made by him as to the proceedings of the disaffected at Glasgow. The noble lord had said, that when his (the Lord Advocate's) interference in the debate was quite uncalled for, he had come forward to inform the house, that an oath binding the takers to commit high treason had been administered to several hundred persons in Glasgow and its vicinity, and that he had read the terms of this oath to the house. The noble lord had said, that by the result of the trials at Edinburgh, those allegations were now disproved. But what was the fact? He was not going to enter into a discussion upon the evidence that had been produced on the trials;—into the depositions of the witnesses who had been examined;—nor into the admissions of the parties who had been brought to trial. Yet a reference to any one of these sources of proof, would be sufficient to clear him from the imputation of having, without adequate grounds, attempted to impose upon the house. He should briefly rest his defence against this part of the noble lord's accusation by referring to the charges preferred in the different indictments, and to the issue of the only trial upon which evidence had been adduced. The indictment in that case charged the prisoner with having been guilty of administering the oath which he himself had during last session the honour of reading to the house, binding the individuals taking it to commit high treason, and in that indictment there were particularly set forth the names of many of the persons to whom the oath had been administered. Such was the charge, and what was the result of the trial? Now before stating that result, it was proper to mention what gentlemen upon the opposite side of the house knew to occur in every day's practice, that in the courts of Scotland, when a jury were satisfied that the fact of the crime charged in the indictment having been committed was proved, or in the common language of the court, if they were satisfied with the proof of the corpus delicti, and that there was such evidence as to convince them that the prisoner was a partaker in the guilt, although it was not such as in their apprehension legally to entitle them to find him guilty, the verdict which they were in the use of bringing in, was a verdict of Not Proven. On the other hand, when the proof of the corpus delicti failed, or in other words, that there was no evidence of an offence having been committed by any one, the verdict was invariably Not Guilty. Wherever, therefore, there was a verdict of Not Proven only, the understanding of every man in Scotland was, that the jury meant to find, that the offence charged in the indictment was proved to have been committed, although the evidence against the individual charged with having been concerned in it, was not deemed conclusive. Now, in the case in question, where the administering a treasonable oath to hundreds of persons in the vicinity of Glasgow had generally been charged, although the individual accused had been acquitted, the verdict returned by the jury was not a verdict of Not Guilty, but a verdict of Not Proven. The result of the trial therefore was, to afford the evidence of the conviction of the jury, that the treasonable oath which he had read to the house had been administered at Glasgow to many hundreds of individuals in the manner which he had during the last session stated in the course of debate. The accusation made therefore by the noble lord, of his having deluded the house by false, unfounded, or exaggerated statements, was utterly disproved. But not contented with this charge, of having practised imposition upon parliament, the noble lord had accused him of having interfered unnecessarily, by obtruding that statement upon the house in the course of the discussion which had taken place upon the bill for suspending the act of habeas corpus. Upon that charge he was at issue with the noble lord. The report of the committee of secrecy had referred to the transactions at Glasgow. The additional information which he had communicated to the house, could not be stated in that report, because it had only been received in town the very morning of the debate. That information appeared to him to be of the utmost importance, for the purpose of elucidating and confirming those statements in the report which the noble lord and his friends had so undeservedly charged with containing, if not falsehoods, very gross exaggerations. In that situation, as a servant of the crown, he conceived it his duty when the House was engaged in that most important discussion, to put it in possession of the latest information which had been obtained. And he must say, that the noble lord seemed to be profoundly ignorant of the duty of a member of parliament, if he conceived that the making such a statement under such circumstances, was uncalled for or unnecessary. With all deference to the noble lord, he apprehended that he would have been guilty of a dereliction of his duty, if in possession of such information, and being enabled without danger to the public service to lay it before the house, he had upon that occasion refrained from making the statement which he had made, in order that parliament might judge of the extent of the dangers by which the public tranquillity was threatened. (Hear, hear.) One other preliminary matter it was necessary also to advert to. The noble lord had said, that he had himself refused access to the witnesses who were prisoners in the castle to prevent their being tampered with, and this, it was said, appeared from the record. But although the noble lord said he had read the record, it appeared, with great deference to him, that the noble lord had not understood it. Neither in the record, nor in the short-hand writer's account of the trial, did one word appear of persons being refused access to the witnesses to prevent tampering. In point of fact, neither upon that account, nor upon any other, had he refused access to the witnesses; for in truth, he had no power to refuse access. Had the noble lord understood the record, he would have seen that such was the opinion of the whole of the judges, and that if any persons considered that they were improperly withheld from obtaining access to the prisoners, they had a clear and obvious remedy, viz. that of applying to the court, from which neither he nor any one else could debar them. (The Lord Advocate here read a passage from the record, from which it appeared, that instead of preventing persons from having access to the witnesses who were prisoners, he had taken upon himself the responsibility of facilitating that access, by his consenting to its being had without a reference in each instance to the court, which would otherwise have been necessary.) His lordship, therefore, asked, where was the proof of persons being prevented from having access to the witnesses in order to prevent tampering? The slightest knowledge of legal proceeding ought to have told the noble lord that such was impossible, had not the very evidence to which he had been pleased to refer as authorizing the statement itself disproved his allegation. He would therefore appeal to the House, whether this was not a most improper attempt upon the part of the noble lord to create an undue prejudice, by a statement which the evidence he himself held in his hand at the time he made it proved to be unfounded. Leaving, however, those preliminary matters, the Lord Advocate said, that he would proceed to that part of the noble lord's speech, in which he had referred to a supposed statement of the Attorney-General, of his never having any communication with the witnesses, for the purpose of shewing that the whole of his conduct must necessarily have been irregular and improper. Now, as to the duties of the Attorney-General he could say nothing. Whatever they were, he felt confident they would be discharged in an exemplary and proper manner by his hon. and learned friend. But every one knew, that the duties of the Attorney-General and of the Lord Advocate were in many respects of a different description. The Lord Advocate of Scotland was not only the public prosecutor as the Attorney-General was in England, but he was that which the Attorney-General was not, a police magistrate, or rather at the head of the police. In fact, he was the only servant of the crown in Scotland chiefly responsible for the general police of the country. This arose from the anomalous situation of that part of the empire which formed a separate government without a resident administration. From this circumstance, it was his duty to procure information of any designs against the public tranquillity. He was bound to investigate offences in every stage of their progress, previous to conviction. If, from his omission to obtain information, the public tranquillity suffered, upon him the responsibility necessarily fell. In this respect his duties resembled those of the Secretary of State, more than of the Attorney-General. The latter was not required to do any thing for the preservation of the public peace, or to take any measures for procuring information, either of crimes which had been committed, or of crimes which were in agitation. But while such was the duty of the Lord Advocate, it was also incumbent upon him to discharge those duties for the whole country, which in England are imposed upon the grand juries of the different counties.—All investigations into crimes are made for his information, and in order to enable him to judge what persons ought to be brought to trial, or what proceeding, if any, should be had against the persons accused. In this way it is of necessity the constant practice for him to direct examinations, or re-examinations of witnesses in the presence of some officer, who should represent him *, either the procurator fiscal in the inferior courts, or sometimes the deputes in the supreme court. In fact, the Lord Advocate had an immediate interest, that there should be a full, authentic, and detailed account preserved of the evidence upon which he had proceeded upon bringing parties to trial; for he himself was liable to prosecution, unless he gave up the information on which he had proceeded, if the prosecution should appear to be malicious. This in particular had been settled in the case of Stephen against Lord Advocate Dundas, in the year 1727 †. Instead of there being any thing irregular, therefore, in his Majesty's Advocate of Scotland taking the necessary precautions for having witnesses pre-examined, it was obviously indispensable, in a great many cases, that he should do so. In the case of Campbell, the witness in question, this proceeding had been materially incumbent upon him. In the examinations of the different persons taken up as engaged in the conspiracies at Glasgow, Campbell had been referred to as being able to communicate circumstances highly important to the public tranquillity, not only in Scotland, but even in the northern parts of England, which were then threatened with disturbance, and there were strong grounds for suspecting that he knew a great deal of what the magistrates were yet in ignorance. It was, therefore, incumbent upon him (the Lord Advocate), to obtain from that person all the information he could give him. It was incumbent upon him to do so in another point of view: he meant for the purpose of having the fullest statement in writing of the whole evidence, upon which the prosecution which he was instituting against M'Kinlay was brought. For these reasons, and with the view solely of obtaining information, he had selected as the proper person to visit him, Mr. Home Drummond, the senior depute advocate, a gentleman of the highest reputation, of great prudence and legal knowledge. In doing so he felt that he was imposing a most irksome duty, a piece of duty which he was most reluctant to exact from a person of his accomplishments. But he felt that a due regard to the public tranquillity required that this duty should be performed, and upon the propriety of Mr. Drummond's conduct, he might have the most perfect reliance. In that conviction he had not been deceived. The noble lord had seemed to suppose that he might defend his own conduct by separating himself from his hon. friend, Mr. Drummond; and it was with astonishment that he heard such a supposition made by a person like the noble lord. He and Mr. Drummond must stand or fall together. He should consider himself utterly unworthy of the situation which he held, were he capable of resting his defence upon such a foundation. He wished the noble lord and the house to understand, that Mr. Drummond had done nothing which he himself had not sanctioned, and which, were it to do again, he would not authorize. He should now state, that when Mr. Drummond was directed to repair to the castle, his instructions were to learn whether, upon a promise of pardon, Campbell would give the information which it was supposed he possessed, relative to the designs and proceedings of the disaffected; and it was not then in contemplation to call upon him to give evidence as a witness in court. In short, Mr. Drummond had authority to offer a pardon for information solely, and not upon condition of Campbell giving evidence. When Mr. Drummond reported what had passed, he stated, that Campbell had declined to give information: and, although speaking in confidence to him (the Lord Advocate), he certainly did not state that he had made him any promise, other than the promise of pardon, and still less that that promise had been given for the purpose of prevailing on him to give evidence. He mentioned that the witness had stated, that he was in the greatest alarm for his life from the machinations of the disaffected, should he give information. This Mr. Drummond attempted to satisfy him was unfounded. But he had Mr. Drummond's authority to say, that he did not then, or at any time, give a promise of any place in the excise, even for the limited purpose of obtaining information, which was at that time the only object in view. In looking at the deposition of Campbell, that person stated, that Mr. Drummond repeated his visit; but the fact was, that Mr. Drummond was sent for by Campbell, when that person told him that whether he should give information, or whether he should give evidence upon the trials of the parties accused, it was indispensably necessary, that, as a preliminary condition, he should for the sake of his personal safety, which he believed to be in the most imminent danger from violence on the part of his former associates, have passports to leave the country; and that as he and his family had not the means to travel, being utterly destitute of money, they must be supplied with that also, otherwise the passports would be useless, and their removal impossible. He added that, unless this was done, he would rather suffer perpetual imprisonment, because he felt that his life would not be secure one moment if he went back to Glasgow. Mr. Drummond acquainted him that he conceived all witnesses entitled to assurances of protection; but that he individually had no power to give him any promise: when the sheriff came to examine him would be the time for him to state his demand, and he would then be told what could be done for him. He then requested, as a favour, that some money should be sent to his wife, to enable her to leave Glasgow, where she might be maltreated by the populace, upon its being known that he had given information; but Mr. Drummond told him, that he would say nothing on the subject, but would report the request to him (the Lord Advocate), and he (Campbell) might write to her any letter he thought fit, which would be shewn, and transmitted, if approved of. When the request was communicated to him, along with a letter which Campbell had written, he stated that he could not authorize any money to be given to her, but he had no objection to the woman being sent to Edinburgh, at the public expense, to attend her husband; and that the means of conveyance should be furnished by the procurator fiscal. A letter to that effect was accordingly written to that officer, explaining that Campbell was to receive a pardon, and to be sent out of the country; but that in every other respect he was to be treated as any other witness, without receiving any additional indulgence. The sheriff of Edinburgh was then directed to proceed to take the full examination of Campbell in writing, and in a case of such importance, it was thought proper that the Solicitor-General and Mr. Drummond should attend on behalf of the crown. Sir William Rae, the sheriff depute, not having arrived, the examination was proceeded in by the sheriff substitute; but previous to answering any questions, Campbell stated that it was necessary for his personal safety that he should be protected and sent abroad after giving his evidence. This was taken down in writing, and the Solicitor-General assured him, by his (the Lord Advocate's) directions, that he should be protected—that he should have a passport—and that he should be sent abroad at the public expense. At this time Sir William Rae came into the room and remarked, that it was unusual to take down any thing of that nature in a declaration, but Campbell stated, that he thought it necessary to have evidence that the protection required by him was to be afforded. The sheriff replied, that he had no objection to repeat personally the assurances which had been given to him, that his safety and that of his wife should be provided for, and the Solicitor-General added, that beyond that assurance the witness must depend on nothing,—that nothing farther could be understood as being engaged for. It was altogether false as alleged by Campbell, that any thing was said about the sheriff refusing to sign the paper, and in point of fact, that officer considered it of so little importance, that he threw it into the fire. His having done so, could be accounted for on no other footing, without charging him with a gross breach of duty; because if he felt it of importance, he was bound to have preserved it. But, indeed, considering that the declaration was intended for no other eyes than those of the public prosecutor, such must have been the view entertained by the sheriff. Besides, as that officer was so scrupulously exact in the performance of his duty as was alleged by the witness, it would be a piece of perfect inconsistency to suppose that he was guilty of a wilful breach of it by throwing the paper into the fire. It was in fact, however, a matter of no importance, because the contents of the paper were fully admitted. He had only farther to explain in point of fact, that when messages were subsequently sent to Mr. Drummond through the gaoler, that person was directed to carry them to the sheriff, as Mr. Drummond would not receive them; that when a letter was written to him by Campbell, requesting 1*l.* 3*s.* to pay his rent at Glasgow, it was peremptorily refused, and that whatever articles of dress were furnished to Campbell were furnished by the gaoler. He himself, however, had no scruple in avowing, that had he been informed that such articles were required, he would have directed either that prisoner or any other prisoner to be supplied with any articles of dress which might be necessary for their comfort. Such was the statement which, he averred, correctly represented what had passed betwixt the crown counsel and the witness, and which he was prepared to contend was in every respect completely legal. Nay, he would go farther and say, that if he had omitted to direct any of those steps to be taken which he had directed, he himself, considering the circumstances in which the country was then placed, would have been guilty of a gross dereliction of his public duty. In making this statement, he was aware, that wherever it differed from the account given by the witness, he was requiring of the house to believe the testimony of a person not upon oath, in preference to that of a person who was upon oath. But in estimating the credit due to those different testimonies, it was necessary to recollect the situation in which Campbell the witness was placed when he was examined by the court. He was a socius criminis whose evidence could not be received, even upon the trial, without further confirmation. His being called by the crown therefore was no reason why the crown should be obliged to abide by every thing which he might think fit to state. The crown called him as a stigmatized witness, and with that indelibly impressed upon him they could alone bring him forward. In the second place, he entered the box to give his testimony, having an immediate interest to disqualify himself from giving evidence. If he was examined and told all that he had told the public prosecutor on his pre-examination, his personal security required that he should be sent abroad and banished from his native land. On the other hand, if he disqualified himself, his accomplice would not be convicted, his own life would not be in danger, and while he obtained indemnity from the public, he might remain unmolested at home. If nothing else attached to the witness, it was impossible, under such circumstances, to have given him implicit credit. But he had not entered the court uncontaminated in other respects. In the course of the trial it would be recollected that the counsel for the prisoner had objected to Campbell's admissibility, because they had been refused permission to hold any communication with him. Now he would ask, was this true? Had they had no communication with the witness? (Hear, hear.) An hon. gentleman opposite could answer that question, and acquaint the house whether he was not correct in stating that for at least one week before the trial, the prisoner's counsel had been in actual communication with the witness, and that too upon the statement which he afterwards gave? But further still he would ask that hon. and learned gentleman, whether it did not consist with his knowledge, that after Campbell had given his testimony, he actually received from those acting for the prisoner under trial the reward of his perjuries? (Hear, hear, hear.) Those questions could not be answered in the negative, and if so, could the house, even if his story was consistent in itself, yield credit to such a witness? But it was impossible to read that person's evidence without being satisfied of the little credit that was due to it. In particular, by his own account, he had been practising a deceit upon Mr. Drummond, by allowing him to suppose that he thought his life was in danger, when he did not apprehend it to be so. But even this was contradicted by a letter which he had written to his hon. and learned friend. On the other hand, the gentleman whose statement he gave to the house, was a high and irreproachable character, and the whole circumstances of the case proved, that whether any thing illegal had been done, at least nothing illegal had been intended. Had any thing illegal been intended, would he himself and his colleagues have brought the sheriff depute, his substitute, the procurator fiscal and his clerk to be witnesses of their misconduct? The only reason for having those persons present was, that there might remain in the crown office an authenticated written account in justification of the proceedings which he had instituted. But would this have been the result of the very first step of the examination itself, if it was in the estimation of those acting for the crown an act of illegality? The thing seemed so utterly improbable, that he thought he might safely rely, that whether the house might ultimately think he had acted illegally or not, at least it was impossible they should be of opinion that he conceived it to be so at the time he authorized it. The question, therefore, was, and on which he was ready to meet the noble lord, had any thing illegal been done. He trusted he should immediately satisfy the house, that the giving that promise of a free pardon, a passport, and the means of leaving the country, was promising nothing which he was not in law entitled to have promised, nay, which under the circumstances in which he was placed, he was not bound to have promised. And here it was necessary to explain for the sake of gentlemen not acquainted with the practice of the courts in Scotland, that when a witness is put upon oath, three preliminary questions are put to him. First, have you any malice or ill-will against the prisoner at the bar? Second, have you received any reward or promise of reward for the evidence which you are to give upon the trial? Third, have you been told what answers you are to give to the questions that are put to you? Now, should the witness answer those questions in the affirmative, it may be supposed that his answer would at once incapacitate the witness. But this is not the result. If he answers for instance, that he has malice against the prisoner, the court then proceeds to examine into the nature of the malice, and unless the witness shall depose that it is a malice of that description which would induce him to swear falsely against the prisoner, it is not held that the evidence is liable to objection. In like manner, if upon the second question, he was to answer that he has received a promise of reward to give his evidence, the nature of the reward comes to be inquired into, and it must be admitted that it is not every reward that will bar him from giving evidence. Nay, it must even be admitted that it is competent to promise the witness the highest reward which any man can receive; that is, if he be a socius criminis, the promise of his life, without invalidating his testimony. For it is settled beyond all dispute, that a socius criminis having in his pocket the promise of a free pardon from the public prosecutor is yet a competent evidence on the trial of his associate. But it has even been laid down by the court of justiciary, that it is competent to offer a reward for evidence in order to convict one guilty of an offence, and that the hope of receiving that reward will not incapacitate a witness from giving his testimony upon the trial of the offender. All that is required is, that the reward should be offered or given under the condition that the witness should tell the truth, and not that he should give evidence in a particular way. The latter would be illegal: the other was not so. In support of this doctrine he referred to a case mentioned by Mr. Burnett, in his Criminal Law, page 416, where the point had been solemnly declared by the supreme criminal court of Scotland. Of the law of Scotland, therefore, in so far as it concerned this subject, there was no doubt, and the house would observe in considering what had been done by him in the instance complained of, that he was only responsible for having proceeded according to the law of that country; whether it corresponded with the law of England (with which the house were more familiar) or not. But what he had now stated, he took upon him to assert, was not the law of Scotland only, but the law of England and the law of the British constitution. So at least the law had been laid down by no less authority than that of the twelve judges of England, on one of the gravest occasions on which the opinions of those learned persons had ever been required. On the trial of lord Melville it would be recollected that certain questions on matters of law were proposed to the judges by the house of lords, as to the admissibility of Mr. Trotter's evidence. The third of those questions was to ascertain "whether a witness, who, on making a full and fair disclosure, was to be excused from certain debts, could not be legally objected to, on the ground of his being interested?" To this question the judges, through the mouth of chief justice Mansfield, gave an unanimous answer,—that "a witness in the situation described, could not be repelled on the ground of being interested, as whatever was offered on the condition of his making a full and fair disclosure, could legally make no difference with respect to his evidence, he being bound by his oath, by law, morality and honour, to declare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." (Hear, hear, hear.) The constitutional law of the country therefore was, that provided no reward was offered to a witness except a reward that he should tell the whole truth upon his examination, that witness remained in every respect unexceptionable; and there was no offence either in law or in morality in offering the witness a reward to that effect. He should immediately demonstrate that nothing more had been done in the present case, according to the shewing of the noble lord himself. But before doing so, the case he had just referred to required that he should express his astonishment that the noble lord, before he stated so broadly as he had done, that it was utterly inconsistent with English practice for a prosecutor to hold communication with the witnesses he was to adduce upon the trial, should not have, in the first instance, learned the opinion of his hon. and learned friend (Sir S. Romilly) who sat beside him. For that high authority could have told the noble lord that the proceedings in the case of Lord Melville had established a precedent diametrically the reverse In that case, he asserted without fear of contradiction, not only had the managers of the impeachment provided for Mr. Trotter that security and indemnity to which he had just alluded, but they had also held communication with him, as to the evidence he was to give upon the trial, previous to his examination. But that was not all. For after the trial was commenced, and after Mr. Trotter had been one whole day under examination in the high court of parliament; first, the managers of the impeachment re-examined Mr. Trotter in private; and not contented with that, the leader of the managers himself (the late Mr. Whitbread) acting, it was to be presumed, by the advice of the rest of his associates, of whom it would be recollected the attorney and solicitor-general for the time * were two, had a private communication with that witness, remotis arbitris, before his second examination in the witness's box. It must therefore be obvious to the house that there were no grounds whatever for accusing him and his colleagues with having acted in a manner that was unusual, in holding that communication with the prisoner Campbell, which was necessary for obtaining the information he was supposed to have; apparently so important to the public tranquillity. In this situation, holding himself entitled to have communication with Campbell either directly or by those under him, and holding that, according to the law of Scotland, and according to the constitutional law of Great Britain, he was entitled to offer that individual a free pardon, and that he was not only entitled, but was bound to ensure his personal security as well as the means of rendering that promise of personal security available, he had given it as his opinion in point of law, that the promise which had been stated by the noble lord as a ground of charging him with a high offence, should be given him in an avowed and authentic form before a public magistrate of the country. In the soundness of that opinion, he was, upon reflection, fully confirmed, and in the speech of the noble lord, at least, he had not heard one ground stated for doubting its correctness. The great object in promising a pardon to a socius criminis was to relieve him from fear of prosecution on account of those matters to which his evidence might relate. But a witness was not only entitled to be relieved of fear of prosecution, but of fear of personal violence from any quarter whatever, whether coming from the persons against whom he was to give his evidence, or those with whom they were connected. How this security was to be afforded, must depend upon circumstances. Thus in Ireland, where it was known that persons frequently associated together, binding themselves to put those giving evidence against their associates to death, it was necessary to place guards in the houses of the witnesses to protect them from violence. In some instances, it was even necessary to remove them within the walls of a garrison, in which they and their families must be maintained at the public expense. But in neither of those cases was it ever dreamt of, that an objection to the evidence of the witness could be entertained, founded upon the reward, which, in the shape of personal protection, had been conferred on him. Now in the present case, the individual not only had stated that he apprehended his life to be in danger, but it was obvious that he must have so thought it, from the circumstance that many hundred persons had bound themselves by an oath to put any individual to death who should give that information which he, the witness, was about to communicate. In that situation it was only by leaving the country, (unless he should be contented to remain a prisoner) that the safety of the witness could be guaranteed. Was it not, therefore, the bounden duty of the public prosecutor, not only to promise him a passport for leaving the country, which, as an artizan, it was necessary he should possess, but to promise him the means of using that passport, which his poverty would otherwise have rendered utterly unavailable. This, he maintained, he was entitled to promise, provided the witness would speak the truth. He was not entitled to promise that, or any thing else, to obtain false testimony; but to obtain a full disclosure, he was entitled, upon the authority of the cases to which he had referred, to promise that or a great deal more. Now what had been asked of the witness in the present case? This the house would find explained by that individual himself, hostile as he was to him and his colleagues, in a passage which, he must observe, the noble lord had thought fit to read in a tone of voice considerably lower than that in which he had read those parts of the deposition, on which, in the course of his speech, he had thought fit to comment, as more suited for the purposes of his present motion. That passage was in the following words: 'Depones that in the conversations abovementioned, with Mr. Drummond or any of the other gentlemen, there was no attempt whatever made to instruct him in any way as to what he should say in giving evidence as a witness. All which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God.' The witness therefore fairly admitted, that nothing had been asked of him but to speak the truth. Not only, however, was there this direct evidence of that fact, but there was also this additional proof of it, that from the deposition of the witness, it appeared, that the Solicitor-General and Mr. Drummond had never once even put a question to him as to any of the circumstances of the case, for this obvious reason, lest by so doing they might have led his mind to give evidence in a particular way. It was no doubt true, that in one part of the witness's testimony he stated, "that Mr. Drummond then said, that if he would give such information as would please the Lord Advocate, he should neither be tried himself, nor made a witness." But this, it must be obvious, upon examining the context, related merely to telling the whole truth: because, according to Campbell's own account of the matter, Mr. Drummond did not want his evidence, but the private information which it was understood he could give; and it was quite absurd to suppose that he (the Lord Advocate) or any man of a sound mind, could wish to obtain false information, by which his own conduct was to be guided. His doing so could have served no purpose whatever, but that of deceiving himself. He, therefore, submitted upon the whole to the house, that there was not only no proof of an attempt to suborn false testimony; but, on the contrary, there was the clearest evidence, that nothing had been done, but what by the law of the land was constitutionally legal. No promise had been made to Campbell to state any thing which was untrue; no attempt had been made to instruct him; nothing had been asked of him but that he should speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Now, according to the statement of Burnett, and the opinion of the twelve judges, even a promise of money to procure evidence to that effect, formed no ground of complaint, either against the party making the promise, or against him who received it. (Hear, hear.) But, no money whatever had been promised—nothing had been promised but a free pardon, which he was entitled to give, accompanied by a promise of personal protection, to which every witness was entitled, and of rendering that promise available in the only way in which the witness himself thought it could be made available, and by which alone, therefore, his mind, in giving testimony, was to be relieved from the influence of terror,—by sending him abroad at the public expense. The noble lord, no doubt, had alleged that greater indulgences had been given to the witness than those already mentioned; but he (the Lord Advocate) would assure the house, that those indulgences were not peculiar to Campbell, but had been extended to every one of the prisoners, even those who were indicted for trial. This appeared from the statement of the trial by the short-hand writer, which he held in his hand, although, in that mutilated account which the noble lord appeared to be possessed of, it would not be found. For, however unpleasant he must feel it to read any passage containing language complimentary to himself, he thought himself bound upon this occasion, (arraigned as his conduct had been for harshness and severity towards the prisoners) to read to the house a passage, shewing what passed upon this subject, upon the trial of M'Kinlay, which would in every respect confirm what he had now stated: "I wish to return my sincere thanks to your lordships for shewing me such kindness—to the gentlemen of the jury for their attention, and the verdict they have returned,—and to the lord advocate for his kind attention during my imprisonment,—and I wish publicly to declare, that I had all the liberty and indulgence that man could possibly have in such circumstances." In those respects, therefore, nothing had been done to Campbell that had not been done to the other witnesses. Indeed, the fact was, that when that individual had, upon one occasion, requested that a very small sum, amounting to twenty-three shillings, should be given to him for the purpose of defraying the rent of his house in Glasgow, upon the request being communicated to him (the Lord Advocate), it was peremptorily refused. The noble lord had said too, that it was intended that all the communications between Campbell and the crown counsel should remain secret. But he would ask them, why should he have desired to have Campbell's testimony taken down in writing, in presence of the sheriff and the other local officers? There could have been no reason for his so doing, but to have enabled M'Kinlay to obtain, by legal means, full knowledge of every thing that had passed with himself and others respecting the charges which were brought against him. The noble lord too had said, that he had wished to hang M'Kinlay upon evidence so improperly and unconstitutionally obtained. But, here again the noble lord was mistaken; because, before Campbell was adduced as an evidence at all, he himself had secured the prisoner against the consequences of a capital conviction, by restricting the libel to infer only arbitrary punishment. No doubt this circumstance would not be found by the noble lord in his account of the trial, which, although certified to be correct, by persons of eminence at the Scotch bar (a circumstance he should not have expected), was thus in another, as well as numerous particulars, proved to be incorrect. He, therefore, submitted upon the whole of the case, that the noble lord had laid no ground sufficient for inducing the house to accede to his motion. The noble lord was in an error in every thing he had said, as to the practice of communicating with witnesses, whether the matter was contemplated with a view to Scotland or to England; he was in an error not only in so far as the law of Scotland was concerned, but in so far as concerned the law of the British constitution, with respect to the legality of inducing witnesses, under promises of pardon and of personal protection, to give evidence touching the commission of crimes.—Failing, as the noble lord had done, therefore, in his argument in point of law, he must now add, that if the house acceded to the proposal of making the present a matter of parliamentary inquiry, it would be interfering with the ordinary course of justice. For the noble lord was mistaken in supposing that any one of the persons taken up in Scotland, had been imprisoned in virtue of the suspension of the act of habeas corpus. (Hear, hear, hear.) One and all of the persons accused of state offences, had been confined in virtue of warrants granted under the ordinary administration of the law. (Hear, hear, hear.) In that situation, if any thing illegal had been done, either by himself or his colleagues, one and all of those prisoners had a right to recover damages by a common action at law. The individuals therefore, having that remedy open to them, it would not be according to the ordinary usage of parliament to institute a proceeding which must be attended with consequences injurious in the court below, either to the one party or to the other. He had thus, he trusted, answered the different charges which had been mustered against him by the noble lord, and while he returned his humble thanks to the house for the patience with which they had been pleased to listen to the long and dry detail into which he had been forced to enter, he felt confident that, as had been done upon the motion of Mr. Adam, in the year 1794, when he moved for the record of the trial of Palmer and Muir, they would reject the motion of the noble lord.

Mr. J. P. Grant then rose, and spoke as follows:—

Sir,—Alluded to as I have been by the learned lord, and having been of counsel for the prisoner in the trial in which the conduct of the learned lord is called in question, I have thought it necessary to offer myself thus early in the debate to your attention. I beg to assure the house, that nothing would have given me more sincere pleasure than that the learned lord had succeeded in removing the imputation cast upon him by the evidence of Campbell.—The learned lord may believe me when I state, that I have never approached any question with more personal pain, than I approach the present; but this is not a question in which personal considerations can be indulged. If there be any question on which such considerations must be sacrificed, it is this which arises out of the evidence of this man. This is as grave a charge, and on a matter as vital to the interests of the country, as ever was preferred to parliament. Even those who do not know me, will not suppose that I can rise in my place in parliament, to deliver the opinions, which I shall be compelled to deliver before I sit down, of the conduct of gentlemen with whom I am in the daily habit of professional intercourse—gentlemen against whose private character I know of no imputation; whose manners are conciliatory; some of whom are nearly allied to persons whose friendship I am proud to possess:—it cannot be supposed that I can deliver such opinions of the conduct of such persons, without feeling the greatest degree of uneasiness. With regard to the disturbances at Glasgow; the extent of the conspiracy alleged to have existed there; and the justification of the statement made in this house, in the last session, on that subject, by the learned lord; when the time comes for going into it, and a fit opportunity shall offer, I shall be ready to meet the learned lord. But I now wish to stick to the question properly before the house—a question which is alone sufficient to arrest its whole attention—namely, the conduct of the law officers of the crown in Scotland, in regard to this witness. I will concede, for the sake of argument, all that the learned lord has stated to be true, respecting the extent of the conspiracy and the magnitude of the danger; I will assume, that the person of whom I am speaking was actively engaged in that conspiracy; that he was one of the most guilty of mankind. (Hear, hear, hear.) All this will not weigh one feather in the balance in favour of the learned lord —(Hear, hear,)—or in justification of practices such as are imputed to the law officers of the crown of Scotland. The learned lord has said, that my noble friend, in bringing forward this motion, is interfering with the ordinary course of the law; and he has stated, that the persons arrested, were taken up, not on the new law, suspending the habeas corpus act, or the similar act in Scotland, but under the common law of Scotland; and that the persons who think themselves aggrieved, may commence criminal or civil prosecutions. But is it any thing to this house, intrusted as we are with the care of the lives and liberties of our fellow-subjects; (Hear, hear.)—with the superintendence of the courts of justice—who are bound to watch their conduct with a jealous eye, and still more especially the conduct of the law officers of the crown —(Hear, hear, hear.) Is it to be told us, sitting here in parliament, that private individuals may commence actions such as have been described? Sir, private individuals may bring such actions as the law allows, or they may abstain from so doing; but we have a great and important duty to perform to the public, from which, I trust, we shall not abstain. Let us see what this charge is, and how it stands on the evidence of Campbell. To this I beg the serious attention of the house. The charge is twofold. First, that the law officers of the crown have tampered with a witness. Secondly, that, knowing that by the forms of the court, a question must be asked him, which, in order to be a witness, he must answer on oath in the negative; they have, notwithstanding, brought this witness forward, knowing that, if he answered in the negative, he perjured himself. (Hear, hear, hear.) I have now stated, as briefly and as clearly as I can, the accusations against the learned lord; I do not mean to say that they are true, but I will say that they are made on such authority, that they must be received as true in this house, till they are contradicted: and they stand to this moment uncontradicted even in statement, except by the statement of the learned lord, in this house. I will say for the learned lord and his coadjutors, that it is not fair to them to permit these accusations to stand uncontradicted. I will say it is not fair to this House, to ask of it to permit this evidence to stand uncontradicted on record; it is not fair to us, to ask that the record may not be laid on the table, that we may examine into the truth of this evidence. This evidence is contained in a deposition on oath of a credible witness, recorded in the books of the High Court of Justiciary. The deposition was taken down in writing, at the desire of the learned lord himself, contrary to the ordinary practice, and now forms part of the records of the court*. It is our duty, Sir, to have this matter clearly ascertained. The witness himself has taken pains, in the whole course of his deposition, to furnish the means by which, if untrue, his evidence may be contradicted: he mentions the names of many persons as privy to the transactions related by him, and states a number of minute facts: I will ask the house, I will ask my learned friend opposite, the Attorney-General, if this evidence be not true, whether he has ever, in the course of his experience, seen a single case where perjury might be so easily detected. (Hear, hear, hear.) Now, months after months have elapsed since this trial, on which evidence was given, imputing to these learned persons things, which till now I did not believe any man would have allowed to remain uncontradicted. (Hear.) Yet no prosecution for perjury has been brought. The learned lord has told us, that he acts as the grand jury in Scotland; he had nothing therefore to do but indict this man for perjury; and, I give him my word of honour, that he, the learned lord himself, could not be more pleased than I should have been, if the learned lord had succeeded in rescuing from this reproach his own character, and the character of the profession to which I have the honour to belong. (Hear, hear, hear.) Let it not be supposed that in any thing I have said of his conduct, I am actuated by any personal motives towards the learned lord. I can feel towards him, and towards the other unfortunate gentlemen concerned in this transaction, no sentiments but those of pity and compassion. (Hear, hear.) I am actuated by considerations of public duty alone. And why should it be otherwise? Is there any thing in the private life of the learned lord, which can induce me to bear rancour towards him? Is there any thing in his situation, notwithstanding he holds this important office, calculated to provoke political hostility? Where would be the victory over him? What party object could be accomplished by his defeat? This, Sir, is no party question. I am proud to say, that there exist persons in this country, who act together in this house, and elsewhere, to whom nothing is indifferent which concerns the public welfare, or the safety of the constitution. In this sense, this may be considered as taken up by a party; but in no other sense can it be supposed to involve any party question. (Hear, hear.) I request the house now to go along with me through the whole of this man's deposition, and I will ask them if they think the charge it contains ought to remain uncontradicted. The beginning of the statement is of use only to shew the general spirit with which this business was conducted; but it is useful to this purpose; and the house, by the displeasure which it expresses, will teach all inferior magistrates, that such practices cannot be suffered to pass with impunity. The deposition commences by stating, that the witness was apprehended, and so on. "That he was taken to be examined before the sheriff depute of Lanarkshire; and being interrogated if he knew what he was brought there for? he answered that he did not know. On which the sheriff insisted that he did; and added, "it would be wisdom of him to make his breast clean." He is then left with the procurator fiscal, Mr. Salmond, alone, at least the witness says he is not sure whether any other person was present or not. Mr. Salmond came up to the witness, saying, "John, you perhaps do not know that I know so much about this affair;" and adding, "I know more about it than you think I do." He was often closeted with Mr. Salmond; on one of which occasions, after using many entreaties to the witness, and these having failed, after railing at the prisoners as villains who had betrayed him (the witness), Mr. Salmond said, "John, I assure you, that I have six men who will swear that you took that oath, and you will be hanged as sure as you are alive." (Hear, hear.) After this, Salmond said, "John, you will ruin yourself if you persist in this way; but if you take the other way, you will do yourself much good." (Hear.) "Depones, That after much conversation, the witness said he was not afraid of the one way, and he did not see much good he could do himself by the other." Mr. Salmond said, "the Lord Advocate was in Glasgow." This was a mistake; Mr. Home Drummond, the advocate depute, was meant, and is by mistake here called the lord advocate. Mr. Home Drummond was at Glasgow at the time. Mr. Salmond said, "the Lord Advocate was in Glasgow, and he would come under any obligation he chose, if he would be a witness." The learned lord has said, that all that took place was for the purpose of obtaining information. But there was here, at the very first, no word of giving information. The reward was offered if he would be a witness. (Hear, hear.) The witness then states, that he was taken again before the sheriff, and there, to confirm the circumstance that Mr. Salmond spoke from authority, Mr. Drummond, the advocate depute, came into the room. But the witness admits the subject of the obligation was not mentioned. He was then removed to the castle of Edinburgh, there the operations of the advocate depute begin. "When in the castle of Edinburgh, Mr. Drummond came to him, and mentioned that M'Kinlay had been served with an indictment, and that his (the witness's) name was in the list of witnesses, and that now was the time for him to determine whether he would be a witness or not." "The deponent stated, that he did not wish to be a witness, and that he, Mr. Drummond, knew that if he was, he need not go back to Glasgow, as he could not live there. Depones, That Mr. Drummond then said, that he was quite sensible of that, but that he might go and reside somewhere else, and that he might change his name; but the witness said he would not change his name, and that it would be much the same if he lived in any other manufacturing place, as in Glasgow. Depones, "That Mr. Drummond then said, he had been thinking of a plan of writing to Lord Sidmouth, to get him into the excise, and that if he, the witness, chose, he would write to Lord Sidmouth, and shew him his answer." This offer was made after the witness was told he was in the list of witnesses, that he must appear and give evidence, that he was in a situation where he could not help himself, where he could not avoid speaking out, but where he might avoid saying what would be agreeable to those who wished to produce him. (Hear, hear.) The record goes on to state, that the witness answered, he did not choose to be an exciseman; and remarked at the same time, that it was perhaps the only office under government which he was fit for; but as it was an office attended with risk and ill-will, he did not choose to accept of it, as he had suffered already considerably in that way, by being a peace officer. He was then asked what he would have, and afterwards the offer was made to him to be sent abroad. Was this necessary to a witness who was already on the list, and might be compelled to appear? Was all this requisite for his protection if he spoke the truth? Was sending him abroad protecting him? Was the offer of making him an exciseman, an offer only of protection? But the witness adds, that nobody was present at this conversation, and that it was conducted only by Campbell and Mr. Drummond, and therefore it must rest on the testimony of Campbell. But its probability or improbability will appear from subsequent parts of the deposition. The witness did not take the office of an exciseman, as it was exposed to danger: then the advocate depute was ready to come to any other terms he chose: he says, if you will not be an exciseman, what then do you want? what will you have? (Hear, hear.)—"Depones, That at the first interview, after what is above mentioned, Mr. Drummond asked him what he wanted to have." (Hear, hear.) Was there any question about giving information here? Was there any thing here like the fair and candid examination by a magistrate, of a person called before him to disclose circumstances material to the ends of justice? The advocate depute told him that he was already in the list of witnesses, that he must be put into the witness-box; and yet, he adds, now is the time for you to determine whether you will be a witness or not. (Loud cries of hear.) Is any body so dull as not to understand the purpose of this conversation? He was already a witness, why then was he asked if he would be a witness, unless the question alluded to the nature of the evidence which it was wished that he should give? (Hear, hear.) Now, had all this about the exciseman's place been a fabrication, it is probable the man would have let it rest here. He would have been contented with having once announced it. But not so. In a subsequent part of his deposition he recurs to it again. A little further on he says, that, at a subsequent interview, he asked Mr. Drummond "if he had wrote to Lord Sidmouth, and Mr. Drummond answered he had not, as the witness had rejected it." Could all this escape the recollection of Mr. Drummond? The circumstances are most particularly stated. First, the offer made, which was declined.—Then, the conversation which ensued at the time.—And again, the subsequent mention of it, the question of the witness, and the answer of Mr. Drummond. I come now to what I consider as the most painful passage in this record. It is one on which the learned lord has particularly dwelt, and it is the only passage in which there is any mention of obtaining information. "Depones, That at the first interview after what is above-mentioned, Mr. Drummond asked him what he wanted to have? The witness remained silent, and made no answer. Depones, That Mr. Drummond then said, if he would give such information as would please the lord advocate, he should neither be tried himself, nor made a witness." Here is the distinction clearly drawn between the functions of an informer and a witness. The man is in no mistake. He knows well what he says. Mr. Drummond was willing to compromise the matter. The first attempt was to make him a witness, but this failed. He was offered an exciseman's place, but he refused it. He is then asked what he would have?—he remains silent. And when Mr. Drummond finds he cannot prevail on him to be a witness, at least such a witness as he wanted, he is willing to compound for receiving information. He had refused "to be a witness;" and the advocate depute, after having told him that he was in the list of witnesses, and could be compelled to appear, now said, if you give information, you shall not be made a witness.—(Hear, hear, hear.) Does not this mention of information, coupled with the offer of exempting him from being a witness, sufficiently prove that they had dealt with him as with a witness before? (Hear, hear.) But this is not all.—What is the threat held out to him? to this man whom they were endeavouring to prevail on to give evidence? Mr. Drummond begins with promises of reward, and concludes with no obscure hint of his danger. His interest is first appealed to by holding out the prospect of situations of advantage; and his fears are next assailed by intimating, pretty plainly, the possibility of his being tried for his life. However necessary it may be to hold out promises of pardon to those who are concerned in public crimes, and to make use of their evidence with proper caution, it surely cannot be maintained, on any plea of necessity, that such a method of producing witnesses as is here divulged, supposing the statement to be true, is justified by law, or consistent with humanity. On this proposition being made to the witness, he hesitated. "He said that was an uncertain matter, as he did not know what information they wanted." And more to the same purpose.—"Mr. Drummond then said, I do not know what to do with you, Campbell—I wish to do every thing I can to favour you—I shall give you a day or two to think of it. Mr. Drummond added, do you wish I should call back again?" He will not leave him without the hope that his offers and persuasions may be renewed. As he is going away, he turns round, and says, "shall I call back again?" I do not state these assertions as proofs—and I repeat, that I desire to be so understood; but they amount to such a degree of probability, and are calculated to make such impressions, as ought at least to be met with some explanation or contradiction, if they are liable to be so met. The witness proceeds to state, that when Mr. Drummond called afterwards at the Castle, where these conversations took place, he asked him if he had made up his mind? He answered that he had, upon conditions. The conditions were, that he should receive a passport to go to the continent, where, being a mechanic, he feared that the laws of the country would not allow him to go. Mr. Drummond replied, "There is no question but you will get that, and means to carry you there." (Hear.) The witness then said, that, upon these conditions, he would be a witness, provided his wife was also taken into consideration; and on his stating that she was in delicate health, had no means of support but what she earned, and that he feared the public might manifest their displeasure at his becoming a witness, by ill-treatment of her; Mr. Drummond desired him to write to her, stating what he was about, and that a one pound note was inclosed, and desiring her to retire for the present to his father's, Mr. Drummond undertaking to furnish the one pound note. The letter, however, was not sent, but the procurator fiscal of Glasgow was written to on the subject by the lord advocate's desire. I shall not trouble the house by going over more minutely the story of this one pound note. I now come to what summed up the whole of these proceedings. The witness says, that an examination afterwards took place in the presence of the sheriff, the sheriff substitute, the solicitor-general, a clerk, and the procurator fiscal of Edinburgh. "He depones, That he was informed by Mr. Drummond, that the sheriff was coming to examine him; and that it was agreed upon, that, in answer to the first question, he (the witness), was to state, and have it taken down, that he was to receive a passport to go to the continent, and the means to carry him there, it being understood that Prussia was to be his destination; that the sheriff, and, as he believes, the sheriff substitute, the solicitor-general, the procurator fiscal of Edinburgh, as he understood, and a clerk, came into the room; and Mr. Drummond having asked Campbell 'What have you got to say in this business?' the deponent answered, that supposing he was concerned in that affair, and was to tell the whole truth, that he did not consider either himself or his wife safe, and that without his getting a passport to go to the continent, and the means of carrying him there, he could not be a witness; upon which Mr. Drummond, turning to the solicitor-general, said, 'Answer you that.' That the solicitor-general then ordered the clerk to write these words, as he thinks: 'Whereupon the solicitor-general assures the declarant, that every means necessary will be taken to preserve him and his wife, and that he will get a passport to quit the country, or go to the continent (he is not sure which), and the means to carry him there;' that, during this time, the sheriff was walking up and down the room, which is a pretty large one; and when the above words were taken down, he was desired to come and sign this. Depones, that the sheriff came and sat down at the table, and after perusing the paper for some time, said, 'I will not sign this;' and added, that as he was an officer of the crown, it was his duty to see justice done; and he could assure the witness, if he was to sign that paper, he would not be answerable for it for a good deal; for that if the deponent was brought to his oath, and should swear that he had received no promise of reward, and this paper signed, he would perjure himself: that the witness answered, no, if it was considered as a means of his preservation; upon which he was supported in the same argument by Mr. Drummond. Upon which the sheriff said, he would sign no such paper. That Mr. Drummond then proposed that it should be put down, that he was to get the means of carrying him to any of the British colonies, in place of going to a foreign kingdom; but the sheriff also refused that, and added, that he was willing every thing should be set down for the preservation of him and his wife, but nothing further: that after the sheriff had stated this, there was a pause for some time, when Mr. Drummond, looking at the deponent, said, 'Campbell, you know whether you can be a witness on these terms, or not.' The witness remained silent; and some time after, Mr. Drummond said, 'now, Campbell, do you believe that we can do that for you which you expect, without its being set down in the paper?' and that at this time, as he thinks, the sheriff was sitting at the table, the Solicitor-General and Mr. Drummond standing at the fire, and the other gentlemen walking about the room: that the witness answered, he knew they were able if they were willing; to which Mr. Drummond replied, 'could he rely upon them for that?' The witness answered, 'may I?' Mr. Drummond answered, 'you may;' and that the witness said pretty loudly, 'well, then, I shall rely upon you as gentlemen.'" After this he was permitted to write his declaration himself for the information of the law officers of the crown, and was afterwards brought forward as a witness against M'Kinlay at the trial. Now, here we have the whole sum and substance of all the previous communications with Mr. Drummond brought together, and detailed in the presence of all these persons. The witness has himself furnished you with the names of all these persons. He has minutely described their positions in the room at the time. Could any thing be more easy than to contradict him if all this was a lie? (Hear, hear, hear.) There was Mr. Home Drummond; there was the Solicitor-General. It may be said they were interested to contradict him. They were nevertheless good witnesses against him, and would have been perfectly credible witnesses. But there was the clerk who sat at the table, and wrote the extraordinary instrument which was to record this yet more extraordinary bargain. He had no interest, and could not have forgotten what passed. There was the sheriff, who read and carefully considered the terms of the writing, and then refused to have any thing to do with the transaction. There was the sheriff substitute; there was the procurator fiscal; these persons had no interest, but were in every respect most unimpeachable witnesses. Why have not those persons been brought forward to contradict him? It was agreed, then, that he should be carried to the place of his destination, which was Prussia. It has been said that it was fair to engage to carry the prisoner out of the reach of danger; but how does the fact appear? The trade to which he belonged was at the time paid at the rate of about 4*s.* 6*d.* or 5*s.* a week at Glasgow, with which the workman had to maintain himself and his family. It is notorious that the manufacturers of Glasgow were in a state of actual starvation, and equally well known that in Prussia great encouragement was held out to men in the situation of this witness: in truth, there was the greatest desire among them to obtain the means of going to Prussia. Can we then be told that this was not in the nature of a reward? Was it no offer of reward to offer to convey a man from a place where he and his family were starving, and where he felt his situation hopeless, to where he believed he would obtain an adequate recompence for his labour, and be placed in a state of comparative opulence? I would beg to know how another fact can be got over? He wrote to Mr. Drummond for a pair of shoes, and a pair of trowsers, and some money for his wife. He got the shoes from the gaoler, but was informed by him at the same time, that he could not give him any money till after the first trial was over, and that this was the answer he was desired to make by Mr. Drummond himself. If these were not facts, what could be more easy than to prosecute this man for perjury? He mentioned facts and circumstances which must rivet what passed in the minds of the persons stated to be present, or to have been privy to them, and those persons might appear as unimpeachable witnesses against him in a trial for perjury. He said further, that the engagement, which had been reduced to writing, had been burnt in the presence of the sheriff. The learned lord admitted that a paper was burnt (hear!); but argues, that because it was destroyed in the presence of the sheriff, we are justified in concluding that there was nothing in it but what might fairly see the light. (A laugh.) I will not consume the time of the house in replying to such an argument as this. I will leave it to the house to determine between the gloss of the learned lord on this fact, and the inference which I am disposed to draw. In doing so, they will decide whether, if that paper could be produced, it is probable that it would contradict the evidence of the witness. The man also states having received a number of books from a circulating library, naming the day on which he received the first. In short, he has omitted nothing which was calculated to shew the accuracy of his recollection, or to detect him if he swore falsely. (Hear.) Another part of the evidence which I shall notice is the account which the witness gives of the manner in which the opinion of his life being in danger originated. The sheriff and procurator fiscal of Glasgow first asked him if he considered his life in danger. "Depones, that the first idea of apprehension of his being in danger was suggested to the deponent by the sheriff and fiscal at Glasgow, who asked him if the reason why he would not be a witness was, that he considered his life to be in danger? that he cannot say that he considered his life to be in danger: but that he did not choose to go back to Glasgow after being a witness. Depones, that he did not tell Mr. Drummond that his life was in danger;" but he admits that "Mr. Drummond seemed to be impressed with that idea, and the deponent continued to carry it on." So that the very idea of the danger from which they were so anxious to assure the witness they would protect him, was started by the law officers themselves. The witness not only did not consider his life in danger, but he never told any of them that he did consider it in danger. They took it from the first for granted; and were never at the pains even to question him seriously on the subject. But so eager were they to afford him their protection, that they never inquired into the reality of his danger, but were quite satisfied with their own impression, which, it seems, he had no desire to remove, but "continued to carry it on." The learned lord has charged my noble friend with reading those parts of the evidence which are in the learned lord's favour in a lower tone of voice than those which he conceived to make against him. But I am not aware of any such difference. I believe my noble friend's tone throughout to have been sufficiently audible. And the nature of the accusation preferred by my noble friend, and the scope of his argument, shew that he could not mean to sink that part of the evidence on which the learned lord relies. I will read it, for the learned lord's satisfaction, in a louder tone of voice. "Depones, that in the conversations above-mentioned with Mr. Drummond, or any of the other gentlemen, there was no attempt whatever made to instruct him in any way as to what he should say, in giving evidence as a witness, &c." Now I take upon myself distinctly to say, that if the witness did receive a reward, or the promise of it, on condition of giving testimony, though nothing should be said as to what the nature of that testimony was to be, the witness was by the law of Scotland disqualified. The sheriff has so decided in this very case; the court has so decided; the learned lord has himself so decided, by withdrawing his witness. Why did he withdraw the witness, but that he knew, that, if what he stated was true, he was inadmissible? We have the authority of the sheriff, who declared, that, if he took the oath, he would be perjured. We have the authority of the court, who declared that, if that had passed, which he swore had passed, he could not be received as a witness. Now, in opposition to this, the learned lord has quoted Mr. Burnet's book; and a case, I think, of a man of the name of Home. I beg to say, that the book to which he has alluded is not a good authority, nor is the case, if it be as reported, held to be well decided. I knew the author of that book very well: he was a very excellent and pains-taking man; but his book is not a book of authority: and as to Home's case, we have not the case fully reported. I have understood, that it was a case where a third party had made the offer to the witness, and it was decided, and, if so, it was without doubt properly decided, that the crown could not be deprived of its witness by the act of a third party. If the learned lord means to say it is the law of Scotland, that a witness, to whom a reward is promised for being a witness, is not disqualified to give evidence, I will meet him, not with my own authority, but with what is of much greater weight, the authority of some of the most eminent counsel at the Scots bar. An hon. and learned friend of mine, desirous of not trusting entirely to his own recollections of Scots criminal law, has been at the pains of obtaining an opinion, which I hold in my hand, signed by five eminent lawyers, whose names I do not think it necessary to mention. (A cry of name, name.) The opinion, to which I allude, goes to state, that a person is disqualified from appearing as a witness, if he is adduced by the party who has promised him reward; and that the only case which seems to make against that opinion is the case of Home, mentioned in Burnet. But Burnet they considered as incorrect, and in their judgment of no authority.—[The call to name was repeated.] I have no objection to read the signatures to this opinion, as it is the pleasure of the house that I should do so.

They are these, George Cranstoun, (hear, hear) I hope the learned lord is satisfied—(hear, hear) James Moncrief, John Archibald Murray, Henry Cockburn, and J. Rutherford. (Hear, hear, from the ministerial side.) I do not perfectly understand the meaning of these cheers, but I suppose they relate to most of these gentlemen having been of counsel for the prisoner. But I will ask the hon. gentlemen opposite, if they really think this shakes the authority of their opinion? I will ask my hon. and learned friend opposite, the Attorney-General, whether, if my learned friend near me, (Sir S. Romilly) or any other of my learned friends, had been counsel in a cause, and were asked their opinion on an abstract point of law, which had been involved in it, he would consider their opinion as the less intitled to credit? Sir, there is not one of us, but, as lawyers and as gentlemen, would disdain to put our names to an opinion which we did not in our consciences believe to be founded in law. (Hear, hear.) On the authority of these five respectable names, therefore, and on that of the High Court of Justiciary, I maintain the disqualification of this witness. It is so laid down by every text-writer on the law of Scotland—by Erskine—Hume—every writer—except this passage in Burnet, who is of no authority, and it has been always so held and decided by the courts. When, therefore, they put the witness in the box, in what situation did they stand? They knew, when they called him as a witness, that, either he could not serve them, or, if he did serve them, he must perjure himself in the first place. (Hear, hear.) I repeat it; unless he denied that to have passed which had passed, he could not be examined in the cause; and they knew, therefore, that in order to be examined in the cause it was necessary he should first of all commit perjury. (Hear, hear, hear.) There is no way of getting out of this dilemma; I have examined it with my best attention; I have taxed my invention and my imagination to conjecture a way of escape, and I have found it impossible. If any answer to this should occur to any gentleman on the opposite side, I trust that he will have the goodness to state it to the house. The man was not examined; several other witnesses were examined, but they could prove nothing, and the learned lord threw up the case. The reason assigned for this by the Lord Advocate was, the unexpected turn which the evidence had taken; but what was that turn?—the fact of this man's evidence being inadmissible. (Hear, hear.) Now, sir, as to the question how far it is allowable to hold out indemnities to witnesses. It is said, all that was done was to promise the witness protection and security. This is pretty well illustrated in a case in the State Trials in which Mr. Pollexfen and Serjeant Maynard were employed, names familiar, not only to all lawyers, but to all men acquainted with the history of England. It is the case of a Mr. Lasborough and a Mrs. Price, who were tried for suborning a Mr. Dugdale, who was one of the witnesses in the plots of Titus Oates. Mr. Pollexfen, who was counsel for the prisoners, appears to have been driven into a corner, in the course of the trial, by some evidence which came out against him. The passage is curious. I have copied it, and I will read it to the house. Mr. Pollexfen says, "Whether my answer will take with your lordship or no, I cannot tell, but the answer I would give is this: there are several things in that paper, as, amongst the rest, that he should fall under great dislike and danger, and therefore was forced to hide and secure himself, for fear of those whom he should make his enemies by it; and that was terror enough to any man that should run into such a retraction. Therefore, now he must live when he has done this, and so we should apply the other part of the discourse; whatever money she had promised was to take off his fears of want. And so his coming there was to make good that part of the paper which says he must be protected, and maintained, and preserved, that he may see he hath a subsistence and provision for him if he did deserve it. And, my lord, it will be greatly distinguishing in our case, and turn much upon this point, with submission. If I give or offer money to any man to swear a falsehood or retract the truth, it is a very great crime, and if we are guilty of that, undoubtedly our crime is very bad; but in order to the bringing of truth to discovery, and to have a retraction, not of a truth but of a falsehood, and to preserve that witness from perishing, I may promise him protection and subsistence." Old Serjeant Maynard interrupted him. "Then," says he, "you have found out a better way than the devil himself could have suggested to uphold subornation." (Hear, hear, hear, hear.) The Lord Chief Justice says: "Upon my word, if that were a way that were allowable, then woe be to us! We should easily have all the witnesses tampered with by the temptation of 1000*l.* reward." The learned lord seems to have acted on the apology of Mr. Pollexfen. But I have never before heard it seriously asserted, that it is allowable in any case, much less in a criminal case, for a party thus to deal with witnesses. Of this I am sure, that, if it is permitted to go abroad, as the decision of the House of Commons, that such things may be done, there is not a petty trafficker in accusations, in the office of any magistrate in any part of the kingdom, nor a pettyfogging attorney throughout the country, who is charged with a criminal prosecution, who will not feel himself justified by such a decision in protecting, maintaining, and dealing with witnesses. They will not, indeed, attempt to induce them to say any thing but the truth. But they may give them to understand, that if they do tell the truth, they shall be no losers by it. (Hear, hear.) I have felt the question to be of such vital importance, that I should have considered myself guilty of a dereliction of my public duty, if I had not attended in my place to state my opinion fairly on the subject. To decline going into this investigation, would be attended with the most mischievous effects. It is my fortune to see many questions carried contrary to the opinion and advice of those with whom I have the honour to act: but we have in most cases this consolation, even in our defeat, that if our arguments do not at the time succeed, experience may produce that conviction which we have been unable to command, or an evil which cannot be entirely prevented, we may yet have had the power to mitigate. But in the present case there is no consolation. The public justice of the country is not to be trifled with. (Hear, hear.) I feel most sincerely for the unfortunate gentlemen who have been engaged in this transaction; I feel for their families and for their friends. But every feeling must give way before the due administration of justice, upon which, above all other securities, depends the protection of all our rights and liberties: nor can I forget how many men there are in this country who also have families and friends, though perhaps humble ones, whose safety, whose liberties, and whose lives depend on the repression of such practices as these. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Grant, having sat down, rose again to state, in answer to a question which had been put to him, that Campbell had sent a detailed statement in writing of the facts, to which he afterwards deposed, to one of his learned friends, counsel with him for the prisoner. He contrived it in some ingenious way; he believed it was sent in a roll of tobacco.* He wished to mention also, that at the consultation of all the counsel for the prisoner, which took place before the trial, there was but one who believed it possible that the thing could be true. (Hear.) It appeared to the rest impossible in its nature, and like many other stories to which the profession were accustomed, one under which (to use the technical phrase) they expected the witness would break down. It became a question whether the witness should be objected to on the ground of want of access. It was determined, however, in the first instance, to object to the witness on that ground, and, if they failed in that, to trust to the examination in initialibus.

Mr. A. Colquhoun (Lord Register of Scotland) said, he had never been present on any occasion when charges more unfounded were brought forward. (Hear, hear.) There was not a shadow of foundation for the charges this night produced: he denied that they were charges—they scarcely deserved so grave an appellation, since they rested entirely upon bare assertion or distorted proof. The hon. member who spoke last had even gone beyond the noble lord with whom the motion originated, and had brought forward written opinions, upon which he intended to overthrow the established law of Scotland. He had termed the learned lord and his coadjutors "unfortunate" gentlemen, and had affected to lament an unlucky dereliction of their duty; but he could confidently ask the learned gentleman whether he did not know that Mr. Drummond, one of the persons accused by Campbell, was a gentleman who was held in high estimation, who had received the approbation of every judge in the Court of Justiciary, and whose honour was as unsullied as his talents were splendid? The deposition of Campbell contained contradictions. He asserted that Mr. Drummond had offered him the place of an exciseman; while in the next passage he stated, that Mr. Drummond was persuaded that his life was in danger, and that he could not remain in safety in the kingdom. Were the two assertions consistent—could they both be true—first, that Mr. Drummond thought the man's life in danger; and next, that in order to protect his life, he would make him a marked character, as a person holding an office obtained by his unfounded disclosures? (Hear, hear, and cries of misstatement.) He was not misstating any thing: if gentlemen would read the report, they would find that Mr. Drummond apprehended that Campbell could not live in Glasgow, or in any other part of the kingdom. Would the house act upon such contradictory information, where it was obvious that the scanty leakings of truth had been poured into an overflowing cup of falsehood? The hon. gentleman who spoke last, and the learned lord, were at issue upon a point of law; the latter contending that he was right in securing to a socius criminis protection and security. This was to be accomplished by sending the man out of the country at the public expense. But how could it be distorted into a reward? Was it a reward to send a person into exile to protect him from his enemies? (Hear, hear.) It was absurd to say that this was a reward: it was only putting the man in a situation to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. The learned gentleman had brought forward the opinions of five very eminent lawyers. He (Mr. Colquhoun) did not mean to cast any reflexion upon them or their conduct. They had done their duty, no doubt; but the house should recollect that they had been of counsel for the panel. Such an array of legal advisers had seldom or never been witnessed in favour of an individual accused; but although they obtained information in the roll of tobacco of what Campbell meant to say, and then objected to his evidence, the cause was not given up on account of the incompetency of that witness, but because another part of the evidence had failed. He did not think that the house could, on the statement of such a person as

* The fact was, that Campbell threw his statement, rolled up in a roll of tobacco, out of his window, to another prisoner, who was walking on the terrace before the windows of the rooms they were confined in; and that prisoner found means to send it to one of the counsel.

Campbell, affix a stigma on gentlemen of the very first character, some of whom were not members of that house. They had done nothing illegal, nothing improper; and it was not a little singular, that the counsel for the prisoners, among whom was the hon. gentleman (Mr. Grant), at the conclusion of the trial expressed their full approbation of the conduct of the learned lord, though now he stepped forward and could not find terms sufficiently forcible to express his disapprobation.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that, on the conclusion of the trial, he had not paid any compliment to the Lord Advocate; neither had Mr. Jeffrey bestowed any praise on him, though it was stated in some of the public prints that he had done so. The latter gentleman had only paid a brief compliment to the court.

Mr. Williams Wynn said, that if it had been necessary on this occasion to enter into a discussion respecting the law of Scotland, he should not have troubled the house; but he thought the question lay within a very narrow compass, and might be decided without much knowledge on that subject. If the question was for an address to remove the Advocate Depute (Mr. Drummond) from his office without further investigation, the observations which had been made by the learned gentleman (Mr. Colquhoun) as to the credibility of the witness Campbell, would forcibly apply. But this was a motion for enquiry, to obtain information on this extraordinary case. No doubt, implicit confidence ought not to be given to the deposition of Campbell; but it afforded sufficient ground for examination, how far it could be corroborated and supported by other evidence.—It was not an unprecedented occurrence, that a witness at the trial should give testimony in favour of a prisoner when there was previously every reason to think that his evidence would induce a conviction. A case of this sort occurred on the trials for treason in Lancashire and Cheshire in the reign of King William, at Manchester, in 1694, where one of the principal witnesses, on whose evidence the prisoners had been committed, when called upon the trial, directly contradicted his former testimony. The crown lawyers had of course nothing to do but to fold up their briefs and consent to an acquittal*. What then was the conduct of the House of Commons? On the second day of meeting after this transaction, they sent for all the witnesses; they examined them from day to day, till they were at length fully satisfied, and came to the resolution that there had been sufficient grounds for the prosecution. (Hear, hear.) In that case, then, the house considered themselves bound to institute an inquiry. The present motion was for a similar inquiry, and on grounds equally strong. The learned lord appeared to have in his possession, and to quote from a printed report of the trial, which was stated to be an uncorrected proof from the notes of the short-hand writer, copies of which had been circulated in the house by the learned lord's friends, and one of which had been put into his (Mr. Wynn's) hands since the debate began: but it was desirable that every member should have the opportunity not only of seeing this, but of considering it with more attention than from the length of the evidence, it was possible to pay to it, while the debate was going on. The hon. and learned gentleman who spoke last had stated, that in the deposition of Campbell there was convincing evidence of falsehood. He (Mr. Wynn) had just looked at a copy of the trial, and it contained no such thing as the learned gentleman had asserted. The learned gentleman had represented to the house, that Campbell had stated in his deposition, that he was in danger of his life in any part of the kingdom, and that Mr. Drummond was impressed with this opinion, and yet, that Mr. Drummond had offered him the place of an exciseman. If Campbell had stated this, he would have been guilty of an inconsistency,—but in fact, he had stated no such thing. According to the trial, he said, that he had told Mr. Drummond that he would not change his name, and that he could not live in Glasgow, "or any other manufacturing place" in the event of his giving evidence, (Hear) but he said nothing of the rest of the kingdom; and there was no inconsistency between this statement and the offer to him of a place in the excise—which might be given him in some part unconnected with any of the manufactures, where his life would have been in no danger (Hear.) He should not enter into the question of Scotch law, but there was a primâ facie case for inquiry, since, on the deposition of the evidence for the crown, the court unanimously determined that the case of the public prosecutor could not be supported. If this were a transaction at which only the witness and the advocate depute had been present, it might be argued, with some reason, that as their statements were directly opposite, there was no use in enquiry, since no decisive result could be obtained; but here the point might at once be determined by the production of Sir William Rae, to whom it appeared that at the trial both parties referred, and whom the Lord Advocate then professed the greatest wish to examine.—It had been stated by the Lord Advocate that it was the practice in Scotland for the public prosecutor to hold these private examinations of accused persons. That such a practice should ever have existed, or having existed, should have been continued to the present day, was most extraordinary†. It appeared to him most surprising that any man having a fair regard for his own character, and a desire of avoiding the possibility of future misrepresentation, should hold communication with a witness to receive his testimony in secret, and without the presence of any other person. Sure he was that there was not a justice of the peace in England who would not have adopted the precaution of using the assistance of his clerk in a similar situation. The conduct of the Advocate Depute seemed to be, at [illegible] very imprudent. The learned lord had maintained, that the sole object in the various communications with Campbell was to procure information, not evidence; but if they did not intend to use his evidence, they should have acted differently. (Hear, hear.) The circumstances of the case were such as loudly demanded the attention of the house; it was a case altogether so flagrant that they could not overlook it, or suffer it to stand upon record without examination. The case of Muir and Palmer which had been referred to, was essentially different from the present, there it was proposed that the house should examine into the proceedings of the judges *. Here the question was, whether the house would inquire —not into the conduct of a court of justice— but how the servants of the crown had conducted themselves, so as to draw down the unanimous disapprobation of a court of justice. The propriety of any interference on the part of the house was questioned by the learned lord, because it might prevent the institution of civil proceedings by the injured party; but such an observation, if allowed in this instance, must be held valid also in every case of oppression and injustice, even in a minister of state, and might be a bar even to a parliamentary impeachment. (Hear, hear.) It was right that individuals should have compensation for individual losses,—but the house were guardians of the public, and had a right and a duty to see that public functionaries acted properly in the discharge of their functions. He trusted, therefore, from what had appeared in the course of this discussion, the house would be unanimous in the opinion, that a sufficient case was made out to justify them in entering on an inquiry. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh hoped, that notwithstanding all that had been said and the ingenuity displayed to bring the conduct of the learned lord and his colleagues into discredit, the house would not be persuaded to agree to the motion, unless they were prepared to follow it up. It did not appear to him that any sufficient grounds of inquiry had been established. He saw nothing to warrant any motion on the case; and he trusted that the house would agree with him in thinking that there was nothing so novel in the circumstances before them as to warrant a call for the record. He apprehended there was nothing at all on the face of the record that tended to shew that the officers of the crown were not strictly in their duty. This must be the conviction of every unprejudiced mind. The whole course of the trial was to establish that a conspiracy existed among the workmen of Glasgow, and that illegal oaths had been administered. What was the practical meaning of the step which the house were now required to take? It must be followed up with proceeding either against the Lord Advocate, or against Campbell. If it were intended to proceed against the Lord Advocate, what was there that called for that proceeding? The witness, on whose credit the proceeding must be founded, had been nullified by the trial, his credibility had been destroyed in a court of law. (Hear, hear, from the Opposition.) Was the man, who was declared unworthy of credit in a court of law, to be deemed worthy of credit in parliament? (Hear.) If there was a flaw in this argument, he could not discover it. Campbell's evidence was unworthy of credit (Hear, hear.) because it was not admitted in the Court of Justiciary; and if his evidence were not admissible, what would the record avail? That man's evidence was incredible from what he had said of Mr. Home Drummond. No instance of tampering was alleged but between himself and that gentleman. All agreed that protection was held out, but this was in order to procure information, and to induce the witness to tell the truth, which he was bound to do by every principle of law, morality and justice. In this there was surely no ground to put Mr. Drummond on trial. The evidence of Campbell must be regarded as suspicious even from the very means he had recourse to in communicating it. As to a prosecution of perjury against Campbell, it could not be maintained without two witnesses, and in the allegations of Campbell he never stated any thing that had been questioned, as having passed when more than one other person had been present, except the interview with Sir W. Rae, respecting which the discrepancies between the statement of Campbell and the others related to minute matters, not sufficient to constitute a corpus delicti. It was unfortunate that Sir W. Rae had destroyed the paper which had been referred to (Hear, and a laugh,) but, he maintained, that there was no appearance of improper concealment. There was no difference between the evidence which might be received in the house, and that which might be received in a court of law. The house, he was convinced, would not take the testimony of such a man as Campbell, in order to put such a man as Mr. Drummond on his trial. The witness seemed to have conspired against the advocates of the crown. The Lord Advocate or his depute were not in situations of life to lead them to commit subornation of perjury; but it was evident that the prisoners had inducements to commit that crime. He hoped the house would not give countenance to the trick, which was too much the fashion in these days, of getting up a case of this sort (Hear, hear, from the Opposition); but would concur with him in thinking that there existed no ground for inquiry, nothing to warrant a call for the record.

* See the Note, page 275.

Sir Samuel Romilly said, that after the able, eloquent, and unanswerable speech of his hon. and learned friend (Mr. J. P. Grant), he should have thought it unnecessary to offer himself to the attention of the house, but for the extraordinary confidence with which the noble lord had defended the measures in question. The noble lord had talked of the record, as if it had been on the table; but till the record was produced, the noble lord could not be prepared to argue on the subject. The learned lord (the Lord Advocate) had argued against the production of the record as unnecessary and improper, because it would be interfering with the courts of justice. He had said, that if any thought themselves aggrieved by his conduct, they could bring an action in a court of law; and therefore to bring the record before the house would be directly interfering with this right: but what lawyer in that house could maintain such a position? Besides, what actions could be brought against the Lord Advocate? None, certainly, for injury done by the production of Campbell as a witness; for he had been rejected. He had said also, that when Mr. Adam moved for the record of the trial of Messrs. Muir and Palmer, the motion was refused. But that was a motion which called in question the conduct of the Court of Justiciary*; whereas, in the present case, the lords of justiciary themselves had declared, that there were several circumstances which demanded investigation. (Hear, hear.) One of the judges (Lord Gillies) spoke to the inadmissibility of the witness Campbell—inadmissibility it must be remarked, not on account of incredibility, but on account of the misconduct of the prosecutor—and observed "that the court were sitting to try the case of M'Kinlay—that it would be desirable that the evidence of the witness Campbell should be investigated farther—but that was not the subject of the trial." Now this subject was to be investigated in one of two ways:—either by a trial of Campbell for perjury, or by an inquiry instituted by that house. The first had not been thought of; how, then, could the subject be investigated with

* Mr. Adam's motion, which came before the house on the 10th of March, 1794, was, "That there be laid before this house a copy of such parts of the books of adjournal or criminal records of the Court of Justiciary in Scotland, as contain the libel or indictment, the verdict, and judgment, in the case of Thomas Muir, Esq. the younger, of Huntershill, who was tried before the Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, on the 30th and 31st days of August, 1793." The object of this motion was, to found on it an address to his Majesty, stating, that there were doubts in regard to the legality of the sentence (transportation for 14 years,) and praying his Majesty to extend his justice and mercy to the defendant. In a most able, eloquent, and luminous speech, the hon. and learned gentleman endeavoured to establish the three following propositions: first, That the crime set forth in the indictment was what the law of Scotland terms leasing-making, which, by the English law, is a misdemeanor, in the nature of a public libel, tending to affect the state; and the indictment charged no other offence whatever. Second, That the punishment of transportation could not, by the law of Scotland, be legally inflicted for the crime of leasing-making or public libel:—the Scots Act of Queen Ann (1703, c. 4), having appropriated to that crime the punishment of fine, imprisonment or banishment, under which pain of banishment, transportation was not included. And that the annexing the pain of death to the return from such transportation, was an aggravation not warranted by law; the punishment of death being expressly taken away by the statute of 1703, c. 4. and no statute had passed since that time which varied or altered the law. Third, That if the acts charged in the indictment did not constitute the crime of leasing-making, or public libel, the indictment charged no crime known to the law of Scotland: First, because there was no such crime known to the law of Scotland at common law, as sedition constituting a distinct and separate offence; and this offence did not fall within the statutary seditions. Secondly, because if there were such a crime at common law, this indictment did not charge it, and it would be contrary to law, to punish that offence by transportation; and not warranted by law to inflict the pain of death for returning from such transportation.——The motion was supported by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Fox, and Mr. (now Earl) Grey; and was opposed by the Lord Advocate (Robert Dundas, Esq.), Mr. Windham, and Mr. Pitt. After a very able reply from Mr. Adam, the house divided: Ayes 32, Noes 171. Mr. Adam then made a similar motion with regard to the trial of Mr. Palmer and moved also an address to his Majesty, on behalf of Messrs. Muir and Palmer, embodying the various arguments made use of in the course of his speech. They were negatived without a division.—On a subsequent day, (March 25th,) Mr. Adam moved, "That a committee be appointed to take into consideration so much of the criminal law of Scotland as relates to the crime of leasing-making; the crime of sedition; the right of appeal from the supreme courts in Scotland; the right of committed persons to a new trial; the law as it regards the competency and credibility of witnesses, particularly in answering the preliminary questions; the law respecting the admissibility of evidence under the allegation of art and part; the mode of returning and choosing the common jury; the legal grounds of objection to jurymen; the power of the lord-advocate as public-prosecutor; the propriety of introducing a grand jury for the purpose of finding bills of indictment, and making presentments in capital cases; the power of the court to punishing contempts of court; the power of the sheriffs, and other magistrates, in taking precognitions, or informations for the commitment and trial of persons accused; the power of courts of inferior jurisdiction in criminal matters to try crimes without the intervention of a jury; and to report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the house." This motion was supported by Mr. Serjeant Adair, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Michael Angelo Taylor; and was opposed by Mr. Secretary Dundas, the Master of the Rolls (Sir Richard Pepper Arden, afterwards Lord Alvanley,) the Lord Advocate and the Attorney-General (Sir John Scott, now Lord Eldon.) On a division the numbers were, Ayes 24, Noes 77.

more dignity, propriety, and certainty, than in that house? The whole of the noble lord's argument tended to shew, that Campbell was an incredible witness. He (Sir S. Romilly) saw nothing which took from his credibility. He had been sworn, and might have been contradicted by other witnesses. But he had not been contradicted; and the noble lord was bound to give credit to him, until his assertions were disproved. It had been said that his transactions with Sir William Rae, even according to his own statement, were of no importance. One of the judges of the justiciary had thought them of considerable importance, and deserving of investigation. Sir William Rae had not been examined. That gentleman's evidence would have been very material, and was repeatedly called for by one of the learned counsel (Mr. Jeffrey), but was resisted, because the evidence of Campbell had been rejected. He (Sir S. Romilly) would say, notwithstanding the confidence of the noble lord, that when inquiry should take place, it would require better authority than his to shew that Campbell's evidence was incredible. The noble lord had said, that no prosecution was instituted for perjury, because two witnesses were necessary to convict a person of that offence, and so many could not be brought forward; but the learned lord (the Lord Advocate) had said no such thing, and the statement seemed to be altogether without foundation. The learned gentleman (Mr. Colquhoun), it had been already shewn, had stated a contradiction in the testimony of Campbell which did not exist. Campbell was unwilling to remain in Glasgow or in any manufacturing town, with which probably there would be a communication, so that he would be liable to be persecuted; but it was not inconsistent with this to offer him the place of an exciseman in some other part of the kingdom. Had the noble lord, or the learned gentleman, never heard of a Scotchman having a place in the excise out of Scotland, in Cornwall, for instance, or elsewhere, far enough removed from any dangers at Glasgow? (Much laughter.) The reasoning, then, that Campbell could not take a place in the excise, and that none could have been offered to him, was altogether unwarranted and inconclusive.—To come to another point—the result of the trial. The learned lord had told the house, that the trial of M'Kinlay proved the fact of unlawful oaths having been administered at Glasgow, because the verdict against him was, "Not proven." (Hear, hear.) And so the learned lord had presumed, that the House of Commons, in its ignorance of Scotch law, would be induced to believe that "Not proven," meant "proved!" He had asserted, that a verdict of "Not proven," meant that the corpus delicti was established, and that nothing was wanting but the bringing home of the guilt to the panel. He certainly could not cite for this, either Sir George Mackenzie, or Hume, or Erskine, or even Mr. Burnet, for whom he seemed to have a much greater reverence. This was not the meaning of the verdict. It meant, that the guilt was not made out to satisfy the jury, and that neither was the innocence of the panel clearly established. It was equivalent to the non liquet of the Roman law, and was a middle course which the jury took when the case was not perfectly clear as to the innocence of the panel. All the great law-writers of Scotland had declared, that "Not proven," amounted to an acquittal, not, indeed, an honourable acquittal, but an absolute dismissal from the charge brought forward: and yet the learned lord did not hesitate to say, that all the unlawful oaths were fully proved by the magical words "Not proven." (Hear, hear.) The learned lord had next endeavoured to make a great deal of the communication between the prisoner and the witness Campbell, but it was the duty of the learned lord to facilitate the communication between prisoners and witnesses. By the law of Scotland, which differed from the law of England in this respect, the prisoner was entitled to a list of all the witnesses (an advantage permitted by the law of England only in cases of high treason:) he was allowed also to communicate with them, that he might know before-hand what facts were to be alleged against him. The noble lord (Castlereagh) had called on the house to concur with him in stifling all inquiry. If he gained a majority of the house, he certainly would not gain a majority of the country; and he believed that there was not one man out of doors, and, perhaps, not even in that house, who would agree with the noble lord in saying that this was a case "got up," as he had been pleased to call it. If it was important to the country that the administration of criminal justice should be pure and unsuspected, could they resist inquiry into a case like this? It was a case which the Attorney-General himself had declared he could not defend: his honourable and learned friend had said, God forbid that he should go into prisons to communicate with prisoners before they were publicly brought to trial. (Hear, hear, hear.) But the learned lord had said, that the duties of the Lord Advocate of Scotland were of a different description from those of the Attorney-General of England: he had said, that the Lord Advocate was the public prosecutor, was a police magistrate, or rather at the head of the police, and, in fact, was the grand jury of the country*. It was his duty,

* On the 15th of April, 1794, the Earl of Lauderdale moved for the production of the papers respecting the Trial and Sentence of Mr. Muir and Mr. Palmer, and any minutes that might have been made in regard to the challenge of jurors, the exhibition of evidence, &c. On that occasion, the noble earl, who was educated for the Scotch bar, went into a short detail of the ancient practice in criminal trials in Scotland. His lordship said, that "none of the powers now exercised by the Lord Advocate existed in the ancient practice. The power of informations did not exist, and the precognition, however, to protect prisoners, and to see that no evidence should be adduced against them, influenced either by fear or hope. The law of Scotland differed from the law of England in this respect. The law of England did not begin by examining a witness as to his fears or hopes; but in Scotland the witnesses always went through that ordeal first: every witness was required, previously to giving evidence, to swear that he had received no reward, nor promise, nor good deed (a very comprehensive word) for giving his evidence. Now, previously to the trial, it was sworn that Campbell had been worked on by the promise of reward on the one hand, and the threat of death on the other. He was told, that there were six witnesses against him, and as he knew the mode which had been employed to obtain evidence, he might also know that conscious innocence was of no avail. (Hear, hear.) The man said, "If I do give the evidence you require of me, I shall be perjured:" but when he considered that these six men were also to be influenced—that on one side a shameful death might await him, and on the other a fortune beyond his circumstances and previous situation in life, could it be supposed that his testimony would be unbiassed? And yet with these powerful engines of hope and terror working on him, he was sent forth to give his evidence. And what was the defence? Why, it was merely asked, would the house call on such a person as Mr. Home Drummond to answer the testimony of such a man as Campbell? He (Sir S. Romilly) would answer yes—there was no one so high in this country as to be screened from the obligation of answering to such a charge:—he would, when justice required it, call on Mr. Home Drummond, or even on the noble lord himself—he would say that the noble lord was wholly unfit for a judicial inquiry, if he was ignorant, that no man, be he who he would, whether Mr. Home Drummond or the noble lord himself, could avoid being bound on oath to answer when called on for the purposes of justice. Those who should be persuaded to refuse that gentleman, and the others who were implicated, the power of clearing themselves, would do a great disservice to their characters. Nothing but an investigation could remove from them a cloud of the worst suspicion—of unfair practices in cases in which the lives of men were at stake. (Hear, hear.) The prevention of this inquiry would subject them to imputations for ever: and he therefore trusted, that on this ground at least, if on no other, the house would not refuse that examination so necessary to their vindication and credit.

The Lord Advocate, in answer to the allegation of the offer of a place in the excise, to Campbell, affirmed, that he had stated that no such offer had been made, and that it had been impossible to make it. He had never said that entering on the inquiry would prevent an action being brought against himself, but that it would be unnecessary to go into the inquiry while such actions could be brought. As to the matter of access, it had been allowed by the court that all facility had been afforded to the prisoners.

Sir S. Romilly explained.—He had stated the place in the excise to have been promised, not by the learned lord, but by Mr. Home Drummond. With respect to the question of access, it certainly appeared from the report of the trial which he (Sir S. Romilly) held in his hand, that the learned lord had prevented persons from communicating with the witnesses.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald thought that the Lord Advocate was not only authorized but bound to do what he had done for the furtherance of public justice. He complained that the learned gentleman (Sir Samuel Romilly) had misstated what had been said by Lord Gillies. That learned judge observed, that the witness was disqualified in every way, and not by the promise to provide for him only. Lord Hermand thought him equally disqualified, whether his statement were true or false. He (Mr. Fitzgerald) perfectly agreed with the learned lord in his construction of the words "Not proven:" he thought they clearly proved, that the unlawful oaths had been administered. (Much laughter.) The learned lord would have been wanting in duty, if he had followed the course of the Attorney-General here. But he (Mr. F.) would not hesitate to put Mr. Home Drummond on his trial, if he thought the statement of Campbell could be which is now taken ex parte, used to be taken in the presence of the parties. The Lord Advocates, at the union, or soon after, assumed all the powers exercised by the privy-council, and many powers which they did not possess: formerly prosecutions originated from the private party; now they must originate with the Lord Advocate: formerly a presentment of offences was made by the justices at the quarter sessions; now there are no such presentments, and it is entirely at the discretion of the Lord Advocate to take up cases or not. A new practice has obtained which cannot be found in any of the books, and which does not appear to be founded on any statute or law. A paper of instructions is circulated to the sheriff's offices, and that from an office unknown to any ancient writer on the law, the office of the solicitor to the crown, and these instructions do not go upon the acts of Queen Anne, but on the authority of another officer equally unknown, the procurator fiscal. In short, the whole practice of the law of Scotland, in regard to criminal procedure, has undergone a most material change since the union; not for the better, by assimilating it with the law of England, but by which more unlimited powers are given to the advocate of the crown; the whole power of originating prosecutions taken out of the hands of the individuals best calculated to know the necessities, the manners and the habits of the people; and such arbitrary alterations made in all the forms of proceeding, as to make it in almost every thing unlike the ancient practice."

credited; and that was all the noble lord (Castlereagh) had meant in protesting against putting that gentleman on trial. He had no wish whatever to screen offenders, but he thought that the house could not proceed on Campbell's statements.

Sir Samuel Romilly, in explanation, stated, that he had quoted the words of Lord Gillies, declaring the inadmissibility of Campbell's evidence, from the published report of the trial of M'Kinlay, which, however, might be different from the report in the possession of the Lord Advocate, and which he understood was different from every other. The report in the possession of the learned lord had not indeed been yet published, owing, it was said, to the delay that had taken place in correcting the notes, but he was told that the learned lord had received a proof copy of it from Edinburgh.

Mr. V. Fitzgerald said, he was not aware of the difference, when he complained of misrepresentation.

The Lord Advocate stated, that the report of the trial from which he had quoted, was that which had been made by a short-hand writer, whose only instructions were to give an accurate detail of what had passed, and who was so far recognized by the court, that the judges had agreed to revise the notes of their own speeches. (Hear, hear.) The work itself was not published, and what he held in his hand, were only the proof sheets, several copies of which had been sent him by his own desire, and which, though typographically they might be incorrect, he had every reason to believe were substantially otherwise. The hon. and learned gentleman had spoken of the delay which had taken place in giving that account of the trial to the public, and had urged that as an excuse for the short statement of it that had been published, authenticated by the imprimatur of the gentlemen who had acted as counsel for the prisoner upon the trial. The house, however, would be surprised to learn, that the whole delay had originated with those learned gentlemen themselves, some of whom had been furnished with the short-hand writer's notes of their speeches for revision so far back as the month of August, but which they had not thought fit to return, he believed, at the very time at which he himself was speaking. (Hear, hear.) Availing themselves of this delay, persons had obtained what he had been informed were the notes of the trial, taken by one of the counsel for the prisoner, and had published those for the purposes of that debate, curtailed of every thing which could be calculated to place himself and his colleagues in a fair point of view. Upon this he should make no remark, further than to observe, that the conduct of the learned persons whose names were prefixed to it, seemed no less extraordinary in sanctioning that production, mutilated and garbled as it was, than situated as they were as counsel for the prisoner, in volunteering that extraordinary opinion, for the purpose of arrogantly controuling the debates in parliamant, with which the hon. and learned gentleman had favoured the house.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that the delay with the notes of the short-hand writer, proceeded from their having been so very incorrect and unintelligible, that it required a great deal of trouble on the part of his learned friends, to put their speeches in a correct shape. He begged to add, that the pamphlet which he held in his hand was a very correct report, though the learned lord had called it mutilated. The names of all the counsel for the panel* were attached to a letter to the printer, attesting that the notes published by him were correct. (Hear, hear).

The Attorney-General said, that before he proceeded to offer any observations on this case, he thought it necessary to correct an expression that had been imputed to him, as if he had stated that he could not defend the conduct of the learned lord. He had read the case with great attention, and he could not see it in the light that the learned gentleman (Sir S. Romilly), had done; but he thought that he clearly saw in the account of Campbell, the artful story of a cunning and designing man, who, upon a little truth, contrived to raise an extensive fabric of falsehood, by which he sought to disqualify himself from giving evidence, because he did not wish to tell certain truths. His learned friend had stated, that Mr. Home Drummond and the noble lord would be equally liable with any one else, to give their testimony where the justice of a case required it. He (the Attorney-General) knew it well; but he also knew that it did not follow, because a witness stated upon oath transactions, which, if true, constituted an attack upon the character of an individual, that that individual should be the subject of inquiry in that house, or in any other court. Before the house agreed to this, they must conclude, on a consideration of all the circumstances, that there was ground for a serious investigation against the Lord Advocate, because the question was not, whether the house should have the record on the table, that they might there read what they knew equally well from other quarters; but, truly, whether there was matter to satisfy them that there was ground of charge against the Lord Advocate. A comparison had been made between the office which he so unworthily held, and that filled by the Lord Advocate; but all the differences between them had not been fully stated. With respect to inquiries made previous to trial, and functions that formed a duty of police, they certainly differed very materially. But when the learned gentleman, deprecating a communication between the crown and its witnesses, had represented him to say, that he would not on any account communicate with his witnesses, the learned gentleman had fallen into an error, for he (the Attorney-General) must communicate with his witnesses, must be informed what they had to allege, or he could not know with safety when to prosecute, or when to abstain. The noble lord who made the motion had said, that he (the Attorney-General) never communicated with witnesses; he had only said he never communicated personally; other communication he must have, or he should never know how to proceed; he could not know what case to state, or whether the case could be sustained. As to the imputation cast on the learned lord, he should have given the same advice as the learned lord had done. If he had been told that a witness could not appear, lest his life, or that of his wife, should be in danger—whether right or wrong, others might determine—but he should have considered it his duty to say, "assure him of protection." This was not tampering with witnesses, (hear, hear, hear, from the opposition); it was doing a duty which the public prosecutor owed to public justice. He knew it was a very convenient doctrine to some persons, that the obtaining information was a corruption of the sources of justice, (loud shouts from the opposition benches,) and that to assure a witness protection was tampering with him (cries of hear); but when this was done fairly and honestly, it was not tampering. The charge of the noble lord (Lord A. Hamilton), did not put it as having been done corruptly, but merely thus,—"You know that by the law of Scotland, the preliminary to examine a witness, is to ascertain that he is not influenced by fear or promises; knowing this, you promise a reward, and then by putting the witness in the box expose him to the perilous situation of becoming guilty of perjury." If it were clearly made out that a positive promise had been made to the witness, he should say that it was putting him to this perilous situation; but a mere promise of protection amounted to no such thing. The house were told, that the conduct of the law officers in Scotland was contrary to the import of a question put to every witness in Scotland, "Have you received any reward, or promise of reward?" This was a competent question, it was true; but what was a reward or promise of reward? It was an old and a just maxim in law, dolus versatur in generalibus. Was the promise of protection to a witness within the comprehension of those terms?—(Hear, hear.) If it was, if that was the law of Scotland, he would say that the law of Scotland respecting evidence, was a great protector of crimes. He protested against the motion, because Campbell was an artful man according to his own evidence. He told Mr. Home Drummond that he was afraid of his life, and that it was necessary for the safety of himself and family that they should go abroad. He said in evidence—"but I was not afraid of my life.—Mr. Home Drummond seemed to think that I was, and I continued to allow him to think so. I did not tell him that I was in danger of my life." (Cheers from both sides of the house.) It had been asked, why Campbell had not been indicted for perjury? He would say, that he could not be indicted, so artfully had he contrived to disqualify himself from being a witness. He would affirm, that protection, according to the law of Scotland, was not a promise of reward. The promise of an exciseman's place, the whole of the conversation respecting that, and every subsequent conversation till the moment in which Campbell gave evidence in court, were represented to have taken place between Campbell and Mr. Drummond alone. If Mr. Drummond was the respectable man he was said to be, and he had every reason to believe he was, still he would be but one witness against one witness; although his testimony was equal to that of ten men such as Campbell, still he could be but Drummond against Campbell. Campbell could not, therefore, be indicted for perjury. He again repeated that he considered Campbell as a man who had determined to disqualify himself from being a witness. His learned friend (Sir S. Romilly), must allow him to view the motion before the house, not as a motion for inquiry, but for censure. If the house voted to have the record put on the table, they would vote that there was matter of impeachment against the Lord Advocate. (Hear, hear, from both sides of the house.) Although he would scorn to defend a case such as the noble lord (A. Hamilton) viewed this case; yet, v[illegible] the case, as he did, very differently from the noble lord, he considered it his duty to defend it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Kirkman Finlay said, he had listened with great attention to all that had been said on both sides of the house, and had endeavoured to form an impartial opinion on the subject. He would ask, in reference to Mr. Home Drummond's conversations with Campbell, was it usual to ask a person whether he would choose to be examined or not? (Much cheering from the opposition.) That Mr. Home Drummond had a right to afford him protection, he would admit; but a removal to some place abroad seemed to him to be something more than mere protection, and to be therefore unwarrantable. (Hear, hear.) For the sake of inquiry, he must vote for the production of the record. He would explain his reasons for giving that vote. He agreed with the learned Lord Advocate, that the state of the country had been alarming and dangerous; but agreeing with him in this opinion, he would ask, how it happened, that there had been no trial for two months after this period of alarm and danger, and that no conviction at all had been obtained? (Hear, hear, hear.) It appeared to him, and it was the general impression in Scotland, that the public prosecutor had, in the case under consideration, made a bargain with the witness, Campbell, before he was adduced upon the trial. It was necessary, therefore, that the house should institute an inquiry into the subject, if it were only, as the learned gentleman (Sir Samuel Romilly) had observed, to vindicate the characters of those who were implicated in the charge of having acted contrary to law, and to every principle of justice. (Hear, hear.)

Lord A. Hamilton said, that he was so perfectly satisfied with the whole course and tenor of the debate, to establish his own views of the transaction which had been the subject of it, that he did not wish to detain the house with any length of reply. He would merely make a statement of a few facts, or, in corroboration of facts.—First, he must observe as a fact, that Mr. Home Drummond sat in the court while Campbell was giving his testimony, and never offered any evidence or expressed any desire to offer evidence, that any one circumstance stated by Campbell was false. (Loud cheering.) He never said that Campbell was perjured, and he (Lord A. H.) did not believe that he had ever considered him perjured. (Hear, hear.) Why was perjury now insinuated for the first time? (much cheering.) Had the learned lord in Scotland ever held out as a reason for not prosecuting Campbell for perjury, that he could not procure a sufficient number of witnesses to convict him? (Hear.) He had never heard while in that country, and he had heard much on the subject, he had never heard it alleged that the evidence of Campbell was false and perjured, and he was convinced that it had never been considered so, because, if it had, the learned lord would not for five or six months, that is, from the trial in July up to this hour, have allowed himself and his colleagues the law officers of the crown, to have been the subject of obloquy and reproach throughout Scotland. (Repeated cheers.) If the house should resist further inquiry, he was sorry to say that the vote of the house could not clear the characters implicated, or give satisfaction to the country. (Hear, hear.) Campbell, when giving the evidence in question, said, "I stand before persons who can contradict me if I speak falsehood." Was he contradicted? No. It had been said, that every thing material in the charge had taken place in the presence only of Campbell the witness and Mr. Home Drummond, and that therefore it was that no prosecution for perjury had been instituted. That he (Lord A. H.) denied, and would read from the evidence its contradiction.—He then read from the trial—Campbell further deposes, "that the sheriff, and, as he believes, the sheriff substitute, the solicitor-general, the procurator-fiscal of Edinburgh, as he understood, and a clerk came into the room." No less than five persons. Now what passed at that meeting? The most important and most criminating fact of all. It was at that very meeting that Sir William Rae, sheriff of Edinburgh, burnt the agreement which had been reduced to writing, and declared, that if that agreement were signed and in effect, Campbell could not take the purgation oath without being perjured. Was there no witness, then, to prove perjury on Campbell, if perjury had been committed? The learned lord had a stronger and better reason against instituting a prosecution for perjury. Such a prosecution would elicit the real truth, and fix the guilt where it was due. And therefore it was, that he (Lord A. H.) felt justified in declaring his firm belief, that disagreeable as his motion and this debate had been to him, the learned lord would dread much more any prosecution of Campbell for perjury, though instituted and conducted by himself. It seemed but fair, however, that Mr. Home Drummond, whose name and character had been so much implicated in this matter, should be allowed the benefit of such a prosecution, if he should wish it, even though it should not suit the case of the Lord Advocate. The learned lord had admitted great part of his former statement. He had yet to learn what part of the law of Scotland allowed what he called, and must still call tampering with the witness Campbell, and the house must observe that so much of this case had been admitted, so little contradicted, and nothing of it disproved, as to render some inquiry indispensable, otherwise the Lord Advocate might return to Scotland and repeat the same conduct, and give to other inferior courts the same bad example under the apparent sanction of that house. He would only further add, that if the vote of the house interposed between the case he had stated, and the inquiry which it loudly called for, that vote would do very little credit either to the learned lord or to the house itself. (Loud and continued cheering.)

The house then divided—

TELLERS.

Hamilton, Lord A.—Grant, J. P.

The following is the Deposition of the witness, John Campbell, as taken down by the clerk in court. "Depones, that he was apprehended along with the prisoner at the bar, he thinks on the 22nd of February last, without cause assigned, and without a warrant. That upon the Tuesday or Wednesday following, he was examined before the sheriff-depute of Lanarkshire, and was interrogated, if he knew what he was brought here for? That he stated that he did not know, and that the sheriff insisted that he did, and that it would be wisdom of him to make his breast clean. After some similar conversation, the sheriff went out, leaving the witness with Mr. Salmond, (the procurator-fiscal,) and he is not sure whether any other person was present or not: that Mr. Salmond came up to the witness, saying, 'John, you perhaps do not know that I know so much about this affair;' and adding, 'I know more about it than you think I do.' Depones, that Mr. Salmond added, 'I suppose you do not know that I have the oath you took at Leggat's on the 1st of January.' He then shewed him the scroll of an oath, saying, 'You see, John, I have got it;' adding, that 'you and other persons (whom he named) took that oath in Leggat's on the 1st of January.' The witness then told him that he had not taken that oath. Depones, that after several examinations before the sheriff, and being often closeted with Mr. Salmond, on one of which occasions, after using many entreaties to the witness, and these having failed, after railing at the prisoners as villains who had betrayed him (the witness) and stating that it was out of respect to him that he wished him to be a witness, Mr. Salmond said, 'John, I assure you that I have six men who will swear that you took that oath, and you will be hanged as sure as you are alive.' Depones, that upon this he told Mr. Salmond, that if he got six men to swear that he took that oath, they would perjure themselves. He answered, 'John, John, it is impossible to get six men to perjure themselves.' Depones, that after this, Salmond said, 'John, you will ruin yourself if you persist in this way; but if you take the other way, you will do yourself much good.' Depones, that after much conversation, the witness said he was not afraid of the one way, and he did not see much good he could do himself by the other. Depones, that Mr. Salmond said the Lord Advocate was in Glasgow, and he would come under any obligation he chose, if he would be a witness. Depones, that shortly after this, he was taken before the sheriff, when Mr. Drummond, advocate-depute, came into the room; after which, he was examined, but the subject of the obligation was not then mentioned; and that, in a few days afterwards, the witness was removed to Edinburgh Castle. Depones, that when in the Castle of Edinburgh, Mr. Drummond came to him, and mentioned that M'Kinlay had been served with an indictment, and that his (witness's) name was in the list of witnesses, and that now was the time for him to determine whether he would be a witness or not: that the deponent stated, that he did not wish to be a witness, and that he, Mr. Drummond, knew that if he was, he need not go back to Glasgow, as he could not live there. Depones, that Mr. Drummond then said, that he was quite sensible of that, but that he might go and reside somewhere else, and that he might change his name, but the witness said he would not change his name, and that it would be much the same if he lived in any other manufacturing place as in Glasgow. Depones, that Mr. Drummond then said, he had been thinking of a plan of writing to Lord Sidmouth to get him into the excise, and that if he, the witness, chose, he would write to Lord Sidmouth, and shew him his answer. Depones, that he answered he did not choose the office of an exciseman, and remarked at the same time it was probably the only office under government he was capable for; that it was an office that exposed him to risk and ill-will, which he did not choose to encounter, as he had suffered enough from the public while a peace-officer. Depones, that in this conversation no person was present but the deponent and Mr. Drummond, and that Mr. Drummond was with him in the Castle alone at other times. Depones, that at the first interview, after what is above mentioned, Mr. Drummond asked him what he wanted to have. The witness remained silent, and made no answer. Depones, that Mr. Drummond then said, that if he would give such information as would please the Lord Advocate, he should neither be tried himself, nor made a witness. Depones, that he said that that was an uncertain matter, as he did not know what information they wanted, or that he could give more than they already had; and that if his information did not please the Lord Advocate, he would lie open to every attack that could be made against him. Depones, that Mr. Drummond then said, 'I do not know what to do with you, Campbell; I wish to do every thing I can to favour you. I shall give you a day or two to think of it:' that Mr. Drummond added, 'do you wish I should call back again?' That after some hesitation, the witness said he might do as he pleased, and Mr. Drummond went away: that in a few days afterwards Mr. Drummond came back again, and said, 'Campbell, this is the last time. You must be determined now.' The witness asked if he had wrote to Lord Sidmouth, and Mr. Drummond answered he had not, as the witness had rejected it: that Mr. Drummond asked if he had made up his mind yet. Depones, that he answered that he had, upon conditions; and upon being asked what these were, the witness told him he wished to get a passport to go to the continent: that Mr. Drummond told him, he supposed there was nobody could stop him; and he answered that, being a mechanic, he believed the laws of the country did not allow him to quit it. Depones, that Mr. Drummond replied with a smile, 'is that all? there is no question you will get that, and means to carry you there.' Depones, that they were standing while this conversation took place, and the deponent said, that, upon these conditions, he would be a witness, provided his wife was also taken into consideration. Depones, that upon this Mr. Drummond said, 'Campbell, let us sit down that we may understand each other properly, as I would not wish that we misunderstood one another at the latter end.' Depones, that the witness mentioned to Mr. Drummond, that his wife was in a very delicate state of health, and had nothing but what she earned to support her; upon that question being asked by Mr. Drummond, and that if it was known that he was to be a witness, she would suffer from ill-will by the public: that Mr. Drummond then replied, poor woman, she must be ill off, and desired the witness to write a letter, and mark a one pound note in it, and give it to Mr. Sibbald, who would bring it to him, and he would put a one pound note in it for his wife. That Mr. Drummond also desired the witness to state to his wife that he was to be a witness, and to desire her to leave Glasgow, and to go to the witness's father at Symington, in Ayrshire. Depones, that he said that would be the first thing to discover that he was to be a witness, as his wife could not read or write. Depones, that after some conversation about writing to the town-clerk of Glasgow, or some friend of the witness's, it was agreed that the witness should write a letter to his wife, stating that a friend of his had sent her a one pound note to pay her expenses into Edinburgh by the coach, and that she would receive money here to carry her back again: that this letter was given to Mr. Sibbald, (the jailor) in consequence of the conversation with Mr. Drummond, but that some days afterwards it was brought back by Mr. Drummond, who told him that the Lord Advocate disapproved of sending such a letter, but thought it more proper that Mr. Salmond should be written to, to send for the witness's wife, and tell her that he wanted her to come to Edinburgh. And, after this, Mr. Drummond read to him a letter he had received from Mr. Salmond, stating that a ticket had been bought, but a postscript of the letter mentioned that his wife, from her state of health, had declined to come: that Mr. Drummond returned the witness's letter, which he burnt. Depones, that he was informed by Mr. Drummond, that the sheriff was coming to examine him; and that it was agreed upon, that in answer to the first question, he, the witness, was to state, and have it taken down, that he was to receive a passport to the continent, and the means to carry him there, it being understood that Prussia was to be his destination: that the sheriff, and, as he believes, the sheriff-substitute, the solicitor general, the procurator-fiscal of Edinburgh, as he understood, and a clerk, came into the room, and Mr. Drummond, having asked Campbell, 'what have you got to say in this business?' the deponent answered, that supposing he was concerned in this affair, and was to tell the whole truth, that he did not consider either himself or his wife safe, and that without his getting a passport to go to the continent, and the means of carrying him there, he could not be a witness; upon which Mr. Drummond, turning to the solicitor-general, said, 'answer you that:' the solicitor-general then ordered the clerk to write these words, as he thinks.—'whereupon the solicitor-general assures the declarant, that every means necessary will be taken to preserve him and his wife, and that he will get a passport to quit the country, or go to the continent (he is not sure which), and the means to carry him there:' that, during this time, the sheriff was walking up and down the room, which is a pretty large one, and when the above words were taken down, he was desired to come and sign this. Depones, that the sheriff came and sat down at the table, and after perusing the paper for some time, said, 'I will not sign this;' and added, that as he was an officer of the crown, it was his duty to see justice done; and he could assure the witness, if he was to sign that paper, he would not be answerable for it for a good deal, for that if the deponent was brought to his oath, and should swear that he had received no promise of reward, and this paper signed, he would perjure himself: that the witness answered no, if it was considered as a means of his preservation; upon which he was supported in the same argument by Mr. Drummond. Upon which the sheriff said he would sign no such paper: that Mr. Drummond then proposed that it should be put down, that he was to get the means of carrying him to any of the British colonies, in place of going to a foreign kingdom; but the sheriff also refused that; and added, he was willing every thing should be set down for the preservation of him and his wife, but nothing further; that after the sheriff had stated this, there was a pause for some time, when Mr. Drummond, looking at the deponent, said, 'Campbell, you know whether you can be a witness on these terms or not.' The witness remained silent; and some time after, Mr. Drummond said, 'now, Campbell, do you believe that we can do that for you which you expect, without its being set down in the paper?' and that at this time, as he thinks, the sheriff was sitting at the table, the solicitor-general and Mr. Drummond standing at the fire, and the other gentlemen walking about the room: that the witness answered, he knew they were able if they were willing. To which Mr. Drummond replied, could he rely upon them for that? The witness answered, 'may I?' Mr. Drummond answered, 'you may;' and that the witness said pretty loudly, 'well, then, I shall rely upon you as gentlemen.' Depones, that shortly after this he was allowed to write his declaration himself, all excepting one part, relating to a Mr. Kerr: that a few days after this, the sheriff, the procurator-fiscal, and a clerk, came up to have his narrative signed, which was done; upon which the sheriff said to him, 'Campbell, after you have got clear of this, you had better go home to your loom, and let them rule the nation as they please:' that, upon this, the deponent said, that rather than go back to his loom, he would be served with an indictment himself, even after all he had written: that the sheriff answered, he had nothing to do with that—it remained between the witness and others. Depones, that he was visited by Mr. Drummond after this, who ordered Captain Sibbald to get him plenty of books, and that he has read nearly a hundred volumes since that time; that about a fortnight or three weeks ago, he wrote a letter to Mr. Drummond, that he was in need of a pair of shoes and a pair of trowsers, and that his wife was in need of money. Depones, that he did receive a pair of shoes from Captain Sibbald, by the orders of Mr. Drummond, as Captain Sibbald said, but that he could not then get any money; but that as soon as the first trial was over, he would get money. That he wrote another letter to Mr. Drummond, stating part of what was in his declaration, as a gentle demand for money, and received the same answer, that he could get no money at present, but that he would get some after the first trial was over, and that he (Sibbald) told him he had got this answer from Mr. Drummond. Depones, that although their engagement is not in writing, in consequence of the interference of the sheriff, and which writing was immediately burnt in the sheriff's presence, he considers it still a subsisting private engagement, upon the performance of which he thinks himself entitled to rely; and that the declaration which he signed, and gave to the sheriff, was made upon a reliance on that engagement. Depones, that at the conversation with Mr. Drummond, when he got an order to get the books, he was then cited as a witness on the trial of Andrew M'Kinlay, and that the first book that the deponent received from the library, in consequence of that order, was upon the 22d day of April last. Depones, that he was not cited as a witness at the time he signed and delivered his declaration to the sheriff; and that the conversation about the books took place in the week that Mr. Drummond went to the circuit at Glasgow. Depones, the first idea of apprehension of his being in danger was suggested to the deponent by the sheriff and fiscal of Glasgow, who asked him if the reason why he would not be a witness was, that he considered his life to be in danger? That he cannot say that he considered his life to be in danger; but that he did not choose to go back to Glasgow, after being a witness. Depones, that he did not tell Mr. Drummond that his life was in danger, as Mr. Drummond seemed to be impressed with that idea, and the deponent continued to carry it on. Depones, that in the conversations above-mentioned with Mr. Drummond, or any of the other gentlemen, there was no attempt whatever made to instruct him in any way as to what he should say in giving evidence as a witness. All which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God."

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] The resolution of the committee, "That provision be made for carrying into execution the treaty between his Britannic Majesty and his Catholic Majesty, signed at Madrid the 23d day of September, 1817," was reported and agreed to; and a bill, or bills, ordered to be brought in by Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MALT, &c. DUTIES BILL.] A bill "for continuing to his Majesty certain duties on malt, sugar, tobacco, and snuff in Great Britain, and on pensions, offices, and personal estates in England, for the service of the year 1818," was presented, and read a first time.

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.] A bill "for raising the sum of 30 millions by exchequer bills, for the service of the year 1818," was presented, and read a first time.

GAMING.] Mr. Ogle moved for leave to bring in a bill for the suppression of gaming. Leave was given, and the bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ogle and Sir Frederick Flood.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, Feb. 11.

No public business of any importance occurred.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, Feb. 11.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] A return was presented, pursuant to an order of the 4th instant, of the vessels engaged in the slave trade, and detained by his Majesty's cruizers, for which claims have been given in by Spanish subjects.– Ordered to lie on the table.

GOLD AND SILVER COIN.] An account was presented, pursuant to an address of the 5th instant, of gold and silver coined at the Mint.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LONDON NEW PRISON BILL.] Sir J. Shaw brought in a bill "for raising an additional sum of money for carrying into execution the acts of parliament for building a new prison for debtors in the City of London, and for extending the powers of the said acts."—Read a first time.

PROMISSORY NOTES.] On the motion of Mr. F. Lewis accounts were ordered,

1st. "Of the number of stamps of promissory notes re-issuable, of each class that have been issued, distinguishing each successive quarter, and the corresponding amount of duties, from the 10th of October 1814 to the latest time to which the same can be made up."

2. "Of the number of re-issuable promissory notes stamped in England from the 10th of October 1814 to the latest time to which the same can be made up; distinguishing each successive quarter, the rates of duty, and the value of the notes."

3. "Of the number of licences for the issue of promissory notes payable on demand in Great Britain, in each successive year from the 10th of October 1811 to the 10th of October 1817; distinguishing the licences renewed from those granted to new banks, and distinguishing the licences granted to persons residing in Scotland."

Mr. Grenfell observed that these papers would be useful in considering the whole subject of our pecuniary affairs, but, according to his view, it was desirable for the interest of trade, that every encouragement should be given to the circulation of country bank notes, so long as those notes were convertible into cash, or bank of England notes.

COUNTRY BAKERS.] Mr. F. Lewis presented a petition of certain persons, praying that the provisions of the act for the regulation of bakers in London, and within ten miles thereof, might be extended to every part of the kingdom.–Ordered to lie on the table.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] On the motion of Mr. Lushington, accounts were ordered,

1. "Of the amount of exchequer bills issued per acts 7 and 11 Anne remaining in the chests of the tellers of the exchequer, together with the interest due upon them, outstanding and unprovided for."

2. "Of the amount of the monies paid into the receipt of his Majesty's exchequer, pursuant to act 51 Geo. III. c. 15, intituled, 'an act for enabling his Majesty to direct the issue of exchequer bills to a limited amount for the purposes and in manner therein mentioned,' and which remain for the disposition of parliament."

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.] The thirty millions exchequer bills bill was read a second time.

MALT &c. DUTIES BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

COURTS OF LAW (SCOTLAND).] Mr. Lushington presented the third report of the commission appointed to inquire with respect to fees and offices connected with the several courts of judicature in Scotland.

Lord A. Hamilton rose to inquire whether any step had yet been taken, in consequence of the former reports of this commission; whether any fees had been reduced, or any office abolished, or whether it was intended to make any such reduction or abolition; for as this commission had been sitting three years, it was material to know whether any good had resulted, or was likely to result from it, to compensate for the expenses which it incurred?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared his inability to give the noble lord all the information he desired, but he could say, that it was in the contemplation of the secretary of state to take some measures in consequence of the reports alluded to, and it was also intended by the committee of finance to take those reports into consideration, as soon as other and more pressing business permitted.

ROYAL BURGHS (SCOTLAND).] Sir George Clerk presented a petition of the royal burghs of Scotland, assembled at their annual convention: setting forth, that by the law of Scotland the burden of erecting and upholding gaols for the secure confinement of criminals and debtors is laid exclusively upon the petitioners, and while the expense attending it is directed to be defrayed from the public revenue or common gude of each burgh, each is laid under the obligation of receiving into its particular prison all criminals and debtors who may be presented under a regular warrant from any magistrate as well of the burgh as of the county in which the burgh is situated, and also criminals and debtors from any part of the kingdom if committed by warrant from the court of justiciary or court of session; this arose in ancient times, most probably, from the burghs affording the only situations of security in which gaols could be placed, and from the small number of debtors in those days, and the trifling amount of the sums for which they were confined, joined to the miserable accommodation which was thought sufficient, the hardship of throwing the whole burden on these communities was not felt to be so great as to call for relief; by the act of the Scotch parliament 1661, chap. 38, respecting the commission and instructions to justices of peace and constables, it is enacted that the said justices shall take notice in all sheriffdoms where there are any gaols and prison-houses within any burgh, that the same may be kept up, and not suffered to decay and become ruinous, and if there be any shire where there is not any gaol or prison-house, they shall inform his Majesty's council thereof, that they may appoint and give order for building of one within the head burgh of the shire, and according to the directions to be given thereanent the justices shall be holden to proceed; thus it appears that the Scottish legislature had at that time contemplated the necessity of providing from some other quarter the means of erecting suitable gaols at least in the head burgh of each shire, but the source from which these means were to be derived is not pointed out, and nothing followed which had the effect to change the footing on which the matter had previously stood; since that time the increase which has taken place in the wealth and population of the country has added greatly to the number of prisoners, while the ideas now happily entertained of the accommodation necessary to the welfare and comfort of the unfortunate persons so confined are altogether changed; hence the prisons originally erected and still subsisting in most of the burghs have become quite insufficient: they are in general not only insecure, but uniformly too crowded, and the prisoners necessarily kept in a state which is disgraceful to the country; but while the petitioners are well aware of these distressing circumstances, they feel themselves utterly unable to apply a remedy; the public revenue of the burghs has in most cases kept no pace with the improvement and wealth of the country, and is quite inadequate to the burden of providing such gaols as are proper and suitable; a general sense of this inadequacy has in a few instances of late led the landholders and inhabitants of a county to agree to share with the head burgh the expense of erecting a new gaol; this first took place in the county of Fife, where the burgh of Cupar having obtained the consent of a majority of the landholders, succeeded, notwithstanding some opposition of the others, in obtaining an act of parliament, by which nearly three-fourths of the expense of building the gaol was raised by assessment on the county; this example has been since followed by the counties of Edinburgh and Perth, which have concurred in obtaining acts of parliament for assessing the landholders and whole inhabitants in a proportion of the sum required for building proper gaols; no general plan however has yet been adopted for subjecting the inhabitants of counties generally in a proportion of the expense required for erecting a suitable gaol in each shire, and this necessary measure has of course been accomplished but in a very few cases; the obligation thus imposed on the petitioners to have proper gaols and to receive all prisoners presented to them while there is any room there, brings also along with it a very heavy responsibility, the magistrates of royal burghs being liable for the debts of such prisoners as may effect their escape; this responsibility extends so far that they have been subjected for the prisoner's debts, not only where he has succeeded in getting away, but where he has been taken within a few minutes after leaving the gaol, nay, even where he has never been out of custody, but has merely been allowed such indulgence as now in well-regulated prisons is granted even to felons and criminals of every description; the petitioners are farther obliged by the existing laws to suffer all prisoners for debt to get out of prison on their producing a certificate, by a medical practitioner, declaring that this is necessary for their health, yet the petitioners continue responsible that such debtors shall not quit the burgh, and that they shall return to prison when required, or as soon as their health will permit; in such cases the debtor is seldom able to find security to relieve the magistrates of the risk which they run, but his failure to do so will not justify them in refusing to liberate him, so that they are forced either to trust to his word or to provide for their safety by keeping a guard over them at their own expense: in such circumstances the magistrates of burghs can scarcely by any care secure themselves against losses, and are involved in continual law-suits and disputes; in several instances the losses incurred by the escape of prisoners has been such as the ordinary revenue of the burgh has no chance of ever repaying, and no fund remains by which the gaol can in future be rendered more secure, or any future loss defrayed; the petitioners, for the reasons above stated, are anxious to be relieved of at least a portion of the obligation hitherto laid exclusively upon them, and which they feel they are utterly unable to discharge as it ought to be done; the advantage derived from there being proper prisons for the confinement of criminals and debtors is one which is not peculiar to the petitioners, but is equally felt by all classes of society, they trust that it will appear reasonable therefore that the expense of erecting them should not fall solely on the burghs, but be shared, as it has been in the particular cases which have been mentioned, betwixt them and the proprietors and inhabitants of the counties: they are also anxious to be relieved, as far as may appear just and practicable, of the responsibility they lie under for the debts of prisoners escaping, and that proper rules be established for the custody of persons confined for debt in their part of the united kingdom, but the hardship of which they chiefly complain on this head may probably be best removed by subjecting the counties to a share of the expense of erecting proper jails; in England, the petitioners understand, debtors are not liberated from prison on account of sickness, and were the gaols in Scotland improved as they ought to be and provided with proper apartments and airing-grounds for the sick and convalescents, there could scarcely be any necessity for liberation on a certificate of bad health." The petitioners therefore prayed the house to take their case into consideration, and to adopt such measures for removing or alleviating the hardships of which they complained as to the house in its wisdom should seem meet.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Prison Fees, (Ireland.)] On the motion of Mr. Bennet, a return was ordered "of the gross amount of the salaries and emoluments, distinguishing each, whether arising from rent of rooms, fees, or any other sources of revenue, enjoyed by the gaolers of the different prisons in the city of Dublin in the last three years, distinguishing each year, and each prison."

Coroner's Reward Bill.] Mr. Mellish moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill to "alter and enlarge the provisions of an act of his late Majesty, for giving a proper reward to coroners for the due execution of their office, and for the amoval of coroners, upon a lawful conviction, for certain misdemeanours."—The bill was brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

Portuguese Slave Trade.] Lord Castlereagh laid on the table, by command of his royal highness the Prince Regent, the following copy of the additional convention to the treaty of the 22d January 1815, between his Britannic Majesty and his Most Faithful Majesty, for the purpose of preventing their subjects from engaging in any illicit traffic in slaves. Signed at London the 28th July 1817, in the English and Portuguese languages.

"His Majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and his Majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil, and Algarves, adhering to the principles which they have manifested in the declaration of the congress of Vienna, bearing date the 8th of February 1815, and being desirous to fulfil faithfully, and to their utmost extent, the engagements which they mutually contracted by the treaty of the 22d January 1815, and till the period shall arrive when, according to the tenor of the fourth article of the said treaty, his Most Faithful Majesty has reserved to himself, in concert with his Britannic Majesty, to fix the time when the trade in slaves shall cease entirely and be prohibited in his dominions, and his Majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil, and Algarves, having bound himself, by the second article of the said treaty, to adopt the measures necessary to prevent his subjects from all illicit traffic in slaves, and his Majesty the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland having, on his part, engaged, in conjunction with his Most Faithful Majesty, to employ effectual means to prevent Portuguese vessels trading in slaves, in conformity with the laws of Portugal and the existing treaties, from suffering any loss or hindrance from British cruizers, their said Majesties have accordingly resolved to proceed to the arrangement of a convention for the attainment of these objects, and have therefore named as plenipotentiaries, ad hoc, viz:

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Honourable Robert Stewart, Viscount Castlereagh, a Member of his said Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, a Member of Parliament, Colonel of the Londonderry regiment of Militia, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, and his Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil, and Algarves, the Most Illustrious and Most Excellent Lord, Don Pedro de Souza Holstein, Count of Palmella, Councillor of his said Majesty, Captain of the German Company of his Royal Guards, Commander of the Order of Christ,

Grand Cross of the Order of Charles III. of Spain, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Britannic Majesty; who, after having exchanged their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

Art. 1. The object of this convention is, on the part of the two governments, mutually to prevent their respective subjects from carrying on an illicit slave trade.

The two high contracting powers declare, that they consider as illicit, any traffic in slaves carried on under the following circumstances:

1st. Either by British ships, and under the British flag, or for the account of British subjects, by any vessel or under any flag whatsoever.

2d. By Portuguese vessels in any of the harbours or roads of the coast of Africa, which are prohibited by the first article of the treaty of the 22d January 1815.

3d. Under the Portuguese or British flag for the account of the subjects of any other government.

4th. By Portuguese vessels bound for any port not in the dominions of his Most Faithful Majesty.

Art. 2.—The territories in which the traffic in slaves continues to be permitted under the treaty of the 22d January 1815, to the subjects of his Most Faithful Majesty, are the following:

1st. The territories possessed by the crown of Portugal upon the coast of Africa to the south of the equator, that is to say, upon the eastern coast of Africa, the territory lying between Cape Delgado and the Bay of Lourenço Marques; and upon the western coast, all that which is situated from the 8th to the 18th degree of south latitude.

2d. Those territories on the coast of Africa to the south of the equator, over which his Most Faithful Majesty has declared that he has retained his rights, namely,

The territories of Molembo and Cabinda upon the eastern coast of Africa, from the 5th degree 12′ to the 8th degree south latitude.

Art. 3.—His Most Faithful Majesty engages, within the space of two months after the exchange of the ratifications of this present convention, to promulgate in his capital, and in the other parts of his dominions, as soon as possible, a law, which shall prescribe the punishment of any of his subjects, who may in future participate in an illicit traffic of slaves, and at the same time to renew the prohibition which already exists, to import slaves into the Brazils, under any flag, other than that of Portugal; and his Most Faithful Majesty engages to assimilate, as much as possible, the legislation of Portugal in this respect, to that of Great Britain.

Art. 4.—Every Portuguese vessel which shall be destined for the slave trade, on any point of the African coast, where this traffic still continues to be lawful, must be provided with a royal passport, conformable to the model annexed to this present convention, and which model forms an integral part of the same. The passport must be written in the Portuguese language, with an authentic translation in English annexed thereto, and it must be signed, for those vessels sailing from the port of Rio Janeiro, by the minister of Marine: and for all other vessels which may be intended for the said traffic, and which may sail from any other ports of the Brazils, or from any other of the dominions of his Most Faithful Majesty not in Europe, the passports must be signed by the governor in chief of the captaincy to which the port belongs: and as to those vessels which may proceed from the ports of Portugal, to carry on the traffic in slaves, their passports must be signed by the secretary of the government for the marine department.

Art. 5.—The two high contracting powers, for the more complete attainment of their object, namely, the prevention of all illicit traffic in slaves, on the part of their respective subjects, mutually consent, that the ships of war of their royal navies, which shall be provided with special instructions for this purpose, as hereinafter provided, may visit such merchant vessels of the two nations, as may be suspected, upon reasonable grounds, of having slaves on board, acquired by an illicit traffic, and, in the event only of their actually finding slaves on board, may detain and bring away such vessels, in order that they may be brought to trial before the tribunals established for this purpose, as shall hereinafter be specified.

Provided always, that the commanders of the ships of war of the two royal navies, who shall be employed on this service, shall adhere strictly to the exact tenor of the instructions which they shall have received for this purpose.

As this article is entirely reciprocal, the two high contracting parties engage mutually to make good any losses which their respective subjects may incur unjustly, by the arbitrary and illegal detention of their vessels.

It being understood that this indemnity shall invariably be borne by the government whose cruizer shall have been guilty of the arbitrary detention; provided always, that the visit and detention of slave ships, specified in this article, shall only be effected by those British or Portuguese vessels, which may form part of the two royal navies; and by those only of such vessels which are provided with the special instructions annexed to the present convention.

Art. 6.—No British or Portuguese cruizer shall detain any slave ship, not having slaves actually on board; and in order to render lawful the detention of any ship, whether British or Portuguese, the slaves found on board such vessel must have been brought there for the express purpose of the traffic; and those on board Portuguese ships must have been taken from that part of the coast of Africa where the slave trade was prohibited by the treaty of the 22d January 1815.

Art. 7.—All ships of war of the two nations, which shall hereafter be destined to prevent the illicit traffic in slaves, shall be furnished by their own government with a copy of the instructions annexed to the present convention, and which shall be considered as an integral part thereof.

These instructions shall be written in Portuguese and English, and signed for the vessels of each of the two powers, by the ministers of their respective marine.

The two high contracting parties reserve the faculty of altering the said instructions, in whole or in part, according to circumstances; it being, however, well understood, that the said alterations cannot take place but by common agreement, and by the consent of the two high contracting parties.

Art. 8.—In order to bring to adjudication, with the least delay and inconvenience, the vessels which may be detained for having been engaged in an illicit traffic of slaves, there shall be established, within the space of a year at furthest from the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, two mixed commissions, formed of an equal number of individuals of the two nations, named for this purpose by their respective sovereigns.

These commissions shall reside—one in a possession belonging to his Britannic Majesty—the other within the territories of his Most Faithful Majesty; and the two governments, at the period of the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, shall declare, each for its own dominions, in what places the commissions shall respectively reside. Each of the two high contracting parties reserving to itself the right of changing, at its pleasure, the place of residence of the commission held within its own dominions, provided, however, that one of the two commissions shall always be held upon the coast of Africa, and the other in the Brazils.

These commissions shall judge the causes submitted to them without appeal, and according to the regulation and instructions annexed to the present convention, of which they shall be considered as an integral part.

Art. 9.—His Britannic Majesty, in conformity with the stipulations of the treaty of the 22d of January 1815, engages to grant, in the manner hereafter explained, sufficient indemnification to all the proprietors of Portuguese vessels and cargoes captured by British cruizers between the 1st of June 1814, and the period at which the two commissions pointed out in article 8, of the present convention, shall assemble at their respective posts.

The two high contracting parties agree that all claims of the nature hereinbefore mentioned, shall be received and liquidated by a mixed commission, to be held at London, and which shall consist of an equal number of the individuals of the two nations, named by their respective sovereigns, and upon the same principles stipulated by the 8th article of this additional convention, and by the other acts which form an integral part of the same. The aforesaid commissions shall commence their functions, six months after the ratification of the present convention, or sooner if possible.

The two high contracting parties have agreed that the proprietors of vessels captured by the British cruizers, cannot claim compensation for a larger number of slaves than that which, according to the existing laws of Portugal, they were permitted to transport, according to the rate of tonnage of the captured vessel.

The two high contracting parties are equally agreed, that every Portuguese vessel captured with slaves on board for the traffic, which shall be proved to have been embarked within the territories of the coast of Africa, situated to the north of Cape Palmas, and not belonging to the crown of Portugal,—as well as all Portuguese vessels captured with slaves on board for the traffic, six months after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty of the 22d of January 1815, and on which it can be proved that the aforesaid slaves were embarked in the roadsteads of the coast of Africa, situated to the north of the equator, shall not be entitled to claim any indemnification.

Art. 10.—His Britannic Majesty engages to pay, within the space of a year at furthest, from the decision of each case, to the individual having a just claim to the same, the sums which shall be granted to them by the commissions named in the preceding articles.

Art. 11.—His Britannic Majesty formally engages to pay the three hundred thousand pounds sterling of indemnification, stipulated by the convention of the 21st of January 1815, in favour of the proprietors of Portuguese vessels captured by British cruizers, up to the period of the 1st of June 1814, in the manner following, viz.

The first payment of 150,000*l.* sterling six months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, and the remaining 150,000*l.* sterling, as well as the interest at 5 per cent. due upon the total sum, from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention of the 21st of January 1815, shall be paid nine months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention.. The interest due shall be payable up to the day of the last payment. All the aforesaid payments shall be made in London, to the minister of his Most Faithful Majesty, at the court of his Britannic Majesty, or to the persons whom his Most Faithful Majesty shall think proper to authorize for that purpose.

Art. 12.—The acts or instruments annexed to this additional convention, and which form an integral part thereof, are as follows:

No. 1. Form of passport for the Portuguese merchant ships, destined for the lawful traffic in slaves.

No. 2. Instructions for the ships of war of both nations, destined to prevent the illicit traffic in slaves.

No. 3. Regulation for the mixed commissions, which are to hold their sittings on the coast of Africa, at the Brazils, and in London.

Art. 13.—The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications thereof exchanged at Rio Janeiro within the space of four months at furthest, dating from the day of its signature.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have thereunto affixed the seal of their arms.

Form of passport for Portuguese vessels destined for the lawful traffic in slaves.

(Place for the royal arms.)

I, Minister and Secretary of State, for the affairs of the Marine and Transatlantic Dominions, &c. &c. or Governor of this Province, or Secretary of the Government of Portugal, make known to those that shall see the present passport, that the vessel called of tons, and carrying men, and passengers, master, and owner, Portuguese, and subjects of the United Kingdom, is bound to the ports of and and coast of from whence she is to return to , the said master and owner having previously taken the required oath before the royal board of commerce of this capital, (or the board of inspection of this province,) and having legally proved that no foreigner has any share in the above vessel and cargo, as appears by the certificate of that royal board, (or board of inspection,) which is annexed to this passport. The said master, and owner of the said vessel, being under an obligation to enter solely such ports on the coast of Africa where the slave trade is permitted to the subjects of the United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil and Algarves; and to return from thence to any of the ports of this kingdom, where alone they shall be permitted to land the slaves whom they carry, after going through the proper forms, to shew that they have, in every respect, complied with the provisions of the Alvará of the 24th of November 1813, by which his Majesty was pleased to regulate the conveyance of slaves from the coast of Africa to his dominions of Brazil. And should they fail to execute any of these conditions, they shall be liable to the penalties denounced by the Alvará of* against those who shall carry on the slave trade in an illicit manner. And as in going or returning she may, either at sea or in port, meet officers of ships and vessels of the same kingdom, the King our Lord orders them not to give her any obstruction; and his Majesty recommends to the officers of the fleets, squadrons, and ships of the kings, princes, republics and potentates, the friends and allies of the crown, not to prevent her from prosecuting her voyage, but, on the contrary, to afford her any aid and accommodation she may want for continuing the same; being persuaded that those recommended by their princes, will, on our part, experience the same treatment. In testimony of which his Majesty has ordered her to be furnished by me with this passport, signed and sealed with the great seal of the royal arms, which shall have validity only for and for one voyage alone.

Given in the palace of the of in the year after the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ.

(L. S.)

By order of his Excellency,
The officer who made out the passport.

This passport, numbered ( ) authorizes any number of slaves not exceeding being per ton (as permitted by the Alvará of†) to be on board of this ship at one time, excepting always such slaves employed as sailors or domestics, and children born on board during the voyage.

Instructions intended for the British and Portuguese ships of war employed to prevent the illicit traffic in slaves.

Art. 1.—Every British or Portuguese ship of war shall, in conformity with article 5. of the additional convention of this date, have a right to visit the merchant ships of either of the two powers actually engaged, or suspected to be engaged in the slave trade; and should any slaves be found on board according to the tenor of the 6th article of the aforesaid additional convention, —And as to what regards the Portuguese vessels, should there be ground to suspect that the said slaves have been embarked on a part of the coast of Africa where the traffic in slaves can no longer be legally carried on in consequence of the stipulations in force between the two high powers: in these cases alone, the commander of the said ship of war may detain them; and having detained them, he is to bring them as soon as possible, for judgment before that of the two mixed commissions appointed by the 8th article of the additional convention of this date, which shall be the nearest, or which the commander of the capturing ship shall, upon his own responsibility, think he can soonest reach from the spot where the slave ship shall have been detained.

Ships on board of which no slaves shall be found intended for purposes of traffic, shall not be detained on any account or pretence whatever.

Negro servants or sailors that may be found

* This Alvará to be promulgated in pursuance of the 3d article of the additional convention of the 28th of July 1817.

† That is to say, the Alvará of the 24th of November 1813, or any other Portuguese law which may hereafter be promulgated in lieu thereof.

on board the said vessels, cannot, in any case, be deemed a sufficient cause for detention.

Art. 2.—No merchantmen or slave ship can, on any account or pretence whatever, be visited or detained whilst in the port or roadstead belonging to either of the two high contracting powers, or within cannon-shot of the batteries on shore. But in case suspicious vessels should be found so circumstanced, proper representations may be addressed to the authorities of the country, requesting them to take effectual measures for preventing such abuses.

Art. 3.—The high contracting powers having in view the immense extent of the shores of Africa, to the north of the Equator, along which this commerce continues prohibited, and the facility thereby afforded for illicit traffic, on points where either the total absence, or at least the distance of lawful authorities bar ready access to those authorities, in order to prevent it, have agreed, for the more readily attaining the salutary end which they propose, to grant, and they do actually grant to each other the power, without prejudice to the rights of sovereignty, to visit and detain, as if on the high seas, any vessel having slaves on board, even within cannon shot of the shore of their respective territories on the continent of Africa to the north of the Equator, in case of there being no local authorities to whom recourse might be had, as has been stated in the preceding article. In such case, vessels so visited, may be brought before the mixed commissions, in the form prescribed in the first article of the preceding instructions.

Art. 4.—No Portuguese merchantman or slave ship shall, on any pretence whatever, be detained, which shall be found any where near the land, or on the high seas, south of the Equator, unless after a chase that shall have commenced north of the Equator.

Art. 5.—Portuguese vessels furnished with a regular passport, having slaves on board, shipped at those parts of the coast of Africa where the trade is permitted to Portuguese subjects, and which shall afterwards be found north of the Equator, shall not be detained by the ships of war of the two nations, though furnished with the present instructions, provided the same can account for their course, either in conformity with the practice of the Portuguese navigation, by steering some degrees to the northward, in search of fair winds, or for other legitimate causes, such as the dangers of the sea duly proved; or lastly, in the case of their passports proving that they were bound for a Portuguese port not within the continent of Africa: Provided always, that with regard to all slave ships detained to the north of the Equator, the proof of the legality of the voyage is to be furnished by the vessel so detained. On the other hand, with respect to slave ships detained to the south of the Equator, in conformity with the stipulations of the preceding article, the proof of the illegality of the voyage is to be exhibited by the captor.

It is in like manner stipulated, that the number of slaves found on board a slave ship by the cruizers, even should the number not agree with that contained in their passport, shall not be a sufficient reason to justify the detention of the ship; but the captain and the proprietor shall be denounced in the Portuguese tribunals in the Brazils, in order to their being punished according to the laws of the country.

Art. 6.—Every Portuguese vessel, intended to be employed in the legal traffic in slaves, in conformity with the principles laid down in the additional convention of this date, shall be commanded by a native Portuguese; and two-thirds, at least, of the crew, shall likewise be Portuguese: Provided always, that its Portuguese or foreign construction shall in no wise affect its nationality, and that the negro sailors shall always be reckoned as Portuguese, provided they belong, as slaves, to subjects of the crown of Portugal, or that they have been enfranchised in the dominions of his Most Faithful Majesty.

Art. 7.—Whenever a ship of war shall meet a merchant vessel liable to be searched, it shall be done in the most mild manner, and with every attention which is due between allied and friendly nations; and in no case shall the search be made by an officer holding a rank inferior to that of lieutenant in the navy.

Art. 8.—The ships of war which may detain the slave ships, in pursuance of the principles laid down in the present instructions, shall leave on board all the cargo of negroes untouched, as well as the captain and a part at least of the crew of the above-mentioned slave ship; the captain shall draw up in writing an authentic declaration, which shall exhibit the state in which he found the detained ship, and the changes which may have taken place in it; he shall deliver to the captain of the slave ship, a signed certificate of the papers seized on board the said vessel, as well as of the number of slaves found on board at the moment of detention.

The negroes shall not be disembarked till after the vessels which contain them shall be arrived at the place where the legality of the capture is to be tried by one of the two mixed commissions, in order that, in the event of their not being adjudged legal prize, the loss of the proprietors may be more easily repaired. If, however, urgent motives, deduced from the length of the voyage, the state of health of the negroes, or other causes, required that they should be disembarked entirely, or in part, before the vessels could arrive at the place of residence of one of the said commissions, the commander of the capturing ship may take on himself the responsibility of such disembarkation, provided that the necessity be stated in a certificate in proper form.

Art. 9.—No conveyance of slaves from one port of the Brazils to another, or from the continent or islands of Africa, to the possessions of Portugal out of America, shall take place as objects of commerce, except in ships provided with passports from the Portuguese government, ad hoc.

Regulations for the mixed commissions, which are to reside on the coast of Africa, in the Brazils, and at London.

Art. 1.—The mixed commissions to be established by the additional convention of this date, upon the coast of Africa and in the Brazils, are appointed to decide upon the legality of the detention of such slave vessels as the cruizers of both nations shall detain, in pursuance of this same convention, for carrying on an illicit commerce in slaves.

The above-mentioned commissions shall judge, without appeal, according to the letter and spirit of the treaty of the 22d of January, 1815, and of the additional convention to the said treaty, signed at London on this 28th day of July, 1817.

The commissions shall give sentence as summarily as possible, and they are required to decide (as far as they shall find it practicable), within the space of twenty days, to be dated from that on which every detained vessel shall have been brought into the port where they shall reside: 1st, upon the legality of the capture; 2d, in the case in which the captured vessel shall have been liberated, as to the indemnification which she is to receive.

And it is hereby provided, that in all cases the final sentence shall not be delayed, on account of the absence of witnesses, or for want of other proofs, beyond the period of two months: except upon the application of any of the parties interested, when, upon their giving satisfactory security to charge themselves with the expense and risks of the delay, the commissioners may, at their discretion, grant an additional delay not exceeding four months.

Art. 2.—Each of the above-mentioned mixed commissions, which are to reside on the coast of Africa, and in the Brazils, shall be composed in the following manner:

The two high contracting parties shall each of them name a commissary judge, and a commissioner of arbitration, who shall be authorized to hear and to decide, without appeal, all cases of capture of slave vessels which, in pursuance of the stipulation of the additional convention of this date, may be laid before them. All the essential parts of the proceedings carried on before these mixed commissions, shall be written down in the language of the country in which the commission may reside.

The commissary judges and the commissioners of arbitration, shall make oath, in presence of the principal magistrate of the place in which the commission may reside, to judge fairly and faithfully, to have no preference either for the claimants or the captors, and to act, in all their decisions, in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty of the 22d of Jan. 1815, and of the additional convention to the said treaty.

There shall be attached to each commission a secretary or registrar, appointed by the sovereign of the country, in which the commission may reside, who shall register all its acts, and who, previous to his taking charge of his post, shall make oath, in presence of at least one of the commissary judges, to conduct himself with respect for their authority, and to act with fidelity in all the affairs which may belong to his charge.

Art. 3.—The form of the process shall be as follows:

The commissary judges of the two nations shall, in the first place, proceed to the examination of the papers of the vessel, and to receive the depositions on oath of the captain and of two or three, at least, of the principal individuals on board of the detained vessel, as well as the declaration on oath of the captor, should it appear necessary, in order to be able to judge and to pronounce if the said vessel has been justly detained or not, according to the stipulations of the additional convention of this date, and in order that, according to this judgment, it may be condemned or liberated. And in the event of the two commissary judges not agreeing on the sentence they ought to pronounce, whether as to the legality of the detention or the indemnification to be allowed, or on any other question which might result from the stipulations of the convention of this date,—they shall draw by lot the name of one of the two commissioners of arbitration, who, after having considered the documents of the process, shall consult with the above-mentioned commissary judges on the case in question, and the final sentence shall be pronounced conformably to the opinion of the majority of the above-mentioned commissary judges and of the above-mentioned commissioner of arbitration.

Art. 4.—As often as the cargo of slaves found on board of a Portuguese slave ship, shall have been embarked on any point whatever of the coast of Africa, where the slave-trade continues lawful to the subjects of the crown of Portugal, such slave-ship shall not be detained on pretext that the above-mentioned slaves have been brought originally by land from any other part whatever of the continent.

Art. 5.—In the authenticated declaration which the captor shall make before the commission, as well as in the certificate of the papers seized, which shall be delivered to the captain of the captured vessel, at the time of the detention, the above-mentioned captor shall be bound to declare his name, the name of his vessel, as well as the latitude and longitude of the place where the detention shall have taken place. and the number of slaves found living on board of the slave-ship, at the time of the detention.

Art. 6.—As soon as sentence shall have been passed, the detained vessel, if liberated, and what remains of the cargo, shall be restored to the proprietors. who may, before the same commission, claim a valuation of the damages, which they may have a right to demand: the captor himself, and, in his default, his government, shall remain responsible for the above-mentioned damages. The two high contracting parties bind themselves to defray, within the term of a year from the date of the sentence the indemnifications which may be granted by the above-named commission, it being understood that these indemnifications should be at the expense of the power of which the captor shall be a subject.

Art. 7.—In case of the condemnation of a vessel for an unlawful voyage, she shall be declared lawful prize, as well as her cargo, of whatever description it may be, with the exception of the slaves who may be on board as objects of commerce; and the said vessel, as well as her cargo, shall be sold by public sale, for the profit of the two governments; and as to the slaves, they shall receive from the mixed commission, a certificate of emancipation, and shall be delivered over to the government on whose territory the commission which shall have so judged them shall be established, to be employed as servants or free labourers. Each of the two governments binds itself to guarantee the liberty of such portion of these individuals as shall be respectively consigned to it.

Art. 8.—Every claim for compensation of losses occasioned by ships suspected of carrying on an illicit trade in slaves, not condemned as lawful prize by the mixed commissions, shall be also heard and judged by the above-named commissions, in the form provided by the third article of the present regulation. And in all cases wherein restitution shall be so decreed, the commission shall award to the claimant or claimants, or his or their lawful attorney or attornies, for his or their use, a just and complete indemnification: first, for all costs of suit, and for all losses and damages which the claimant or claimants may have actually sustained by such capture and detention, that is to say, in case of total loss, the claimant or claimants shall be indemnified: 1st, for the ship, her tackle, apparel, and stores; 2dly, for all freight due and payable; 3dly, for the value of the cargo of merchandise, if any; 4thly, for the slaves on board at the time of detention, according to the computed value of such slaves at the place of destination; deducting therefrom the usual fair average mortality for the unexpired period of the regular voyage; deducting also for all charges and expenses payable upon the sale of such cargoes, including commission of sale when payable at such port; and 5thly, for all other regular charges in such cases of total loss; and in all other cases not of total loss, the claimant or claimants shall be indemnified,—first, for all special damages and expenses occasioned to the ship by the detention, and for loss of freight when due or payable; secondly, a demurrage when due, according to the schedule annexed to the present article; thirdly, a daily allowance for the subsistence of slaves, of one shilling, or one hundred and eighty reis for each person, without distinction of sex or age, for so many days as it shall appear to the commission that the voyage has been or may be delayed by reason of such detention; as likewise, fourthly,—for any deterioration of cargo or slaves; fifthly,—for any diminution in the value of the cargo of slaves, proceeding from an increased mortality beyond the average amount of the voyage, or from sickness occasioned by detention; this value to be ascertained by their computed price at the place of destination, as in the above case of total loss;—sixthly, an allowance of five per cent. on the amount of capital employed in the purchase and maintenance of cargo, for the period of delay occasioned by the detention; and seventhly,—for all premium of insurance on additional risks.

The claimant or claimants shall likewise be entitled to interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum on the sum awarded, until paid by the government to which the capturing ship belongs; the whole amount of such indemnifications being calculated in the money of the country to which the captured ship belongs, and to be liquidated at exchange current at the time of award, excepting the sum for the subsistence of slaves, which shall be paid at par, as above stipulated.

The two high contracting parties wishing to avoid, as much as possible, every species of fraud in the execution of the additional convention of this date, have agreed, that if it should be proved, in a manner evident to the conviction of the judges of the two nations, and without having recourse to the decision of a commissioner of arbitration, that the captor has been led into error by a voluntary and reprehensible fault on the part of the captain of the detained ship; in that case only, the detained ship shall not have the right of receiving, during the days of her detention, the demurrage stipulated by the present article.

100 tons to	120 inclusive,	5	per diem,
121 ditto—	150 ditto,	6
151 ditto—	170 ditto,
171 ditto—	200 ditto,	10
201 ditto—	220 ditto,	11
221 ditto—	250 ditto,	12
251 ditto—	270 ditto,	14
271 ditto—	300 ditto,	15

and so in proportion.

Art. 9.—When the proprietors of a ship suspected of carrying on an illicit trade in slaves, released in consequence of a sentence of one of the mixed commissions, (or in the case, as above-mentioned, of total loss) shall claim indemnification for the loss of slaves which he may have suffered, he shall in no case be entitled to claim for more than the number of slaves which his vessel was, by the Portuguese laws, authorized to carry, which number shall always be declared in his passport.

Art. 10.—The mixed commission established in London by the article 9. of the convention of this date, shall hear and determine all claims for Portuguese ships and cargoes, captured by British cruizers on account of the unlawful trading in slaves, since the 1st of June 1814, till the period when the convention of this date is to be in complete execution; awarded to them, conformably to the article 9, of the additional convention of this date, a just and complete compensation, upon the basis laid down in the preceding article, either for total loss, or for losses and damages sustained by the owners and proprietors of the said ships and cargoes. The said commission established in London, shall be composed and proceed exactly upon the same basis determined in the articles 1, 2, and 3, of the present regulation for the commissions established on the coast of Africa and the Brazils.

Art. 11.—It shall not be permitted to any of the commissary judges nor to the arbitrators, nor to the secretary of any of the mixed commissions, to demand or receive, from any one of the parties concerned in the sentences which they shall pronounce, any emolument, under any pretext whatsoever, for the performance of the duties which are imposed upon them by the present regulation.

Art. 12.—When the parties interested shall imagine they have cause to complain of any evident injustice on the part of the mixed commissions, they may represent it to their respective governments, who reserve to themselves the right of mutual correspondence for removing, when they think fit, the individuals who may compose these commissions.

Art. 13.—In the case of a vessel detained unjustly, under pretence of the stipulations of the additional convention of this date, and in which the captor should neither be authorized by the tenor of the above-mentioned convention, nor of the instructions annexed to it, the government to which the detained vessel may belong, shall be entitled to demand reparation; and in such case, the government to which the captor may belong, binds itself to cause the subject of complaint to be fully examined, and to inflict upon the captor, if he be found to have deserved it, a punishment proportioned to the transgression which may have been committed.

Art. 14.—The two high contracting parties have agreed, that in the event of the death of one or more of the commissioners, judges and arbitrators composing the above-mentioned mixed commissions, their posts shall be supplied, ad interim, in the following manner: on the part of the British government, the vacancies shall be filled successively, in the commission which shall sit within the possessions of his Britannic Majesty, by the governor or lieutenant-governor resident in that colony, by the principal magistrate of the place, and by the secretary; and in the Brazils, by the British consul and vice-consul resident in the city in which the mixed commission may be established.

On the part of Portugal, the vacancies shall be supplied, in the Brazil, by such persons as the captain-general of the province shall name for that purpose; and considering the difficulty which the Portuguese government would feel in naming fit persons to fill the posts which might become vacant in the commission established in the British possessions, it is agreed, that in case of the death of the Portuguese commissioners, judges, or arbitrators in those possessions, the remaining individuals of the above-mentioned commission shall be equally authorized to proceed to the judgment of such slave-ships as may be brought before them, and to the execution of their sentence. In this case alone, however, the parties interested shall have the right of appealing from the sentence, if they think fit, to the commission resident in the Brazils; and the government to which the captor shall belong, shall be bound fully to defray the indemnifications which shall be due to them, if the appeal be judged in favour of the claimants: it being well understood, that the ship and cargo shall remain during this appeal, in the place of residence of the first commission before whom they may have been conducted.

The high contracting parties have agreed to supply as soon as possible, every vacancy that may arise in the above-mentioned commissions, from death or any other contingency. And in case that the vacancy of each of the Portuguese commissioners residing in the British possessions, be not supplied at the end of six months, the vessels which are taken there to be judged, after the expiration of that time, shall no longer have the right of appeal hereinbefore stipulated.

SEPARATE ARTICLE.

As soon as the total abolition of the slave-trade, for the subjects of the crown of Portugal, shall have taken place, the two high contracting parties hereby agree, by common consent, to adopt, to that state of circumstances, the stipulations of the additional convention concluded at London the 28th of July last; but in default of such alterations, the additional convention of that date shall remain in force until the expiration of fifteen years, from the day on which the general abolition of the slave-trade shall so take place, on the part of the Portuguese government.

The present separate article shall have the same force and validity as if it were inserted, word for word, in the additional convention aforesaid. It shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have thereunto affixed the seals of their arms.

Captain Waldegrave observed, that in neither the Spanish nor Portuguese treaties was any provision made to prevent the overloading of slave ships, or to prevent those horrors which were known by this country to result from what was called the middle passage.

Lord Castlereagh contended, that every practicable provision was made upon the subject alluded to, as a commission was to be appointed, consisting of commissioners from this country, as well as the other powers, who would be empowered to guard against any such excess as the honourable gentleman deprecated in common with every humane person.

The convention was ordered to lie on the table.

GAMING.] Mr. Ogle brought in his bill "for the Suppression of Gaming, and for regulating Houses kept for the purposes of Play."—Read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

BANK TOKENS.] Mr. Babington begged leave to say a few words to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of bank tokens. The right hon. gentleman had stated that no inconvenience had arisen when the dollars were called in; but the dollars and the tokens stood on a different foundation. The tokens were more numerous, and, in some parts of the country, constituted about a third of the silver in circulation. Besides, the dollars were called in when silver was at a high price, and thence, many of them were melted down. It was possible that much loss might be sustained by the holders of the tokens, if they were not exchanged in due time. They were often in the hands of the poorer classes of society, who could not afford to send them up to London to be exchanged. He therefore thought that government might afford them some facilities for the purpose, as they did for the transmission of the old silver coin. Could they not appoint receivers in different places, which would redound to their own credit, and give satisfaction to the country?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the hon. member had overlooked the most material part of the statement which he yesterday submitted to the house, namely, that the Bank was bound to receive those tokens for two years, from the 1st of March next. How, then, could any inconvenience be apprehended? Those tokens might be taken by gentlemen for rent, and thus, as well as by many other obvious means, the whole were likely to find their way to the Bank long before the period alluded to should expire. With regard to means for facilitating the transport of those tokens from the country to London, he felt that neither government nor the Bank were bound to provide such means, but he was happy to say, that some arrangements had been made by the Post-office, which were likely to afford every necessary facility upon this subject.

Mr. Curwen hoped that the directors would feel themselves called upon to take measures which might prevent loss to the public from the issue of tokens. He had received a letter from Scotland, stating, that at Selkirk many poor persons were kept in want of the necessaries of life from the difficulty of getting the old silver coinage exchanged at the time the new coinage was issued. The Bank ought surely to provide that similar distress should not be occasioned by the withdrawing of their tokens, especially as they must have made great profit by the issue of them. He earnestly hoped, therefore, that arrangements would be made advantageous to the country previously to the withdrawing of the tokens.

Mr. Manning replied, that the Bank directors had actually sustained loss by standing between the public and the executive government, when silver was extremely scarce in the country. He had no doubt that, by the end of the two years allowed for the circulation of tokens, they could be all withdrawn without inconvenience.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—SPANISH TREATY.] The house then resolved itself into a committee of supply, and the Spanish treaty was referred to it.

Lord Castlereagh said, that after the very full discussion which this subject had undergone, he felt it quite unnecessary to make any observations, now that he moved, in terms of the treaty, that a sum not exceeding 400,000*l.* be allowed to his Majesty for the purpose of giving effect to the treaty with the Spanish government for the abolition of the slave-trade. He should be ready to answer any questions that might be asked; but as he felt assured by the sentiments of the house on a former night, of the general approbation with which the subject was received, he would not enter into any further observations at present.

Mr. Lyttelton said, it was not his intention to disturb the unanimity of the house. It was with reluctance that he shewed even the appearance of opposition to a treaty so humane in its principles, and calculated, he trusted, to be most beneficial in its effects. But he took this opportunity of asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble lord a question respecting our commercial relations with Spain. What he had to say of our trade with that country, from the case put into his hands, was not like what should have been expected from the relations of peace and amity. From this case it appeared that the conduct of the Spanish government towards our merchants was very rigorous. Cotton, which was one of the most important articles of our trade, was prohibited in Spain; but if this prohibition was openly declared and known, we had no right to complain. It was the greatest absurdity to say that we ought to make war against them on such a pretence. Woollens and linens also, which were staples of this country, were prohibited. The duties on iron were 110 per cent. upon their actual value. But if he was rightly instructed, we were not only treated with rigour, but that rigour was exercised without due notice. Formerly six months' notice had been given of any prohibitions—now those prohibitions were suddenly made; so that it was impossible to give timely notice to the merchant in London, in order to prevent shipments and very serious losses. This was the greatest grievance that could affect the interests of commerce. That orders upon matters of commercial regulation should be explicit and clear, definite in their extent, and precise as to their commencement and duration, was essential to the very existence of commerce. Let taxation be carried to any extent, but in God's name, let timely notice be given of such taxation. He hoped the noble lord would feel it his duty to effect, if possible, a treaty to remove the excessive impositions upon our trade, or at least to ensure due notice to our merchants. Every information the noble lord could give would be attended to: but he particularly wished to know what remonstrances had been made by our government, and what answer had been returned.

Lord Castlereagh thought that the hon. gentleman, since he agreed to the motion before the committee, ought rather to have given notice of an inquiry on such a complicated subject as he had now introduced. He could, however, generally reply, that the grievances complained of arose from the unfortunate principles of commercial regulation which prevailed not long ago in this country, and which now impoverished Spain, and occasioned a great deal of contraband trade. Hear, hear, from all parts of the house.) Our government had zealously endeavoured to remove those grievances, but all their efforts had been rendered unavailing by those prejudices, which considered restriction and high duty the only modes of contending with another country. (Hear.) He was not aware of any grievance having arisen from want of notice. The prohibition of our cotton was rather a return to their former system than an innovation. In 1792 our cotton was prohibited, and although it had been subsequently admitted, the restoration of the former state of things naturally occasioned a renewal of the prohibition. Besides, in our commercial relations with other countries, we felt a little embarrassed by our own impositions, which originated in times of ignorance and prejudice. (Hear, hear.) It was much to be regretted that no greater liberality existed on the subject in Spain. He and his right hon. friend had remonstrated very strongly, as strongly as the hon. member himself could wish. Nothing, indeed, was wanting on the part of his right hon. friend, in watching over the commerce of the country. Without recurring to the last resource, nothing further could be done, and that every wise statesman would deprecate. He could only lament that Spain was much less forward than other countries in adopting those truths which were now happily established, and which proved that the true interest of every country was to throw wide open its ports to the unrestrained commerce of other countries. The same unfortunate prejudice formerly restrained commerce between this country and the sister island, and between Britain and other countries.

Mr. Lyttelton could not refrain from expressing the satisfaction he felt at the general principles avowed in the noble lord's reply. Those principles, so just and so explicitly avowed, he hailed as propitious to the best interests of this country. He recollected too with pleasure, that the president of the board of trade had avowed similar principles, but lamented that the unfortunate impositions which still existed in this country prevented their free operation. He was anxious at the same time to correct a mistake into which the noble lord seemed to have fallen. He had deprecated the prohibition most distinctly, but the ground of complaint was the sudden changes that took place.

Mr. Robinson wished it to be recollected that cotton had not been in the first instance absolutely prohibited. Notice of its prohibition had been given early in the year 1815. It continued to be admitted for twelve months afterwards; and in consequence of remonstrances from our government, the prohibition was not acted upon till January 1818. He was not aware of any higher duty having been imposed on iron. As to notice, it should be recollected that in this country duties were carried into effect from the moment that the act which imposed them passed.

Mr. Lyttelton said, he might have been misinformed, but he had been told that, formerly, notice for six months had always been given, and now that the practice was departed from.

Dr. Phillimore asked the noble lord whether any indemnity was to be given out of this sum to those who had sustained loss by the illegal seizure of their slave-trading vessels.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that they, as well as our own sailors, who had made legal captures, were left to urge their claims according to the nature and merits of their cases. This sum was to be given to the Spanish government, in order to meet all claims that might devolve upon it in consequence of the abolition.

Lord Althorp said, he had no objection to the spirit and object of the treaty, but the laying out of so large a sum of money in pure bounty to the Spanish government appeared to him very liable to suspicion. We were evidently ambitious of being distinguished as the most charitable of all nations, but could we get credit for lavishing so large a sum out of mere charity, while our own country was in such distress?

Mr. Wilberforce was persuaded that the treaty had proceeded from feelings of the purest humanity, but, viewing it on the coldest principles of commercial calculation, he would say, that it was the wisest treaty that could have been framed. With a view to promote the commercial interests of the country, nothing could be more politically wise and provident than to possess the inhabitants of Africa with a taste for our manufactures. The provisions of the treaty respecting the abolition of the slave-trade were beneficial, not only for ourselves, but for all mankind. But, in a commercial view, it was of incalculable advantage to have the supply of that large tract of country, from the Senegal down to the Niger, an extent of more than 7,500 miles, with the necessaries and gratifications which our manufactures and our commerce afforded. One of the greatest difficulties in repressing the slave trade was, that we could not give the inhabitants of Africa their accustomed gratifications. To obtain these, they often had recourse to the abominable practices of this inhuman traffic. This evil would be in a great measure remedied by this treaty. It was, then, he repeated, of vast commercial benefit. Even already, with all the difficulties we had to encounter, our exports to Africa were greatly increased; under the operation of this treaty they would advance more and more, to the great profit of this country, and to the improvement and happiness of much injured Africa.

Mr. Calcraft believed great advantages might arise from the treaty, both as to the advancement of fair trade, and the abolition of the slave trade, but there were other points on which he wished to make an observation. 400,000*l.* was the sum to be voted for Spain; one-half of that sum, he understood, must be paid to our crews who had captured slave-ships, in order to make restitution of those ships. Was it only the remaining 200,000*l.* that were to be given to Spain? or were the claims of the captors to be referred to the Spanish government? Those persons, he apprehended, would in that case be left in a very awkward situation. If they had claims to the amount of 200,000*l.* their claims ought to be satisfied out of this money. To refer them to the Spanish government was doing them much injustice.

Lord Castlereagh said, that our government would not take any part in satisfying the claims alluded to. In 1783 there were several claims upon America, which, on account of the peculiar difficulties in settling them, our government reduced to a specific sum, and in consideration of receiving that sum from America, satisfied all the claimants. But in this case there was no necessity for such a measure.

Mr. J. P. Grant observed, that the claims in question were of different kinds. Some of them were yet to be made good. Others were already established, the ships having been condemned. With respect to the latter, he thought that a specific sum ought to have been stipulated for their satisfaction.

Mr. W. Smith said, it was very evident that other European nations, and France especially, had a common interest with ourselves in observing the conditions of this treaty. France had already abolished the trade as far as it respected her colonies, and, he was ready to admit, intended to prohibit it generally to all her subjects. It must, therefore, in his opinion, be the interest of France, in whatever light it was viewed, as well as the interest of this country, not to suffer a trade in slaves to be carried on with her colonies, under foreign colours, which she did not allow to her own subjects. He gave his entire approbation to the treaty.

Sir R. Heron did not consider the amount of money to be paid to Spain as any objection to the conditions of the treaty, although he could not help regretting that it was to fall into the coffers of the Spanish treasury at the moment when it might enable the government to effect the subjugation of its revolted colonies. He did not very clearly see why our policy now should so far differ from that of Queen Elizabeth, who had considered it important to the interests of this country to protect the rising liberties of the Netherlands. His firm belief was, that the slave-trade never would be effectually abolished, except with the abolition of slavery, and it was with regret he perceived that no steps were yet taken for bringing about a gradual emancipation.

The resolution was then read and agreed to, and the report ordered to be received to-morrow.—It was also ordered that the committee of supply should sit again on Friday.

SPIES AND INFORMERS.] Mr. Fazakerley rose pursuant to notice, to submit a motion, "That it be an instruction to the committee of secrecy now sitting, to inquire and report, whether any and what measures have been taken, to detect and bring to justice those who were described, in the report from the committee of secrecy presented to this house on the 20th day of June 1817, as persons who may, by their language and conduct, in some instances have had the effect of encouraging those designs which it was intended they should be only the instruments of detecting."—The hon. member said, he was fully sensible that he should require all the indulgence of the house, in the few observations which he should feel it necessary to offer to their attention, on a subject deeply connected with the recent trials for high treason. He wished it to be understood, that in what he intended to state, he desired as much as possible to avoid all personality. There were some persons whose names were reported as the most conspicuous members in the honourable confederacy to which he had just alluded, but he had not had any precise information on that subject to enable him to refer to any particular individual. He trusted, indeed, that neither the name of Oliver, nor the names of any other persons, would be considered as in any way connected with what he had to lay before the house; for he merely grounded his motion upon the report of the house itself, and he only desired to know whether any measures had been taken to detect and bring to justice the persons to whom the report alluded. He wished the house to recollect the course of proceeding that had been adopted by his Majesty's government. For several months, during which the suspension of the habeas corpus act existed, the powers with which it invested government were by no means unsparingly exercised. The gaols had been filled with prisoners, with persons apprehended perhaps on the information of spies: (Hear, hear) and the country had witnessed the novel spectacle of itinerant state prisoners, carried about from one place to another. (Hear, hear.) Not that alone—they had seen them loaded with irons, and placed in close confinement. There appeared a most remarkable contrast of the strongest and weakest measures arising out of the suspension. On the one side, the gaols were crowded with unfortunate persons, dragged from distant parts of the kingdom, and treated with the utmost severity; while, on the other, the most puerile steps were adopted, assuming at last the shape of a paternal admonition that they would continue in good behaviour. (A laugh). When so many persons were thus apprehended and imprisoned, was it right and fair that no measure should be taken to detect and prosecute those spies and informers, whose conduct a committee of that house had pronounced to be suspicious? Was this a fair and impartial administration of the criminal justice of the country? He might, however, observe, that he did not intend to express an opinion generally against the employment of spies. It was most unfortunate that such measures should ever be necessary; that public treason could sometimes be detected only by private treachery; that vice should be rendered subservient to the safety of the state: but it was most important, that whenever such measures were resorted to, they should be accompanied with the greatest caution. The utmost care should be employed in receiving the evidence of persons of this description. It appeared from the report of the committee, that some of the persons employed to detect the designs of others, had done more than their duty, and had fomented that which they were employed only to discover. If there were such persons, they ought to be detected and brought to justice. (Hear, hear.) It was the duty of the house to adopt this course of proceeding, and the country would not be satisfied without it. The hon. gentleman concluded by apologising for the inadequate manner in which he had brought the subject under consideration, and by moving the instruction to the committee which he had already described.

After the motion had been read from the chair,

Mr. Bathurst rose and said, he was sure that the house would require no apology from the hon. gentleman for the manner in which he had introduced his motion. Nothing could be more correct. But he could not pay the same compliment to the motion itself. It was to instruct the committee to adopt a precise line of conduct, which the powers they already possessed would enable them to adopt, if necessary. The hon. gentleman, however, by merely quoting in his motion the earlier part of a passage in the report of the committee of secrecy of last year, had given a bearing to it which it did not warrant. In the conclusion of that passage the report stated, that though in some instances there was reason to apprehend that encouragement had been given to designs which it was intended only to detect, "yet, that it was perfectly clear to the committee, that before any such encouragement could be given, the plan of a simultaneous insurrection in different parts of the country had been actually concerted, and its execution fully determined on." (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman had asked, whether any steps had been taken to detect and prosecute the persons to whom he supposed this passage in the report was applied? To this he (Mr. B.) answered, that no such steps had been taken, and for this plain reason, that no criminality was imputed to those persons; the simple meaning of the committee was, that individuals so communicating information must necessarily profess themselves to be the accomplices of those whose designs they were detecting, and might in that sense be said to encourage the designs themselves. The report of the committee, therefore, contained nothing which required any active measures of the nature alluded to by the hon. gentleman, nor had any farther grounds appeared for such measures. The hon. gentleman and the house would recollect, that the moment it was discovered that Oliver was employed by government, a number of persons immediately took the opportunity of saying that he was originally the concerter of the whole of the conspiracy which he was employed to detect, than which nothing could be more unfounded. He had not encouraged the designs in question any further than as the assertion that there were 70,000 men in London prepared to support them—an assertion which was necessary to the maintenance of his character as a deputy from the metropolis—might be said to encourage them. But whatever might be the amount of the encouragement thus afforded, nothing was better established than that the details of the conspiracy had been formed, and the particular insurrection postponed from time to time, long before the person alluded to had any concern with the business. Government knew of no impropriety in the manner in which Oliver had conducted himself. So far from instigating the conspiracy, his instructions were to give information not only to government, but to the magistrates in every place to which he went. His employment was originally entirely accidental. He was not engaged specifically to go among the disaffected. But, being among them, and having made communications to government, he (Mr. Bathurst) wished to ask, what would have been thought of ministers, had they declined to avail themselves of such communications from a person whose character was unimpeached, except by those whose designs he had exposed? The hon. gentleman had not exhibited the candour which pervaded the other parts of his speech, when he talked of the crowded state of the gaols. If it was true, as had been proved, that there was an organized plan of insurrection, surely the imprisonment of thirty or forty persons, thus disarming the disaffected, and depriving them of their leaders, could not be charged on government as an abuse of power.—The right hon. gentleman was proceeding to reply to what he conceived had fallen from the hon. mover, with reference to the trials at Derby, observing that there could be no doubt that the declaration made on the scaffold by Turner of Oliver's connexion with the transaction for which he suffered, was wholly unfounded and put into the unfortunate man's mouth by some designing individual, when

Mr. Fazakerley observed, that his remarks related to the trials in London.

Mr. Bathurst then proceeded to observe, that the report of the secret committee on which the hon. gentleman founded his motion had no relation to the trials in London, which had taken place long before that report, and respecting which, therefore, the committee could have nothing to communicate to the house. The information contained in that report related solely to the country; and, as he had already stated, there was nothing in the transactions which had taken place in the country that afforded the slightest reason for suspecting that any criminal encouragement had been given to the designs of the disaffected by the individual or individuals alluded to.

Lord Milton observed, that if by any chance hereafter, which he did not at present anticipate, he should be engaged in the honourable employment of a spy, he hoped it would be in the service of the right hon. gentleman. (A general laugh.) He could not, however, refrain from stating, that he thought the right hon. gentleman's course of argument calculated materially to mislead the house in their view of this question.

Mr. B. Bathurst spoke to order. He submitted, that it was unparliamentary for any member to impute to him an intention to mislead the house.

Lord Milton said, that he had merely stated, that the speech of the right hon. gentleman was calculated to mislead the house with respect to certain parts of the transaction. The right hon. gentleman had stated that the first connexion of Oliver with the disaffected was without the concurrence of Government.

Mr. Bathurst observed, that what he had stated, was, that Oliver was not sent by government, but that being found in connexion with the disaffected, he was desired to continue that connexion.

Lord Milton proceeded. He could not agree with the right hon. gentleman, that no injurious consequences arose from the employment of Oliver. The right hon. gentleman had said, that it was necessary that a person so employed should assume the character of an associate. But the character assumed by Oliver was one of no ordinary nature. It was a character, on the appearance of which a great deal was to turn, and a great deal did turn. He appeared as the representative of the disaffected in the metropolis. In a paragraph of the second report of the secret committee of the lords it was stated, that "the disaffected in the country appeared still to be looking to the metropolis with the hope of assistance and direction." By whom was that connexion, or the appearance of it, kept up? By a person sent down to the country by his Majesty's Secretary of State. (Hear, hear, hear.) By an individual, on whose appearance the magistrates knew that the disaffected in their neighbourhood relied for support. The predominating fear of the magistracy was, lest the presence of this person should, by supplying the fuel, nurse the existing heat into a flame. (Hear, hear.) He could never review this transaction, without feeling convinced that much mischief had resulted from the interposition of the individual in question. And this he said, without attaching the least truth to the declaration made by the unfortunate persons who suffered at Derby of their connexion with Oliver. He knew how easy it was to induce persons to declare what was false, for the purpose of lessening the imputation of their guilt. Without stating any positive opinion therefore on the subject, he was inclined to believe, that the assertion to which he had just alluded was destitute of foundation. In his conscience, however, he believed that the substance of the greatest part of the charges against Oliver was furnished by persons who were no more engaged in these transactions than he himself was.—Another part of the speech of the right hon. gentleman was calculated to mislead the house. He had stated, that no men were taken up in consequence of the information of Oliver. It was true that no persons were taken up on the information of Oliver, strictly speaking, but it was going too far to say that the arrest and subsequent confinement of many persons did not take place in consequence of the information furnished by Oliver: for, from his information, they were able to avail themselves of the testimony of others, so that in common sense the arrest was in consequence of such information. He was not now complaining of persons being so arrested and confined—a time would come when an inquiry into this subject must be made; but he wished much that the house should attend to one particular circumstance. It appeared that in some parts of the country—Nottingham for instance—the people were ready to assassinate Oliver. And what was the consequence? No rising ever took place at Nottingham. But in those parts of the country where the people bona fide believed in Oliver, these insurrections actually took place—for instance, in the west riding of Yorkshire, in Derbyshire—

Mr. Bathurst—"Not in Derbyshire."

Lord Milton—"Not in Derbyshire?" (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Bathurst—"Not in that part where any insurrection was."

Lord Milton—"I shall say no more on this subject. (Hear, hear.) I am astonished that the right hon. gentleman's recollection should not serve him from the hour of two to that of eight of the same day." (Hear, hear, hear.) To return to the course of his observations, he felt himself bound to say that the house would not discharge its duty to the country if it did not inquire minutely, not only into the conduct of the agents, but into that of their employers. (Hear, hear.) It was no very flattering compliment to the English character, to hear a system of espionage openly avowed; and it was the first time, he believed, that in that house the trade of an informer had been mentioned without the least expression of disesteem. (Hear.) He trusted this was not meant to lead to any recognition of such persons or such employment. His Majesty's ministers had acted imprudently for themselves, in deciding upon the demand of so extraordinary a trust from parliament; but at the same time he believed there were subsidiary motives which operated on their conduct, and that they had not been sorry to find themselves armed, for a season, with unlimited authority. He found that he himself now stood, as it were, singly on the committee, and he hoped that his conduct there would be actuated by nothing but an imperious sense of duty. (Hear, hear.) It would certainly be a cause of gratitude to him, if the house, by agreeing to the present motion, would alleviate that burden which he now felt to press upon him as a member of the committee. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. C. Grant, jun. said, that the only question which the house had to determine was, whether upon the prima facie shewing of the hon. gentleman on the other side, a ground was laid for any special instruction to the committee. Such a proceeding was wholly unprecedented, except in the case of some peculiar combination of circumstances. Had, then, any extraordinary case been made out, to warrant the adoption of a special proceeding of this nature? He begged leave to say, that there was no evidence of any instigation to mischievous purposes beyond mere words. (Hear.) Now what he should contend was, that something more was necessary to establish such a case as that upon which the motion ought to be founded. To come to another point—the trials at Derby—it had always struck him as singular, if the learned counsel for the prisoners could have proved that the insurrection had been instigated by the emissaries of government, that they did not prove it. The person, Oliver, was present on the spot; he might have been subpœnaed: they could have introduced him to the court: this was, indeed, the only ground on which the case of their clients could have stood; and their experience and duty would have led them to bring him forward, if his evidence would have been of any service to them. (Hear.) If Oliver had been put into the box, and if, upon his examination, these facts had been established, would the jury have found the prisoners guilty? And if they had returned a verdict of guilty, would they not have recommended them to mercy? If that learned counsel who had so greatly distinguished himself on those trials (Mr. Denman) did not think proper to bring Oliver into court, it was sufficient proof to him (Mr. Grant) that that person had not been concerned in exciting the disturbances for which the prisoners were then upon their trial. (Hear.) With respect to this committee, his argument was—that unless a case of delinquency was first made out, the house was not called upon to accede to the motion of the hon. member; and he must, therefore, express his dissent from giving any instruction to the committee on this subject.

Mr. Bennet said, the house must not think that the country could look to the secret committee with any expectation of an impartial investigation, when they considered who the members of that committee were—who were the persons to be tried in it—who were to furnish the evidence. Ministers themselves named the committee—they were the persons on trial, and they would produce the evidence. He should vote for the motion of his hon. friend, because he thought that a case for inquiry could be established, and which he should now endeavour to establish; and if he succeeded, and the house should then refuse the motion, it would satisfy the country that the appointment of this committee was one of the grossest juggles that had ever been attempted to be played off on any people. In the last session of parliament, his Majesty's government had thought proper to draw up a bill of indictment against the people of England: two committees were named by ministers, who, on evidence furnished by these ministers, pronounced the people to be disaffected to the constitution. The case of the crown had thus been heard; but, up to this moment, the case of the people had not been heard. One would have thought, then, that when the present committee was appointed, the case of the people would have been considered, and the case of the crown shut out. (Hear, hear.) The people of England had been visited by one of the greatest plagues with which a people could be afflicted—that government, which ought to have been their protector, had employed persons to excite them to acts of violence. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst) who seemed to be the common voucher for the character of all the spies and informers in the employ of government, (a laugh) had told the house, that Oliver was a person of unsullied character. It appeared to him, however, that the right hon. gentleman had himself furnished the best argument against the employment of spies; for he had said, that the natural consequence of employing such persons was, that they committed acts which furnished an accusation against them of fomenting the disturbances they were sent to prevent. He begged to remind the house of the terrible case which was produced by his hon. friend near him (Mr. Philips), of the mischief caused by those wretched fiends in human shape, the spies employed in Manchester and its neighbourhood. He did not mean at present to give any general opinion on the employment of spies: it was a nice point, and he would not then discuss it; but this he knew—they were edge tools, and required a very cautious handling. He knew, that persons who had been employed as spies in this country had done acts which he could not think of without shame, nor mention without indignation. Ever since 1812, Lancashire, and the district connected with it, had been traversed by hosts of spies. The magistrates had, by their system of espionage, thrown the whole of that part of the country into the greatest alarm. While the poor people engaged in the manufactories there, after working 15 hours a day, could only obtain for the support of themselves and families six or seven shillings a week, these spies were earning, by the more profitable employment of selling the blood of the people, 10*s.* 12*s.* and 15*s.* a week. He held then in his hand a pamphlet published by Francis Raynes, who was, in 1811 and 1812, a captain in the Stirlingshire militia, and who, not having received of the government what he called his fair claims for having been employed in the carrying on of the spy-system, had made public the history of his services. And here he would appeal to the hon. member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce) whose opinion he wished to have on this subject. This man, this officer in the army, was selected to get information relative to the views and movements of the Luddites, and he stated, in his pamphlet, that, in obedience to the instructions he had received, he employed soldiers to work themselves into an acquaintance with those deluded people—in fact, to be twisted in (as it was technically called) members of their society, and to take an oath of fidelity, for the express purpose of breaking the oath, and betraying those who had confided in them. (Hear, hear, hear.) Now he (Mr. Bennet) did not wish to set himself up for a great moralist, nor to make professions of superior sanctity; but he must say, that he should think himself guilty of the greatest baseness, if he were to lend his countenance to such infamous transactions. And to support what? The law—by the breach of every law human and divine. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst) had given a sort of challenge respecting the character and conduct of the persons who had been employed in the recent transactions. He was prepared to meet that challenge: the house should be witness between them; and when they had heard the case, they would not dare to refuse giving instructions to the committee:—he said that they would not dare to refuse, because he knew that they felt the importance of maintaining their characters, and supporting their reputation, in the minds of the people. In the first place, then, with respect to Castle—that infamous man—who was believed by the judges, by the right hon. gentleman, and by the Attorney and Solicitor-General, but who, thank God, was not believed by an English jury. (Hear, hear.) This favourite witness of the government—this Castle—this bully of a brothel (hear, hear)—this wretch who had been tried for uttering forged notes, (hear)—this man, who had been a spy before, under the transport-office—this worthless creature, was clothed by the police magistrates at a considerable expense, that he might come into court like a gentleman, and give evidence against persons (Watson, Preston, Hooper, and Thistlewood) who, though not guilty of high treason, had certainly committed acts for which they might have been punished, if tried for a minor offence. Such was the character of one of the men whom the right hon. gentleman had taken under his protection, and honoured with his praise. (Hear, hear.) In regard to another, Oliver—that man of exemplary morals, that man for whose character the right hon. gentleman had so stoutly vouched—he could tell him, that Oliver began his career by an act which not unfrequently marks the outset of persons who rise by degrees to the summit of crime:—he began by committing that fraud on women which Mr. Castle had also committed:—like Mr. Castle he had been guilty of bigamy. (Hear, hear, hear.) There were other parts of his character equally bad: and this he should be ready to prove, whenever the right hon. gentleman, or his colleagues, should choose to put Mr. Oliver into the box as a witness. At present he would merely observe, that he could produce sufficient evidence to shew, that Oliver, so far from being a man of unsullied moral character, owed to the mercy of others—to the mercy of a benefactor whom he had basely and wickedly injured—the miserable and infamous life he now held. (Loud cries of hear!)—He had taken great pains to ascertain the truth of the circumstances to which he had alluded, and had every reason to believe that the statement was perfectly correct. Such, then, was the character of another of those persons whom his Majesty's ministers had employed, first to excite, and then to betray, the people.—And now, with respect to the transactions in which the last-mentioned person had been engaged. Oliver, he believed, was first introduced to a small society in London by a Mr. Pendrill. On the 24th of April, he departed from London with a person of the name of Mitchell, to see Mr. Pendrill at Liverpool, who was on his way to America. On reaching Birmingham, Oliver was introduced to a Mr. Jones, of that town, by Mitchell, with whom Mr. Jones had been acquainted many years, and of whom he had a very high opinion. He invited a few of his friends, who were also friends of parliamentary reform, to spend the evening at his house with the London delegate. Four persons answered the invitation. (And here he would tell the right hon. gentleman, that witnesses could be produced to all the particulars which he might state, who were ready to come forward to be examined, if the house should consent to an inquiry.) The conversation turned generally on politics. Mr. Oliver stated, that after he had seen his friend Pendrill safe on board, he should immediately enter on the business for which he was delegated from London—that he was going to set out on a sort of tour through Derby, Leeds, Sheffield, Wakefield, Manchester, and other manufacturing places in the north; that the great object of his tour was to get petitions for reform, signed by tens throughout England. He said, that he should endeavour to get persons from the different towns through which he passed to meet him at Wakefield to take the subject into consideration. He very much urged the individuals present to send a person to meet him there, as a delegate from Birmingham. At this proposal they only laughed. They told him of the absurdity of five individuals taking upon themselves to delegate a person from so large a town as Birmingham. He smiled at the objection, and observed to them, "you are very green in the country yet." (Hear, hear.) A few days after his departure, he sent a letter to Mr. Jones, at Birmingham, informing him that a meeting was to be held at Wakefield, on the 5th of May; and requesting that some person might be sent from Birmingham to attend it. Oliver then went to Leeds, Manchester, and Sheffield, and at all those places he called on the most respectable persons, whom he stimulated to attend these meetings. He represented himself as a man who had been long actively employed in important transactions—as concerned in the business of 1792, as concerned with Despard, as having facilitated the escape of Thistlewood and young Watson, and as having collected money for them. (Hear, hear.) He stimulated them to enter into engagements to send delegates. To Wakefield he went by himself—his companion had been arrested. He (Mr. Bennet) had in his possession a narrative, drawn up by two persons, of what had taken place there—and he had had opportunities of ascertaining the truth of the most minute particulars. On the arrival of the delegate from Birmingham, he called on Oliver at his inn, and found him in the parlour alone. Oliver expressed great grief at the arrest of Mitchell, and after deploring for some time the loss which the cause would sustain through it, he looked at his watch, and observed, that it was time to attend the meeting. As they were walking towards the place appointed, Oliver said, it was his firm conviction, that their new plan of petitioning would have no effect on their oppressors, and that nothing short of physical force would do any good. (Hear, hear, hear.) He afterwards asked this person, should there be any necessity, do you think that all who attended a meeting at Birmingham would be ready to fight for their liberties? The delegate was astonished at the question, and observed, it was a subject on which he had never entertained a thought, nor did he know of any person in Birmingham who had any such ideas. Oliver told him, it was highly necessary that he should give as good an account as he possibly could from Birmingham, to strengthen and keep up the spirits of those who should attend the meeting. The delegate answered, he could only state facts, he should be sorry to deceive any one. On entering the place of meeting, he was surprised to see only a few poor creatures, who appeared to be in want of the common necessaries of life. This meeting of delegates on the 5th of May, was composed of ten persons: one from Birmingham, one from London (which was Oliver), two from Huddersfield, one from Halifax, one from Sheffield, one from Leeds, two from Wakefield, and one from Manchester. Oliver was called to the chair, but declined; the delegate from Birmingham was then selected, and he took the chair. Oliver opened the proceedings of the day, by observing that the distressed condition of the people was unparalleled at any former period, and that the voice of the people was entirely disregarded by parliament. He said, that it was useless to petition any more—that London was looking to the country—that they must now recur to force—to physical force (hear, hear), and for that purpose it was necessary to ascertain what men, and what number of arms, they could obtain. He then pulled out a number of cards from his pocket, and proposed that each person should write on a card the greatest number that each town could raise, if called upon; and that each person should sign the card with his own name. This proposal gave general dissatisfaction, upon which Oliver said, it was highly necessary that the body in London from which he was delegated, should have as correct a report as possible of the force that could be collected in the country; but as they still objected, he said, "O, never mind, I shall do it myself." He then asked what each place could raise if called upon, and he wrote down the number on a piece of paper. "[illegible]," said the hon. member, "I believe in my conscience to be the foundation of that passage in the report of the secret committee, in which it is stated, that lists had been furnished of the number of men and arms that would be provided by the several places, and I believe that Oliver himself furnished those lists." (Hear, hear.) He had in his possession a letter, in which Oliver gave a narrative of what passed at that meeting: he said, "we had a most excellent meeting—we had that excellent fellow, Bacon, there." He knew that Oliver had visited Mitchell three times in Coldbath-fields prison. He proposed to Mitchell that he should write to his friends in the north, entreating them to make an appeal to arms: Mitchell said, "I beg you will quit my presence." How long Oliver stayed in London he did not know; but he knew, notwithstanding what the right hon. gentleman had said, that he made his appearance at Derby and Nottingham. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bathurst said, he had never denied that Oliver was at Nottingham. With respect to Derby, he certainly was not on the spot where the insurrection took place.

Mr. Bennet said, he might not be in the particular barn: the right hon. gentleman would understand what he meant by that expression. On the 26th of May, Oliver went to Derby—there a person (whose name he should not mention), saw him. On that day, the 26th of May, 1817, one James Birken came to this person and told him, that a gentleman, who was sent to the country by a committee of gentlemen in London, had arrived at Derby, to ascertain the sentiments of the people there respecting parliamentary reform. This person went to the Talbot Inn, and saw the gentleman from London, who said his name was Oliver, and who received him politely. Soon after a person present observed, that the town was confused with the cavalry, and other soldiers, ordered out in consequence of some expected disturbance.—Oliver said it would be another grand hoax on the government, and when the time arrived, they would be asleep. A conversation then ensued respecting parliamentary reform, and the distressed state of the country. Oliver said, "all legal means have been tried to no purpose, and the London people never mean to petition any more." (Hear, hear.) Oliver asked for a person who had been talked of the night before. It was replied, that it was not certain that he would come. He, however, came in. After some observations on Sir Francis Burdett's motion for reform, Oliver said, it was evident that petitioning parliament was of no use. He was then asked, if he considered reform to be altogether impracticable? To this he said no, not in London, as there were other means to be tried; in London they were more active than ever to obtain their rights. Oliver was then asked, in what way they meant to proceed? He answered, "they mean to try those means they have left, namely, physical force; and they are only waiting the determination of their friends in the country." He was told that the country would not do any thing. "In that," said Oliver, "you are mistaken; half the country is in an organized state, particularly Birmingham, Sheffield, Leeds, and most of the manufacturing districts." (Hear, hear.) He added, "the people about Leeds are all armed, and are with difficulty kept down, until the appointed time." He was then told that Derby was a very loyal place, and that he must not expect any thing of the kind there. He said, "it is of little consequence, but it would be better if something could be done: if the country will come forward and stand with knobbed sticks in their hands, the business will be done in London, where 60 or 70,000 armed men will be raised in an hour or two's notice." He then said, "I have been at several meetings in Yorkshire, and have there engaged a press for the printing of the proclamations, which are to be posted up in every conspicuous place in the kingdom. Mr. Wooler, the publisher of The Black Dwarf, who is a hearty fellow, has undertaken to draw them up, and I am now going round the country to strengthen the hands of the people in the cause. I am for Nottingham to-day, for Sheffield to-morrow, for Leeds on Wednesday, for Manchester on Thursday, and, if possible, I mean to go to Liverpool the day after, as they are not quite so forward there as I could wish. But, I must be back to Birmingham on Sunday next. They are forward there, and have plenty of arms. But, said he, you are not deficient in arms in Derby, you have a depôt there." He was told yes; but that the arms were sent to Weedon. Oliver said, "the Wolverhampton men would knock Weedon over." One of the party observed, "I have a brother there who is very ill." Oliver inquiring what he was, was told a bricklayer. Oliver asked if the man had ever been there? The man answered, "No, Sir, it is a place I should like to go to, and have wished it for some time, but poverty has prevented me." Oliver then asked him if he would go over, "as it would be serviceable to the Wolverhampton men? For, said he, as you have a brother there, and are a bricklayer, you would not be suspected." The man answered, "that he could not raise five shillings in the world, and that, besides, his brother was averse to every thing of the kind, and he dared not introduce any thing of the sort to him." "Well," said Oliver, "you need not say any thing to him about it; you can get him to go round the place with you, and make your own observations, unknown to him. If you will go, you must go and come back by Birmingham; and I will give you a letter to a gentleman who will give you plenty of money." A letter to this purpose was written, which was destroyed by the person, who saw several of his neighbours taken up; but it would be sworn to by the person who received it, and others who had seen it. Could it be doubted, that if any man had gone to Weedon, in pursuance of the plan of Oliver, he would have incurred the guilt of high treason? Yet this person, it was said, did not stimulate to illegal acts! This person did not stimulate the people at Derby, Nottingham, Liverpool, Leeds, and Birmingham! From this place Oliver went to Nottingham; on the same day, according to his own previous declaration; and there he appeared as the London delegate. He told them that Yorkshire was all in arms—and on that day he saw Brandreth. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member said, he had an affidavit in his possession as to that fact.

Mr. Bathurst.—"What is the name of the deponent?"

Mr. Bennet.—"I shall not give any names; but, if the house will allow me, I will produce the witness himself."—(Hear, hear.)—Besides, he held in his hand the statement of Brandreth, made in confidence to his solicitor before the trial (hear), and though it contained a complete confession of all the illegal acts which Brandreth had committed, it shewed also, most clearly, by what he had been stimulated to their perpetration.—The affidavit he held in his hand stated, that the deponent became acquainted with Oliver at the house of one Stevens, an important person among the few who were concerned in those disgraceful transactions; that it was agreed a meeting should take place at the Three Salmons public-house; that Oliver there met Brandreth, who appeared to listen to him with the most earnest attention. Oliver there said, that Mr. Wooler had printed 20,000 proclamations; that the people in London wondered what the Nottingham men were about; that the people in Yorkshire and Lancashire were in such a state that they hardly could be kept down any longer; that all London was in a ferment, and eager to join with friends in the country, and that the people there had sent him into the country to see in what state things really were. He then requested some persons to explore Weedon barracks, in which, he said, there were great quantities of arms and ammunition., The hon. gentleman then proceeded to read the following statement made by Brandreth to his solicitor: "That he attended a meeting at Nottingham, at the sign of the Three Salmons, at which several persons met, and, amongst the rest, Oliver. That this meeting was on Whitsun Monday, or Monday after; that he told the persons assembled, that he had been round the circuit, at Manchester and Yorkshire, and was then going to London by Birmingham: that he stated, that every person was perfectly ready to rise, and that he could raise 70,000 men in London; that the people in London would not be satisfied unless Nottingham was perfectly secured; for it was the rallying point for Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire and Leicestershire; and that, if that was not secured, the passage over the Trent would be perfectly stopped for the northern forces; that they must proceed forward to London as soon as they could raise sufficient men against the loyalists. Nottingham was to be continually supported by northern forces in succession." So far Brandreth's statement.—Oliver, however, was not satisfied with this. He returned to Nottingham on the 6th of June, and being pressed to say what part he would take in any active steps, replied, that he would with pleasure come there to raise the standard himself; but, said he, "I am obliged to be absent to support our friends in Yorkshire, who are now in arms, eager for a cause which you are so slack in supporting."—On the 8th of June, in order to stimulate them still more, he said the day was fixed for a general rising.—But to conclude this statement of Oliver's journies.—On the authority of the same witness, he could state that Oliver returned to Birmingham. There he put forth his usual assertions: "Oliver told them that he had paid several visits to Mr. Wooler, that he was a hearty good fellow, and that nothing could daunt his intrepid spirit; that it was a terrible misfortune he was in prison, for he would have assisted the cause wonderfully; that he would have printed some thousands of proclamations for distribution in every large town, to rouse the people into action! That the people in the north of England were already ripe for the onset against their oppressors, and that they could scarcely be kept down from rising before the appointed day; that vast bodies of men were ready to pour down from Scotland, who would overwhelm every thing before them; and that the day of retribution to our most unfeeling tyrants was near at hand; that Sir Francis Burdett, Major Cartwright, and many others, whose names it would not be proper to disclose, were well acquainted with the whole of these things. That several officers of distinction would take any post to which they might be appointed by the people, the disclosure of whose names, however, he told them, would be very improper, but that they might depend upon it, that all that he had told them was very true." Mr. Bennet here begged the house to bear in mind the assumed authority which Oliver requested Mr. Jones to take upon him—he said assumed, though the first report of the secret committee spoke of assumed or delegated authority, as if they were the same thing, with a view to impress the house that extensive plans of co-operation by delegates had been entered into; but in this view of the subject, assumed authority was very different from delegated: if delegated, the conspiracy might be dangerous, but if assumed, it was most contemptible. In order to involve more in this plot, and fill his net completely, Oliver not only sent letters, but his coadjutor Crabtree, to Birmingham, to attend the meeting, and stimulate the people by every means in his power; but he was there told that his mischievous plan was known, and his tricks all discovered, and that they would have no communication whatever with him.—Having thus laid before the house but a very small part of the case he had in his hand, the hon. member begged to draw their attention to another most material fact: the day that Oliver ceased his employment as missionary of government, to foment disturbances, that very day was public tranquillity perfectly restored. (Loud shouts of hear.) That there had been disturbances was well known; and it was easy for those who enjoyed in tranquillity every comfort that opulence could bestow, who were secure in their possessions, their occupations, and lives, to reprobate in strong terms any insubordination, the causes of which they very imperfectly understood; they could but little understand the feelings of a man who beheld his wife and children starving, and felt himself almost of necessity linked to any companions who could hold out a hope, however dangerous and precarious, of saving himself from the pit of perdition that yawned before him and his family. None could deny that such distress had but too extensively existed, and that some factious men had taken advantage of a season of misery to raise hopes of a dangerous nature in the minds of these deluded victims; but had they been suffered to carry their combinations into execution, they were of so loose and undefined a character, that no apprehensions could have been entertained from schemes so ignorant and so absurd. That there was discontent, no man could deny; but it was loose, irregular, undefined; it was Oliver who linked the whole together, who joined the north to the south, and fed the hopes of the discontented in one district, by the assurance of the same spirit existing through all parts of the kingdom. With Oliver to stimulate and direct them, the business took quite another turn; and while he was setting one town and one county against another, proclaiming to one district that its neighbour was ready, and upbraiding them with timidity and delay, the consequence was almost unavoidable, that these miserable wretches would, if possible, have resorted to that physical force, so strenuously recommended to them by the missionaries of government. He would put this question to the house—and he should consider it no answer to be told that there were persons ready to enter into any schemes of violence.—Mr. Colquhoun, in his book on the police of the metropolis, had stated, at a very random guess, that there were from 20 to 40,000 persons, who rose every morning in London, without hopes of obtaining any regular employment, or of securing a bed for the ensuing night, and who, of course, were always ready for any mischief that might offer. What should we say to a government that would send missionaries among such a population as this, for the purpose of exciting discontent, and telling them that now was the time to rise; now, the time to rifle the pockets of the rich; now, to satisfy themselves with rapine and plunder? That very thing had government done towards the distress arising out of want in the northern and midland counties. (Loud cries of hear.) Before he sat down, he wished to say a word as to an argument he had been sorry to hear urged as a proof of Oliver's absence in these transactions; the argument urging the use he might have been of to the prisoners as a witness for them, if all these facts were true. "If Oliver had any such concern in these transactions, why," said the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Grant, junr.), "did he remain concealed? he was on the spot, and might have been called." It was true, he was on the spot, ready to purchase the blood-money of Brandreth, and the other accused person, Bacon, for Castle with whom he had held correspondence. (Hear, hear.) But the reason he was not called was, that he would have been too dangerous a witness for the prisoners; he would have proved, not that they were not guilty of treason, but that they had been seduced into it; and that would have furnished no defence, that would only have forfeited their blood with greater certainty to the avarice of government missionaries. (Hear.) The judge himself must have stopped such evidence, and have told the prisoners that they only confessed their guilt by calling it. Just as, in the last century, it was held to be no excuse to the tenants of the Earl of Derwentwater, that they had been led into rebellion in obedience to their lord. An argument thus urged against the prisoners was a disgrace—he would call it so again, a disgrace—(loud cries of hear), to the justice of the country. But he could tell the house why the trials took that course. If Bacon had been tried first, Oliver would have been a most important witness. He (Mr. Bennet) knew (hear, hear), that Bacon's trial would have had a most important effect on those of the other prisoners, and that was the reason why that master traitor had been kept back altogether. He was sorry to have detained the house so long on this subject, but he believed he had exaggerated nothing, and treated the matter with no more asperity than it called for. It was the bounden duty of the house, to England, and the people at large, to save them from a system, the natural consequences of which he had now clearly shewn. He was prepared to establish the facts he had stated on the evidence of oaths, and of the most credible witnesses—(hear, hear),—he repeated, most credible witnesses, not such witnesses as Castle, but credible, competent, witnesses. He challenged the hon. and learned gentleman to shew that they were not credible. (Shouts of hear.) It might be very well for the noble lord to cry hear, hear, and deny the motion in that house; it might do there, but it would not do with the country; before the country they stood, and a verdict would be given, such as the enormity of the case deserved.

Mr. Wilberforce said, that speaking as a member of the secret committee, it might be a sufficient argument against his assenting to the proposed motion, that he was not disposed to accept any reference from gentlemen, who at the same time had frankly avowed that they entertained so bad an opinion of the committee altogether, as to repose no confidence whatever in any report which might proceed from it.—But to assign a more serious reason why, as a member of the house, he should not approve of the motion, he would state, that it was founded altogether on a false or rather a mistaken assumption. The committee of the last session were supposed to have declared as their opinion, that to a considerable degree, the spies had contributed to excite the disturbances which had existed. He declared for one, that this was not his meaning: nor was it, he verily believed, the meaning of a great majority of the committee. It had been proved, that before Oliver went into the country, a simultaneous insurrection had been agreed on. But the committee wished to be on the safe side, and taking into account the species of influence which it was the general tendency of the employment of persons of this description to exercise, thought fit to insert the paragraph in question, to intimate, that those persons might have produced a bad effect. The committee, however, had no specific information that any bad effect had actually been produced by the person alluded to. He did not mean to say, that nothing in these disturbances was attributable to Oliver; but if what had just been stated by the hon. member to that effect, was considered as having some weight, it was also to be received with some distrust, as having been received by him from a doubtful source. He remembered, when an account was formerly given of a conversation between Lord Malmesbury and Monsieur de la Croix, very much in favour of Lord Malmesbury, that a great ornament of that house, Mr. Fox, had said, "I should like to hear Monsieur de la Croix's account of that conversation:" in like manner, in reply to the account of the hon. gentleman's witness, he should wish to hear Mr. Oliver's story. (Loud cries of hear from the opposition benches.)—He did not mean in the committee, but in some other more proper way, to ascertain the truth of what had been alleged against him. If any man could be proved to have acted the part which that man was represented to have done, he could and ought to be prosecuted, and it would be a service to the country to bring him to justice. (Hear, hear.) The character of such persons was always indifferent: and it was necessary to entertain suspicions of a man, who would volunteer, by fraud and treachery, to discover the designs of other people. It was, therefore, not without good reason, that the committee had intimated that some suspicions might naturally attach on the language and conduct of men of this description. But he was astonished, that there were so many men of just and honourable feelings, who did not condemn the employment of spies, who even seemed to admit them to be necessary in certain cases. (Hear, hear.) One and another hon. member had said, "that he would not decide whether spies should or should not be employed." But, for his own part, he declared, he thought it somewhat inconsistent, that persons who did not disapprove of the employment of such men altogether, should vent their whole indignation on them, if they exceeded their instructions in the smallest degree.—"Let us be candid," said the hon. gentleman, "these are crooked paths, to be abstained from altogether. I think it would be a service to the country, and to the government, if the employment of spies could be entirely put an end to; but they are inconsistent who admit them to be allowable instruments, and then are indignant if such persons happen a little to exceed their instructions. Certainly the employment of such engines is not allowable in a religious view. This is not the way to render agreeable service to the God of truth. (Hear.) It is equally repugnant to any notions of honour or morality; and, on the mere ground of political expediency, the objections to it are almost as strong. Any country must suffer ten times more by the employment, than by the want of spies, though there may be some occasions on which a partial and temporary benefit may seem to be derived from the use of such instruments. Government may be able to detect some treasons which would otherwise escape punishment; but that advantage is much more than counterbalanced by the evils that ensue. When I consider all the mistrust that such a system must occasion, even to the disturbance of domestic peace and confidence; when I consider the temptations to false information of every description; the misconstructions that may be put on the most innocent actions, and the suspicions and disaffection that must be excited against the government; I think that the general confusion of such a system must, in the long run, impede much more than further the cause of good order. (Hear, hear,) One of the greatest evils arising from the employment of such persons is, that, after all, it is impossible to get at the truth of their proceedings. As an instance, I never heard two stories more different than that which I have heard to-night, and what I heard in the committee. Before the committee, Oliver, so far from being one of those extraordinary villains who 'snatch a grace beyond the reach of art,' was described as being too little of a rascal for his profession; and on that account, it was said, he was always open to detection. I confess, therefore, that I condemn altogether the use of such instruments: they create a false sympathy with persons who are criminal, and cause men to cease to look with horror on any attempts against the security of the state. (Hear, hear.) Notwithstanding all that has been said by the disaffected or the discontented; notwithstanding the real sufferings which were felt in the late season of distress, and the unequivocal breaches of the law that took place, I may safely affirm, that there never was, in any age or country, a greater share of real liberty enjoyed; there never was a more prosperous, a more moral, or a happier nation; but by the use of such agents, the people, instead of being proud of their constitution, and clinging to the blessings which they possess under it; instead of feeling an anxiety to preserve them, and a detestation of those crimes which tend to undermine them, will have their principles perverted, and their sympathies turned in favour of their worst enemies. This I regard as most injurious to the country.—Let the practice not be defended on the ground that it is necessary for the preservation of the public peace. No! no! the British empire does not stand in need of such assistance to maintain its security; it disclaims all connection with such allies. Our liberties, our rights, and our tranquillity, stand on the principles of law and the constitution, and despise the aid or the countenance of such base associates."—(Loud cries of hear, from the opposition.)—He must again say, however, that with the sentiments he entertained of the persons alluded to in the motion, he was against the motion itself. (Hear, hear, and murmurs.) He was against the motion, because it involved an inquiry that could not well be carried on in the committee, and for which the committee was not the proper place; and he must say, that he, for one, would not take a seat in a committee to which such an inquiry should be referred. Let any unprejudiced man consider what would be the state of a committee of the House of Commons endeavouring to ascertain the truth amid the conflicting statements of two opposite sets of witnesses, of whom the one would naturally be disposed to deny their ever having tempted into the commission of crimes any persons whose machinations they were employed to discover, while the other would be endeavouring to establish their own innocence, by imputing all their crimes to the wicked artifices of the spies and informers. In the meanwhile, all the parties, not being upon oath, would know that they might give free course to their imagination, without dread of the consequences. The inquiry also would be endless in its extent, for the committee would have to investigate the conversation and conduct and characters of the various suspected persons, and of those employed in counteracting them, in all the various places in which such agents of the police had been employed.—But again he declared, he was ready to have the business investigated by a competent tribunal.—Surely, if any person had acted in the way imputed to Oliver, it was a serious crime; and if his hon. friend behind him, would declare that he had received the account of Oliver's misconduct from any authority on the correctness of which he could at all depend, he himself would willingly support a motion for prosecuting him. This would bring the matter to some surer test.—But an inquiry into such a case by the House of Commons, where you set out with a well-grounded suspicion of the veracity of all the parties concerned, would prove as unsatisfactory in its result, as it would be discouraging in its commencement.

The Solicitor-General said, he did not think it required much reasoning to shew, that the motion ought not to be entertained. It was grounded solely and exclusively on a passage in the report of the secret committee, which could not bear the construction that had been put upon it. That passage attached no criminality to the persons alluded to, which could be made the subject of a criminal prosecution. If a design had previously been formed, which it was determined to carry into execution, and if persons who were sent to detect it had only taken the means of ascertaining it by seeming to join in the proceedings, it could not be made the subject of a criminal charge. If these persons had themselves formed the plan, and endeavoured to procure others to sanction and to execute it, the case would have been altered, and the present motion for their prosecution would have been just and proper. No such criminality was here imputed; and the hon. member (Mr. Bennet), as if aware of the fact, had filled his speech with other topics, and introduced many statements both extraneous and unauthorized. The hon. member had not given the names of the individuals from whom he derived that information on which he seemed so implicitly to rely; but he (the Solicitor-General) suspected the sources, and one name (that of Mitchell) introduced inadvertently into his statement, gave him almost a certain clue to the rest. (Hear, hear.) That person had been suspected of high treason, and had been taken up and imprisoned on the charge; and was he therefore to be thought a proper witness in implicating the character of those who might be employed to detect his designs, or in making charges against the government who prevented him from carrying them into execution? (Hear, hear.) Then there was Pendrill who had fled to America, and Stephen who was likewise in America, who might have furnished the facts of the statement which the house had heard. (Hear, hear.)—Mitchell had been charged with high treason. (Hear, hear, from the opposition benches.) He would ask the hon. gentlemen opposite, who cheered this statement, if a charge of treason increased the credibility of the person who furnished the narrative against his prosecutors.—(Hear, hear, from the opposition benches.) He knew that now-a-days persons who had been brought before the courts of law on the gravest charges, had been considered as persecuted individuals; that they had been held up as proper objects for public bounty (hear, hear, hear, from both sides of the house); that they had been looked upon as martyrs in the cause of liberty; and that that odium which ought to have been directed against those who had violated the law, and were endeavouring to destroy the moral principles, or to disturb the general tranquillity of the country, had been attempted to be turned against those who had exerted themselves to preserve them, as if they, and not the country, had been the sufferers, and ought to receive redress. (Hear, hear.) Individuals who by their conduct had made themselves amenable to the law, thought that by raising a cry against Oliver and the spies, they could shift the criminality from themselves, and impute the whole to a conspiracy of the government. (Hear, hear.) They, poor innocent souls, never harboured a design to disturb the public peace, or to commit treason; they were merely deluded by the artifice of government spies, and had never hatched any plots themselves; the whole was the fabrication of their tempters; and yet this came from the very person, Mitchell, who, by his own admission, went with Oliver from London, with the intention of agitating the country. But on the scene he did nothing—Oliver was the sole agent—Oliver organized the plans—Oliver arranged all the movements of the disaffected—he inspired the disturbed districts with the design of overturning the government, and arming for the purpose of general confusion. (Hear, hear.) The manner in which the hon. gentleman alluded to the administration of justice, and the conduct of his learned and hon. friend, the Attorney-General, seemed calculated to countenance such representations, and to prejudice the minds of the public against the prosecution of the violators of the law. He had mentioned the name of Castle—a witness that was called on the late trials for high treason in Westminster, as the Attorney-General's witness; whereas he must have known that he was the witness of the crown and the country. (Hear, from the opposition benches.) Did not his hon. and learned friend mention to the jury the character of this person—did he not tell them not to believe one word of his testimony, unless it was confirmed by other witnesses? Castle had been called a spy; but the hon. gentleman must have known, if he had read the trial, that this person had never been employed in that capacity by government, and not one syllable of his testimony was known to his hon. and learned friend till long after the transactions to which it referred. It was never even hinted on the trial that he was a spy; he appeared there in the character of a witness, and was introduced as an accomplice who had turned evidence. He did not think, therefore, that those charges were fair, or they must have been known, upon the slightest consideration, to have been unfounded. Then the hon. gentleman went to the trials at Derby, and he (the Solicitor-General) would beg of him to be more guarded in his statements, and not advance charges which might prejudice the public mind without a shadow of foundation. He had said that his hon. friend had brought Oliver to that place, and had him ready to produce on the trial, to sell the blood of the prisoners. The hon. gentleman, upon the slightest examination, might have learned, that Oliver could not have been produced as a witness by his hon. and learned friend, as he was not in the list of witnesses given to the prisoners. Yet, with such a fact, so easily accessible to any person on inquiry, the hon. gentleman had said, that he was brought there to receive the blood-money on the conviction of the traitors. Had his hon. and learned friend produced this person, the cry that would have been raised against him might easily have been anticipated. Those who now found fault with the crown-officers for not examining him, would have been the first to exclaim,—You have sent a spy to organize rebellion; and now you convict the victims of his artifice on his polluted testimony. As he was not produced, it was said that if he had appeared, a conviction would not have been obtained, so that in all cases censure must be thrown on government, and they must be wrong whatever course they pursued. The hon. gentleman, in speaking of the crimes for which one of the prisoners had been convicted and punished, had used the gentle term of "illegal acts." Such were the words that he applied to the conduct of a man, who, in prosecution of treasonable purposes, had committed the crime of murder! (Hear, hear, from the opposition benches, and a cry that such words were not used.) This expression, he would appeal to the house, was used, and he had himself taken it down at the time.

Mr. Bennet begged to explain. He had more than once, in the course of his observations, called the prisoners at Derby, traitors. (Hear, hear, from the opposition benches.)

The Solicitor-General, in continuation said, that whatever other expressions the hon. gentleman had used, and he did not mean to deny his use of the word traitors, he had likewise employed the term which he had quoted. The hon. gentleman had said, that if the Attorney-General had not produced Oliver, he could not have been called by the counsel for the prisoners, because his testimony, if received at all, must have gone to convict them. He allowed this, so far as regarded the effect of his testimony to acquit them; but if it could have established the fact that they had been deluded by him, might it not have operated favourably in their behalf, when, after conviction on competent evidence, they were called up to receive judgment? But so far were they from thinking that they had any such evidence reserved for a mitigation of punishment, that it appeared on the trial they did not even know of the name of Oliver. Their guilt had been contracted even before this person went among them. According to the statement given to-night, Oliver and Brandreth did not meet, it was said, till the 26th of May; but meetings of the conspirators had taken place before that date, and the plan was arranged which afterwards ended in the insurrection of the 9th of June. Nothing appeared in the hon. gentleman's narrative that tended to shew that Oliver had arranged the conspiracy. The reason given by the hon. gentleman for not trying Bacon first—namely, that if that trial had been first proceeded in, Oliver must have been produced—was wholly groundless, and was a representation which should not go forth to the country uncontradicted, notwithstanding the strong asseveration with which it was adduced. Oliver, the hon. gentleman should have known, was not on the list of witnesses served upon the prisoners, and could not, therefore, have been produced. He had now vindicated the proceedings of the law-officers, and shewn that the motion was grounded on a mistake of the report. He, therefore, saw no reason for complying with the motion.

Sir S. Romilly said, he was surprised at the course pursued by the two last speakers, in addressing themselves more to the mode of inquiry than to the substance of the charges. His hon. friend (Mr. Wilberforce) had objected to refer the inquiry to the committee of secrecy; and his hon. and learned friend the Solicitor-General had contented himself with shewing that the passage in the report to which the motion alluded did not bear the construction put upon it, so as to render a reference to the committee necessary. He himself had no particular desire that the examination proposed should be referred to the committee of secrecy, but he would vote for his honourable friend's motion, because he thought some course should be adopted to sift the alleged charges, and this was the one that had been suggested. He wished for a committee of inquiry, but it did not matter with him whether this committee or another should be intrusted with the inquiry. Indeed, after what had been said by the noble member for Yorkshire (Lord Milton), that he stood alone in the secret committee, and that he merely attended it because he wished to fulfil a duty imposed upon him by the house, and not with any hopes of doing any good in it, he would have preferred another mode of inquiry. Some inquiry was, however, absolutely necessary; and after the charges which had been heard from his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet) this night, with the pledge which he had given that he could substantiate them by witnesses upon oath, if a proper opportunity were allowed, he would repeat the words which he had used, and say, that he thought the house would not dare to resist inquiry into the truth. This parliament was drawing near to a dissolution; and how could the members who composed it meet their constituents at a new election, if they heard such grave charges, and resisted an examination into them? His hon. and learned friend thought he had got quit of the charges, because, he said, the statements came from a polluted source; and he must say that, since he had had a seat in parliament, he never heard a man treated more unfairly than his hon. friend had been by the Solicitor-general. He (the Solicitor-general) had suspected that the narrative came from Mitchell, and because Mitchell had been arrested by government on suspicion of treason, therefore his evidence was said to come from a polluted source. He was arrested on the 21st of June, and because he was arrested, no matter on what evidence, therefore his evidence was to be inadmissible, and his oath to be discredited. His hon. and learned friend had found out a new expedient for the use of government, and promulgated it on the high authority of one of the first law officers of the crown, to disqualify a witness who might be brought against his Majesty's ministers. According to this new plan, government had only to throw the obnoxious individual into prison, and then his testimony would cease any longer to be credible. (Hear, hear.) The moment he was taken up, he not only would lose his liberty but his character, and could never afterwards be believed. (Hear.) His hon. and learned friend had said that the whole of the evidence came from a polluted source, and he had not used the phrase inadvertently, like his hon. friend used the words illegal acts, as applied to treason, but had frequently repeated it. But then there were two contributors to the narrative, according to his suspicion, who were not imprisoned but who had gone to America. They had, however, gone there before the events mentioned in the narrative took place. (Hear.) The charges were not, however, to be destroyed upon such reasoning; the country would not acquit government upon the mere allegation that they proceeded from a polluted source. When his hon. friend, with his high character for honour and integrity, came forward and said that he could support them upon oath—that he had inquired into the testimony on which they were founded, and believed it entitled to credit—he would again use the phrase, that the house would not dare in the face of the public to resist inquiry. Adverting to the trials at Derby, he (Sir S. Romilly) said that his hon. and learned friend had dealt unfairly with the house in what he had stated regarding them. He had said, that it appeared on the trial of Brandreth, that meetings and plots had taken place or been formed before the 26th of May, and he wished this statement to go forth to the public as a satisfactory answer to the charge that Oliver had arranged the plan of the insurrection which took place on the 9th of June. Now not one word came out in evidence that any plots had been formed previous to the former date. The testimony of the witnesses there examined did not relate to any proceeding anterior to the 8th of June. The Solicitor-general had asked, why the prisoners did not call Oliver? Because it was impossible. Indeed, he admitted this; but again he asked, why, when they were brought up for judgment, did they not say that Oliver had misled them? Did his learned friend mean to insinuate, that if they had done so they would have obtained mercy? (Hear, hear.) If he wanted their avowal of that fact, he had it from them in their last moments—at that moment when they could have no hope, no object to serve by the declaration; they were all men of a strong religious turn, and they declared that Oliver had brought them to that fate. If he did not believe them then, would he have believed them at the time they were brought up for judgment? (Hear, hear.) The hon. and learned gentleman had turned the speech of his honourable friend rather invidiously against him. It was not pretended by him, and no man could so have understood, that the traitors at Derby had not been guilty of crimes for which they merited death by law. Brandreth had committed murder, and others had not less deservedly suffered. No man of common candour could have so mistaken and misrepresented his honourable friend. It looked like an intention on the part of the learned Solicitor-general, to throw a stain upon an honourable and unblemished individual—an attempt to prove that he was a suborner of improper evidence. (Much confusion; the Solicitor-general said that he had not used the word suborner.) Unquestionably not, but his language implied as much; that the hon. member (Mr. Bennet) had examined witnesses and taken evidence from polluted sources, and that he had, as it were, made common cause with traitors and murderers by justifying their crimes. (Cries of No, no.) Perhaps the expression of the hon. and learned gentleman had not been quite so strong, and perhaps he would have the goodness to explain presently, what it was he did say, to which might certainly be applied the mitigated phrase, that it seemed dictated by some degree of malignity. (Hear, hear.) The hon. gentleman who spoke last but one (Mr. Wilberforce) had censured, with the utmost warmth, the employment of spies and informers under any circumstances. He (Sir S. Romilly) was not casuist enough to be able at this moment to decide whether their assistance ought never to be required—whether private treachery might ever be encouraged for the sake of discovering public delinquency; but at the same time he was still further from agreeing with the noble lord, (Castlereagh) who, on a former occasion, had not only justified but applauded their employment. It was singular, however—thinking as the hon. member did that they were pests to society; that they betrayed the confidence of friendship, and broke the ties of blood; that they took advantage of the wants of their fellow-citizens, and led them on under colour of co-operation, from discontent to sedition, and from sedition to treason—that he should object to the motion, and, upon a matter, so imperiously demanding investigation, resist all inquiry. Would not this reference to the committee, at least tend to diminish the use of spies, and to remove this plague from the bosoms of the peaceful and well-disposed inhabitants of the country? It was a subject of vital importance, yet he refused to take a step that would accomplish an object so desirable. Still the hon. member had expressed a wish to hear Oliver tell his own story; and why could not this be done before the committee? Did he think that the unhappy man would be unequally matched, and that he would not meet with due support from the noble lord and his other friends upon that committee? (Hear, hear.) When he spoke of a prosecution, did he mean that it should be undertaken by private individuals, and that government, the public prosecutor in all other cases, should defend instead of accuse? Some members of the committee entertained a good opinion of Oliver; they thought that he was not wicked enough for a spy—that he was a bungler in his business—that he had not "snatched that grace beyond the reach of art," which accomplished villains had attained: but he who was so well able to deceive his enemies, might perhaps have imposed upon his friends. (Hear, hear.) Recollecting the thinness of the house at the time when the hon. member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Bennet) made his important statement, and observing the crowded state of the benches now, he cautioned gentlemen to pause and deliberate before they reconciled to themselves the refusal of an investigation. Would they venture to risk the impression that might be made by the rejection of this motion upon the public and their constituents? He would not now occupy more of the time of the house; but if the proposition of that night was negatived by a majority, which he shrewdly suspected, he hoped that the hon. member for Bramber (and no man could do it with more weight) on an early day would come forward with a motion consistent with his speech, to inquire into the recent encouragement of spies, whose employment was destructive of the happiness, morality, and religion of the community.

Mr. Canning rose, but Sir S. Romilly called upon the Solicitor-general to explain the supposed misrepresentation: Mr. Canning, however, persevered.—If he had recognized, he said, in the hon. and learned gentleman a right to regulate the order of debates, he should not have persisted in claiming the attention of the house before the explanation, so extraordinarily called for, had been given: (hear, hear) he used the term—so extraordinarily called for—not with reference to the hon. and learned member's speech, but to the colloquial and irregular mode in which he had demanded a reply. His (Sir S. Romilly's) practice, both here and elsewhere, might have taught him, that there might be two reasons for not giving an explanation—either that the meaning had originally been most clearly expressed, or that the misrepresentation had been so wilful and so gross, that it might be very safely left to the audience to weigh its merits. (Loud cheers.) He agreed that it was most expedient to recal the attention of the house, both to the state of the question, and to the question itself, as there might be those present who, not having enjoyed the benefit of hearing the statement of the hon. member opposite (Mr. Bennet), or of listening to the question from the chair, would be in total ignorance of the point under discussion. From the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman who last addressed the house, they would be led to conclude, that the proposition was, that an inquiry should be instituted not only into the stated but the proved misconduct of spies employed by government; he had not even stopped at this misrepresentation: for, whether distrusting the facts detailed by his hon. friend behind him (Mr. Bennet) or the force of his own reasoning upon them, or invited by a hoped, attempted, but unachieved triumph over his hon. and learned friend (the Solicitor-General) (hear, hear, hear) he had thought fit to put in a plea in bar, and to call upon the house to consider whether it dared to put a negative upon a question before it: the time for that topic was fortunately not yet arrived: to whatever millennium some persons might look forward when parliament should be overawed and intimidated from without, it was not yet come: the house and the country, thank God, were not yet ripe for the discussion of that topic, launched, as it were, from the tribune of Robespierre. (Continued cheers.) Hon. gentlemen opposite might smile; they might thus attempt to give him the only answer he could receive; but he hoped, before he sat down, to shew beyond contradiction, that he was not the single person, that government were not the only set of men, or the majority of the house the only body, monopolizing the sentiment that not long since there was in the country a real tendency to revolution. He flattered himself that the house was not to be intimidated in any sense that the word might convey, either by force from without, or by argument from within, designed as that force and that argument might be to prevent it from looking every question fairly in the face, and deciding it upon its merits. The members of the British parliament had neither lost their reason nor their coolness, but would proceed in the path of their duty unbiased by clamour and unawed by menaces. (Hear.) If the other side, by their organized shouts and unorganized speeches, by their premeditated exaggerations and intentional misstatements, expected to interrupt the quiet march of just argument and solid reasoning, they would be as grievously mistaken as the hon. and learned gentleman had been when he hoped to repress or extinguish the growing ability and power of the hon. and learned member who preceded him in debate. (Hear, hear.) All this, however, was but surplusage to the real matter in discussion—the motion of the hon. member for Lincoln. Had he brought it forward alone, or with advice? If alone, he ought to have consulted his friends; or if with advice, God help him with, and deliver him from, such friends. (Hear, laughter, and confusion.) Personally, he entertained for him the highest respect, and he was happy to see him gradually rising to that station in the house to which his talents entitled him; but he must speak of his motion as it appeared. If the hon. member had acted by himself, he alone was responsible for its absurdity: but if he had taken the opinions of those around him, never were unlucky individuals so deceived, betrayed, and deserted! If he had not acted alone, at least he now stood in melancholy solitude; for not one speech had been delivered, nor one argument offered, under pretence of supporting the motion, which, properly viewed, must not have the effect of chasing it from the table. The motion was not, as some supposed, that a committee should be appointed to inquire into facts—not that a prosecution should be instituted against those who had sinned against morality and religion; but merely that the committee of secrecy shall be directed to inquire, whether any, and what, proceedings had been instituted against persons described in the second report. Who were those persons? The hon. mover had interrupted one speaker, to state, that he did not refer to Oliver and the trials at Derby, but to Castle, and the trials in London. Yet his friends, if such they might be called, had all directed their attacks against Oliver, while he protested that he meant Castle. Yet that was impossible: Castle could not be alluded to in the second report, because the shouts on the enlargement of Mr. Thistlewood were heard under the very windows of the room where the committee, which was framing the second report, was sitting. What, then, could this report have to do with Castle and his associates? His functions were finished, the trials were over, and it was notorious that the report related only to Oliver. This was a plain and convincing proof that the motion meant nothing, if it did not apply to Oliver. It might however be said, that it was intended to have a retrospective as well as a prospective application, but how would its condition be at all improved by the assertion? There was now no pretence that Castle was employed by government: he was taken with the rest who were charged with treason, and having turned king's evidence, the House of Commons was called upon to vote an inquiry. What steps, it was asked, had been taken to prosecute him? Did any man upon earth ever hear of a motion so novel or so absurd? Was it not the notorious practice of all courts of justice to admit accomplices as witnesses? And why, in this sanctioned, hallowed, and dignified crime of treason, was a different rule to prevail to that which governed the vulgar offences of murder or robbery? Then, if the conduct of Castle, as an evidence, was found to be an untenable ground for the motion, he supposed the hon. gentlemen on the other side would be obliged to return to Oliver again.—(Oliver and Co.! from the opposition benches.) Then be it Oliver and Co. The motion then before the house was, not for the purpose of directing the committee what it was proper for them to do, nor to direct them to inquire what ought to be done; but it was for the purpose of directing them to inquire what had been done, though his Majesty's ministers had stated that nothing had been done. (Hear, and a laugh.)—That nothing had been done might be blameable: that nothing had been done might be a ground for impeachment; if so, let the impeachment be brought forward, let the accusation be made, and it would be fairly met; but in the name of common sense, in the name of consistency, let not such a motion be brought before the house as that of directing the committee to inquire whether any proceedings had been instituted against a man, who, when taken in the very act of crime, turned evidence for the purpose of saving himself.—(Loud cries of hear.)—At least if gentlemen thought such a proceeding necessary, they ought, in common justice to the country, also to inquire, whether proceedings had not been instituted against every other person who had turned evidence, as Castle had done.—(Hear.) He should repeat, that if the conduct of ministers was such as subjected them to an impeachment, let their accusers come forth, and their charge should be answered. But he thought the house would not attempt such a measure; he was convinced that no man of common sense would do so. Could the house attempt to deny those acts which the recorded votes of last session shewed to have been freely done? Could they attempt to excuse their own acts by throwing all the blame upon ministers? He thought not. Yet they should do so before any imputation could be cast on the conduct of the executive government. But why had the name of Castle been thrust in at all? The reason was obvious—because so complete an answer had been given to the case of Oliver, that the hon. mover in his distress had resorted to the subterfuge of applying his proposition to Castle.—(No, no.) To whom then did it apply, or had it indeed no application at all? If Castle were not the man, as he clearly was not, would the other side revert to Oliver, or if they liked it better, to Oliver and Co.? (Hear, and laughter.) They should have it either or both ways: at all events, the object of the motion was to inquire into that which was remote from all reason and common sense: the other side wished to know what had been done, when nothing had been done—perhaps it was wrong to have done nothing—perhaps it might form ground for accusation or impeachment; if so, let the articles be drawn and ministers would know what and how to answer; but it was disgraceful even to the other side, to bring forward so silly a mockery as the proposition now under discussion. If nothing had been done, no prosecution commenced, as was avowed—habetis confitentem reum—and the charge should be distinctly laid; but as it stood, the motion was perfectly childish and unmeaning. It was an insult to the understanding of the house to call upon them to give it their assent. The present was the first instance he recollected of a motion, a concurrence in which would be equally inconvenient to its supporters and opponents. It would certainly be a matter of regret with government, to be outvoted upon a question which involved their own characters and all the measures they advised, and which were adopted last session; supposing the house should dare (for he, too, would use that word) to cast a suspicion on its own recorded acts, by now deciding in direct opposition to what it had formerly determined. But would the other side gain by its adoption? They said, that the inquiry was of vital importance—that the peace of society was at stake—that the morals of mankind were invaded, and religion outraged. It might be so. It was impossible to tell what earthly or transcendent interests might be involved: but if they were, to what body would wise men confide them, and to what body did the other side of the house propose to confide them?—to those of whom they had recently recorded their opinion that they were incompetent to the functions already delegated to them—who neither possessed common talents nor common honesty—to a committee consisting of ministers who were themselves culprits—of the friends of ministers who were to be their own judges, and who were assembled merely for the purpose of cheating and deluding the nation. (Continued cheers.) He thanked the hon. gentlemen on the other side for their applause, since he collected from it that he was correctly expressing their sentiments. (Hear, hear.)—These were the men to whom were now to be intrusted these vital interests, these mighty matters—men whose labours were injurious rather than beneficial, and whose report would be a tissue of false statements and erroneous opinions. Such, only a few days ago, had been the language of hon. gentlemen who now supported the present motion: what course did they take to shew their consistency? They selected the most vital inquiry on which morality, religion, unity, community, happiness, tranquillity, and all sorts of blessings depended, and they placed it in the hands of this proscribed committee: utterly incompetent to discharge the functions already assigned to them, they were to be burdened with fresh labours, and matters of still greater solemnity. (Continued cheers.) Supposing, however, that the expected report, like that relating to Oliver, should be unsatisfactory to them, as it most likely would be, they might still tell their constituents that they had put the stupendous subject in the best possible train of inquiry, and that it was not their fault if the issue did not bring to light all they hoped to discover. (Hear, hear.) It would be a waste of time to say more on such a subject: it was possible that the hon. gentleman might have something of a more daring and original cast to bring forward; most assuredly this would not be difficult, for the present motion was in truth the most humble and servile following of that very vote which had been so loudly denounced; the object of it was to pay the most implicit and abject deference to persons who had been declared incompetent, unworthy, and degraded; to intrust the highest matters to those who would betray: to commit inquiry to those who were the instruments of delusion, and elucidation to professors in obscurity. Surely the ingenuous mind of the hon. mover, when made sensible of the absurdity into which he had been led, would be the first to laugh at the awkwardness of his own predicament; he would discover, before the end of the debate, on comparing his motion with the speeches of his friends, that, instead of appearing in his own true colours, as an independent and enlightened man, he was put forward as the paw of a certain humble domestic animal, for the purpose of feeling the pulse of the house. Turning, then, from the hon. mover's speech, which was only the small end of the wedge, he would now advert to those who followed, and whose addresses, forming the larger end, the first was calculated to introduce. Of the noble lord (Milton) who spoke early in this debate, he meant not to utter one disrespectful word; yet, he had heard his statement with the utmost surprise. To the committee the noble lord had imputed no sinister motive, yet he could conceive that some such had been faintly adumbrated rather than described. It had been alleged, that, last year, alarm had been not only propagated through the country, but industriously exaggerated by the agents of government. It was clear, however, that governments cannot go on if they refuse information of such plots as may be formed against their security. It was equally clear that, in order to come at this information, they must have recourse to some means, be they good or bad, fair or otherwise. They must build their belief on such information as they receive. This was the ordinary course, though, no doubt, they must always consider that intelligence as the best which comes through the best channels: they must allow greater weight to that which comes under the sanction of established authority, than can be given to the information of an obscure agent. It had been insinuated, that ministers had procured the suspension for purposes of their own, by exhibiting the country in a state of danger and disaffection. This disaffection was brought forward in grave reports of alleged danger, and upon those reports they came forward to parliament for the powers required. But it could be satisfactorily proved, that government, instead of outstripping the information they had received, rather lagged behind. He presumed that none would differ from him in thinking that of all the sources of information, local information is the best entitled to credit. He should be glad to know, then, what accusation that government would be liable to, who should receive information of the following description, and yet should obstinately shut the door to truth. Suppose a justice of the peace should write thus:—"I cannot conclude without calling to your recollection, that all this is not the consequence of distress, want of employment, scarcity, or dearness of provision, but is the offspring of a revolutionary spirit, and nothing short of a complete change in the government of the country is in contemplation of their leaders." If this information had come from some petty authority of an obscure district—had it come from Johnson's "wise justice on the banks of Trent;" from one who heard only of changes and revolution by report, while he himself sat securely beneath his own fig-tree and his vine, if the country produced any such—would government even in such a case be warranted in passing it over? But coming as it did from agitated districts, and not only from a justice, but, as Lingo expresses it, from a "master of justices," from the lord-lieutenant of the West Riding of York, could government refuse it credit? Would they not have deserved impeachment if they had? Nothing was more common than when threatened danger was once past, to look back upon it with contempt. When the alarm is once over, fear subsides, and cavil and distrust return with the means of safety. He challenged the historical knowledge of the gentlemen opposite, he challenged the learned research of the hon. and learned gentleman who spoke last, and the more discursive reading of the right hon. gentleman whom they were to hear next, he challenged them to produce one single instance of a conspiracy once detected, where, when the danger was over, doubts had not been entertained of its existence. When he made this challenge, he barred all disputed successions to the crown. He alluded to internal conspiracies conducted by obscure individuals; obscure, he meant, in comparison of princes, statesmen, and peers. The lord lieutenant of Yorkshire affected to look back with surprise at the arts which had been practised; but government were justified in acting upon the information he had furnished, although he might afterwards have changed his opinion respecting it. The measures which had been adopted in reference to the documents received, were such as were judged necessary to meet, not a partial but a general and spreading contagion; and if government were blameable, it was in acting below the necessity of the time. It was not true, as had been stated by an hon. gentleman, (Mr. Bennet) whom he did not then see in his place, as well as by other gentlemen, though in different words, that the government had been employed in drawing up an indictment against the people of England. They had felt no inclination to indict the people of England, for they believed them sound in their allegiance, and they relied on their spirit and their sense. This appeared evidently from the sentiments expressed from the speech from the throne; when they were regarded as sober, loyal, attached to the constitution, and ready to uphold it by any sacrifices that might be necessary. But as disaffection existed, it was found necessary to probe the extent of the danger; and, in the imperfection of human means to dive into human actions, it was necessary to avail themselves of such means as were within their reach, to ascertain the designs of the disaffected. According to the doctrine of gentlemen opposite, a simple traitor was a person entitled to much forbearance, and perhaps respect; if once he turned his back to his fellow traitors, he became altogether execrable. Like the fantastical representations of aerial personages between Heaven and Hell, which he had read of, among whom when a spirit, partly dark and partly light, appeared; the other spirits exclaimed, "halt, back to whence you came," and he shuffled into the crowd he had left. No individual, having the feelings of humanity, or the principles of moral correctness, could set a man on to seduce persons into courses of sedition. (Much cheering from the opposition.) But when the question was, "will you avail yourself of this man's information, or let the state go to wreck?" he felt here as little hesitation as in the other alternative.—If, then, it was proper to employ persons to discover treasons and plots, who, he would ask, would the hon. gentlemen of the other side employ? Would they say, that none but persons of the most pure and unsullied character should be employed on such occasions? If such was their way of thinking, he had only to observe, that conspiracies might be carried on to the utmost extent before such persons could be found to engage in such employment. To find a spy of such a description as would please gentlemen of that way of thinking, it would be necessary that a man should have the most pure moral character, be an excellent father of a family, have an independent fortune, and, in a word, be faultless—(Hear, hear.)—and yet of all the monsters which this world produced, that terrible monster, a faultless man, was the most difficult to be found. If conspirators were allowed to go on until such a person could be discovered, such plots might be produced as would rival the bloody conspirators of the 18th century.—(Hear.)—If the hon. gentlemen on the other side were those who had occasion to employ spies, and they were informed that the Bank or the Tower were about to be attacked, they would of course laugh at the intimation; but if their informant stated he would prove what he said, the first question would be, "Have you a family?" If their informant answered, "I have six children;" the next question would be, "how many wives have you?" (Much laughter.) To this, perhaps, he might answer, "Gentlemen, I am not certain as to their number; my first poor woman eloped from me, and not having inquired after her, I married another, and therefore cannot tell whether the former is living or dead." (Laughter.) No doubt if such were the answer, the moral feeling of the gentlemen would dictate this remark: "Be off, you infamous scoundrel, how dare you, a bigamist, presume to give information as to any treason or plots. You are not worthy of becoming an informer." (Much laughter.) Such gentlemen might do a great deal for the cause of morality,—they might discourage polygamy, and encourage chastity—but they could never be entrusted with the care of a nation. (Hear, hear.) The learned gentleman opposite, (Sir Samuel Romilly) had taken offence at what he considered an attempt to identify his friends with the conduct of those by whom the country was agitated, but the learned gentleman appeared to think little of the attempt to identify his Majesty's ministers with those whom he, himself, pronounced to be completely infamous. But the learned gentleman ought to recollect, that ministers did not create informers; they only availed themselves of those who offered. He could not impute to Oliver the criminality which some gentlemen ascribed to him, but ministers would have been criminal if they had not made use of his information for the safety of the state. That person knew the odium of the office which he undertook, but having undertaken it, the public, whom he served, were greatly indebted to him. If it were said that this person was criminal because he afforded encouragement to those whom he undertook to detect, he must say, that he did not understand what was meant by encouragement. The appearance of a stranger in such assemblies might be deemed an accession of strength, or an administration of courage; but if such stranger should appear to differ with the object of the assembly, he must, of course, expect to be excluded. Would gentlemen recommend that such dissent should be manifested?—because if that were the case, they must be of opinion that although spies may be employed, they might report and betray, but they could not learn.—With respect to Castle, he was quite out of the reach of any inquiry which might be made, he having only become an evidence to save his own life. And as to Oliver,—that person had not fomented any disturbance; he merely gave information of what he had heard and seen in the committees of the conspirators. But, as had been already stated, not one single individual had for one hour been deprived of his liberty on the testimony of Oliver. Oliver's testimony led to other testimony less exceptionable than his own, and with which he was connected only as the index.—It had been much agitated, why Oliver was not called as a witness on the trials at Derby, some saying that the one party should have called him, and some the other. It had been replied for the prisoners, that they could not have produced him, for that would have been to admit the guilt with which they were charged. But could they not have called him, and disclosed the whole truth, when they were brought up for judgment? Surely, they would have encountered no danger by making the experiment.—The report said, that the language of persons acting as spies might have had the effect of encouraging what they were employed to detect. Let the honourable gentleman, then, take the report for what it was worth. The report assigned no crime whatever; all that it went to impute was the effect, and not the intention, and this was all that could be brought home to Oliver in the present instance. How often was it said in that house, in the warmth of debate, that the language of one was calculated to produce disaffection; of another, to create discontent? But who ever inferred intention from such a charge? He would challenge the ingenuity of his learned friend near him (the Solicitor-General,) or the ingenuity, sobriety, and good sense of his learned friend who sat next him (the Attorney-General,) to found an indictment on this report. He had shewn that it was impossible to give any definite effect to this motion, yet this impossible task they would throw into hands which the hon. gentlemen themselves thought most unfit to execute it.

[The right hon. gentleman sat down amid the loud cheers of his own side of the house.]

Sir S. Romilly was sure the House would excuse him for saying one word strictly in explanation. He might, indeed, be satisfied with saying, that some misrepresentations were so gross as to require no refutation (much cheering); but as several members, who had come in while the right hon. gentleman was speaking, might really give credit to the expressions he had ascribed to him, he felt it incumbent upon him, for their sake, to correct the misrepresentation. He never did say—the House must be aware that he never did say—he was astonished how the right hon. gentleman could have understood him to have said, that the House would not dare to reject the motion. He had used the word dare, but it was in this way. An hon. gentleman, in supporting the motion, had said, that the House would not dare, for the sake of their consistency and character, to refuse the inquiry. In allusion to this expression, and as a general election was soon expected (loud cheers from the ministerial side, which were still more loudly returned by the opposition), he had said that he could not conceive how gentlemen could resist this motion, and dare to meet their constituents; but in this he did not mean to allude to the right hon. gentleman's confidence to meet his electors at Liverpool. (Hear, hear.)—The learned gentleman concluded with observing, that the right hon. gentleman did not appear to be aware of the difference between spies and informers, because, although it might be right to attend to the latter, it might be utterly unjustifiable to employ the former.

Mr. Tierney said, that among the many advantages which the right hon. gentleman had over him, and many advantages he had peculiar to himself, he had the advantage of having had two hours the start of him. (Much laughter.) Of this, however, he would not complain, nor of the length of the speech, though some parts of it might have been much shorter. (Hear, hear, hear.) The fantastical embroidery, which might well have been spared, had occupied at least three-quarters of an hour. He would pass over the rhetoric respecting the millennium and Robespierre, and organized shouts and unorganized speeches, but he must say one word in allusion to the expression, "that the House would not dare." He remembered when the right hon. gentleman's words were taken down as he menaced the House, in 1807, in these terms—"We will appeal to the people." (Loud and continued cheering.) His hon. friend the mover had put this plain construction on the report—that the violent language of spies had encouraged treasonable practices. This appeared to him to call for serious investigation. To whom could he propose to refer this investigation but to the committee, who knew the grounds of the former report? This it was that constituted the striking propriety of the motion; it referred the inquiry to those who knew the grounds of the former report, and were now investigating the subsequent events. The right hon. gentleman had said, there was no crime imputed in the report. He was persuaded that no lawyer could concur with him. If the officers of the crown did justice to the people as well as to the government, they would have commenced a prosecution before this time. (Hear, hear.) The government, however, durst not touch a hair of Oliver's head. (Loud cheering.) His retort upon them was more than they could endure. The right hon. gentleman had rung changes for half an hour upon the facetious commercial phrase, Oliver and Co. He might next make it Oliver, self, and Co. (Laughter.) The object, however, of sending this to the committee was to see how they would deal with it. Any thing might be referred to a committee appointed for nothing. The House was called upon to do all in their power to quiet the disgust that pervaded the country against the employment of spies. If they refused this motion, they proved that they were not alive to the liberties of the people. (Much cheering.) The charges were, that spies had been employed, but the defence was for informers. But if a person employed as a spy acted as an incendiary, was no charge to be brought against him? The right hon. gentleman had spoken of monsters: now, Oliver was the monster sought for. He had been represented as having been a moral man before he was a spy, and having continued moral afterwards. This must by some measure be inquired into. The right hon. gentleman had indulged an extravagant levity, and a long string of jokes, upon a sober and even an awful question, whether the agent of government had created all the confusion of last year. But not one syllable had dropped from him, amidst all his gay and gaudy eloquence, in reply to his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet.) He had no hesitation in pronouncing his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet,) notwithstanding all the taunts of the right hon. gentleman, one of the most useful members of that House, one whose only object was at all times to be doing good. (Hear.) In works of direct humanity, though, perhaps, not of the greatest popularity, in rendering gaols wholesome, in mitigating distress where it was most severely felt and least known, it was not going too far, to say that his hon. friend stood higher than any other member of that House. It was in perfect consistency with his character, that his hon. friend had been induced to make inquiries into the proceedings of Oliver; and after the statement which they had enabled him that night to submit to the House, it was clear that the whole matter must undergo investigation. Here he must pause for a moment to declare, that he had heard the hon. and learned Solicitor-General with infinite pain. (Hear, hear.) He was himself, perhaps, the very first man who had noticed the rising talents of the hon. and learned gentleman, and foretold, on an occasion which he could not have forgotten, that they would one day make a figure in public life. He had subsequently inquired of a lamented and common friend (the late Mr. Horner), what was his character, not only as a lawyer but as a man; and melancholy spectacle to see the learned gentleman treading in his present, might he not say his bad, courses. (A laugh from the Treasury benches.) If, as he might presume, it was the paucity of legal talents which the minister found he could inlist in his service that had raised the hon. and learned gentleman to his present eminence, the same reason might cause him to be elevated to the bench. Was it not, then, alarming to find the lawyer, who might hereafter be a judge, holding in the House of Commons the monstrous doctrine, that an individual who had been accused was thereby disqualified from being a witness? (Hear.) Look at the case of Mitchell. Mitchell was discharged, instead of being prosecuted; and were they to be told by a Solicitor-General, that because he had been arrested on the suspicion of some person, his testimony was not to be believed? Was he to be debarred the right of proving himself innocent? A principle more dreadfully unjust or oppressive was not to be found in the number of those which had, by exhausting the patience of the people, at last ended in that fatal and bloody revolution of France which had produced such miseries to Europe. The same doctrine was maintained in the discussion of the preceding night. the witness Campbell was not to be believed, and why?—because he had refused to perjure himself. (Hear.) The motion now before the house involved merely this question—were the facts alleged to be substantiated or not? If substantiated, there was a heavy load of guilt somewhere; but if the inquiry was refused, a general suspicion must arise, that this guilt belonged to some of the highest characters in the kingdom. In one part of the right hon. gentleman's speech, as by much the most solemn as well as the most dull, he had endeavoured to answer the observations of a noble lord behind him (Lord Milton), professing that here he meant to deal in nothing but argument. He had, however, soon found it necessary to resort to a little stage effect, and had produced a paper from the bag. (No, from Mr. Canning.) Then, why was it not in the bag, if it contained important information? But, perhaps, it was taken from the old bag. (A laugh.) The house should bear in mind, that this letter was written by Earl Fitzwilliam in December, 1816. It contained the judgment which at that time the noble lord's intelligent mind had formed, and which his candour induced him to communicate to his Majesty's ministers respecting the internal state of the country. His impression then was, that very serious agitations were in existence, and that there was ground for entertaining considerable alarm. What, said the right hon. gentleman, and will you contend after this, that strong measures were not necessary? But let it be recollected, that these strong measures were not proposed till the February following, nor until an unfortunate pebble was thrown in the park. Certainly no mention of their necessity was made in the speech from the throne. (Hear, hear.) Now he wished the house to advert a little to the practice of this dealing, on the part of his Majesty's ministers, with papers to which nobody but themselves had access. Let it be supposed that the very production of this letter was of all their attempts at delusion, the grossest and most palpable. (Hear, hear, from Lord Milton.) What, if there had been subsequent letters from Earl Fitzwilliam, which it was the bounden duty of the right hon. gentleman to have read, if he thought proper to produce the first? (Hear, hear.) "But oh!" adds the right hon. gentleman, "perhaps it may be said that the noble lord had changed his opinion after the danger was past." He would take leave to say that the noble lord had done no such thing. He did not attend the committee, but went down in his character of lord-lieutenant, personally to examine the state of that district which was said to be the most disturbed. He went there, not when the danger was past, but when it was raging; and long before it was extinct the noble lord wrote a letter to his Majesty's ministers, which he now challenged them to produce. (Hear, hear.) Was that letter, he asked, in the green bag? for, if not, and the report was agreed to without it, then he would assert that the committee was wilfully deceived. (Hear, hear.) It was impossible for him to know whether it was there or not, for they had taken good care to exclude him from the committee. In answer to a question of the right hon. gentleman, he would frankly tell him that the firm belief of his mind was, that ministers did wish and intend to excite alarm; and his reason for so believing was, that instead of giving the evidence on both sides, they had submitted only a mutilated account of what information was before themselves, to the committee. He believed, moreover, that these poor, innocent, and unsuspected ministers, whose utter simplicity was so well pourtrayed by the right hon. gentleman, according to whose representations they had no political object in view, but acted altogether from the impulse of kindred sympathy, would have continued the alarm, if it had been found possible to do so. As he had already once observed, alarm was their daily bread; and, if they could have succeeded this time in dividing the opposition, he doubted not that the continuance of the suspension act would have been proposed. Such would one day, when dispassionately viewed and examined upon its true merits, appear to be the conduct and character of the present government. However firm and durable at present, it would soon crumble into nothing. The Lord Advocate had last night made it a matter of boast, that no man had been arrested in Scotland, without being brought to trial in the regular course of law. This, then, satisfactorily shewed, that the suspension act was not required in Scotland. Every man had not the frankness of the hon. member for Hertfordshire, (Sir John Sebright, see page 161.) although he might have a similar conviction, and could not persuade himself to make a voluntary and immediate confession that he had been deceived. But tens and hundreds in that house would in no long space of time admit, that the disaffection which had been proved to exist, fell far short of what they dreaded when they gave their consent to the suspension act. He did not himself deny the existence of a disaffected spirit to a certain extent; but he considered it as springing from a distress which he hoped was now removed, and that it had been inflamed by the acts of the agents employed by government. Not one man among the disaffected was of a higher rank in society than that of a weaver, and the far greater part of them were paupers, excepting always the moral Mr. Oliver and Co. If there had been evil machinations before Oliver arrived, it was clear to his mind, that his arrival caused them to terminate in an explosion. (Hear, hear.) If he had not excited the disaffection, he had turned it into the only course in which it was likely to prove mischievous. Strange, that agents of this description should be employed by a government which boasted of its preventive policy. The Attorney-General had asked, what could be thought of Brandreth, a man who had fought his way through murder to treason. He agreed, that Brandreth was better out of society than in it; but the question now was, whether the explosion in Derbyshire was not the work of Oliver; for if it was, Oliver was guilty of the murder which the hand of Brandreth committed. On the question of treason he said nothing, for he thought that was a matter of doubt. Why did the vigilance of the magistrates sleep on the 9th of June, when Brandreth might have been arrested? The worst that could in that case have happened would be, that four more persons would have probably been alive, than were now living. For his own part, he could easily conceive what an impression must be made upon a discontented populace in the country, by being informed by a person calling himself a London delegate, that 70,000 men were prepared to rise and join them in establishing their rights; but even these arts, calculated as they were to inflame and mislead, had gone no further than to cause an insurrection of 100 men here, and 100 there, armed with a few pitchforks and about 20 muskets. Was this a sufficient ground for depriving the people of England of their liberties? His persuasion was, that there had existed no necessity for vesting such formidable powers in the government, and that they had been exercised in many places, more particularly at a distance from the metropolis, with harsh and needless severity. Did the house believe, that by the vote of a majority that night this question would be set at rest? He wished to speak in measured terms, but he must warn the house not to trespass too far on the temper and patience of the people. They would not bear to have their liberties scouted at in the tone of the right hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.) Every unhappy victim of the suspension act would have to relate in his little circle the tale of his sufferings, his innocence, and his wrongs; and would have to close all by adding, that a majority of the House of Commons refused to listen to him, or to inquire into the truth of his story, because the minister declared that it was better as it was. (Hear, hear, hear.) If his Majesty's ministers refused to face the inquiry, the universal impression would be, that they dared not face it. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman might shake his head, but he would advise him and the noble lord to beware how their conduct provoked future and more serious disturbances. The statement of his hon. friend, until met by a full and intelligible investigation, must remain the deepest stain upon the history of this country. A majority might appear a very triumphant thing, but it did not always excite very triumphant or satisfactory feelings; and he was persuaded that there was not one of last night's majority, who did not say to himself as he went home, "the Ministers certainly made but a poor figure." The noble lord (Castlereagh) could not have had a very pleasant night's rest. As for the learned lord, he perhaps consoled himself by the reflection, that the charge against M'Kinlay, "was not proven," and that he was the more innocent of the two. (A laugh.) The noble lord, indeed, well knew the difference between a real triumph, and the act of a majority, which might not choose to desert him in the hour of his distress. But he could assure him that the question would be revived; that an inquiry, though now refused, was only postponed; and that the result must exhibit what was the real nature of his triumph. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Canning, in explanation, with reference to Earl Fitzwilliam's letter, disavowed any, the slightest intention of wilfully keeping back any thing that might tend to throw any light on the state of the country.

Mr. Tierney said, that one letter had been received which it was thought convenient to communicate, and another had been received subsequently, which it was not thought convenient to communicate. (Hear.)

Lord Milton trusted, that from the argumentum ad hominem, or rather the argumentum ad filium of the right hon. gentleman, he should be allowed to say a few words. It was really his opinion that one letter had been produced, while another had been withheld. The right hon. gentleman had stated, that the danger being over, Earl Fitzwilliam had been glad to get bac to those whom before he had felt himself boun to abandon, or something to that effect; bu that was by no means the real statement of Ea Fitzwilliam's change of opinion. He (Lo Milton) had moved for a paper in the committe which did not appear to be forthcoming. Ther had certainly been another letter which had no been produced, and in the letter which had bee brought forward, there had been enclosed a do cument which was not now found in it, and o which the change of opinion had been considerably founded. He was a member of the secret committee, and as such he felt that it would not be becoming or proper in him to disclose any of the information laid before it. But he thought he owed a duty to that house, to state to them the conduct of the government in one particular. Many letters had been laid before the committee from lords-lieutenants of different counties, but there were no letters from the lord-lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire. (Hear, hear.) He did not know what the reason of that could be, but he trusted that the letter to which he had alluded, as well as the other document, would be laid before the house, for them to form their own judgment thereon, without any communication.

Lord Castlereagh thought, that the situation of the noble lord ought to have precluded him from making a most odious, and, in his opinion, a most unfair statement; it was a thing he could not help complaining of. The noble lord had given notice of a motion, for the production of a paper, on which he (Lord Castlereagh) had stated, that he did not suppose there would be any difficulty in granting the production of any papers; but he thought it proper, as he did not altogether belong to the department from which that paper was to be received, that the question should be reserved for a future day. It would have been natural to have said that the paper to which the noble lord alluded was not to be found amongst the papers before the committee, but nothing was more unfair than this statement, for what had occasioned the noble lord's observations had been the subject of nearly half of the discussion in the committee. When the noble lord gave the notice, he had no reason to know that there would be any difficulty in granting the documents to which he alluded. After the able and unanswerable speeches that had been made, in reply to the motion, he should not occupy the attention of the house; but as the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney) had supposed that he had not had a very pleasant night's rest, he could only hope, that he should have a very comfortable night of it that night.

Mr. Fazakerley in reply, contended, that sufficient grounds had been laid to induce the house to agree to the motion. He had felt it right to bring this subject before them, and should never be deterred from discharging his duty by the taunts of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning.) We had heard of revolutionary times, but it appeared to him that the present times were not without danger, for there seemed to be a constant approach to an alienation of the government from the people. HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, Feb. 12.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] The following accounts, (ordered on the 6th instant), were presented.

1. An account of all Exchequer bills issued between the 5th of January, 1817, and the 6th of January, 1818.—The amount issued was, 6,698,620*l.* 16*s.* 9½*d.*

2. An account of all Exchequer bills paid off within the same period.—The amount paid off was 47,658,120*l.* 16*s.* 9½*d.*

3. An account of all Exchequer bills which remained to be issued on the 6th of January 1818.—The amount was 3,877,600*l.*

4. An account (ordered on the 11th instant,) of the amount of Exchequer bills issued per acts 7 & 11 of Anne, remaining in the chests of the Tellers of the Exchequer; together with the interest due upon them, outstanding and unprovided for.—The Exchequer bills issued pursuant to the above acts, and remaining in the chests of the Tellers of the Exchequer, amounted to the following sum: Principal 912*l.* 10.—Interest 180*l.* 4*s.* 2¾*d.*—Total 1092*l.* 14*s.* 2¾*d.*

5. An account of monies paid into the Exchequer, pursuant to act 51 Geo. III. c. 15. intituled, "An Act for enabling his Majesty to direct the issue of Exchequer bills to a limited amount, for the purposes, and in manner therein mentioned," and which remain for the disposition of parliament.—The money paid into the Exchequer pursuant to this act, and remaining for the disposition of parliament, amounted to 21,448*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*

[For a more particular statement of these accounts, see the Appendix, title, Exchequer Bills.]

GOLD AND SILVER COIN.] On the motion of Mr. Grenfell, the account (presented on the 11th instant,) of gold and silver coined at the mint, was ordered to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] On the motion of Dr. Phillimore, the return, (ordered on the 4th instant,) of all vessels engaged in the slave trade, and detained by his Majesty's cruizers, was ordered to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

The report of the committee of supply was brought up, and the resolution for a grant of 400,000*l.* pursuant to the treaty with Spain, was agreed to by the house.

CUTLERS.] Lord Milton presented a petition of certain cutlers at Sheffield and Hallamshire, complaining of the injury done to their trade by persons who were in the habit of manufacturing knives, and other articles, from cast iron, which they represented, and disposed of, as steel.

Lord Lascelles said, there were distinctions between cast-iron and steel, and wrought-iron and steel, which required some examination.

The petition was brought up and read; it stated, that the manufactory had been carried on above 250 years in steel and iron, for consumption at home and abroad; but that knives, razors, &c. were manufactured and sold at 20 per cent. less than good manufacturers could sell such articles for, while the marks upon them imposed on the purchasers. It was the same with certain tools for joiners. The petitioners prayed for regulations and restrictions.

The petition was referred to a committee, consisting of Lord Milton, Lord Lascelles, Sir Charles Mordaunt, and several others, with power to send for persons, papers, and records; five to be the quorum.

RIBBON WEAVERS.] Mr. Peter Moore, in presenting a petition from the ribbon weavers of Coventry, took occasion to observe upon the merit and suffering of the petitioners, who, as the law stood at present, were precluded from making such arrangements among themselves as were necessary to ensure a due remuneration for their labour. Even when in full work, the earnings of these poor industrious men were known to be comparatively inadequate; but when trade was slack, they were so very distressed that they were under the necessity of for relief from the poor rates. Thus the poor rates of the inhabitants of Coventry were considerably augmented, for the maintenance of those, the profits of whose labour were enjoyed by others, who contributed nothing whatever towards the rates. Under such circumstances, he trusted that no one of feeling or consideration would be found to oppose the objects which the petitioners had in view, and which were, first, to remedy the evil resulting from the existing law with respect to apprenticeships; and, secondly, to enable the petitioners to settle the rate of wages among themselves.

Mr. Dugdale said, that from the circumstances which had come to his knowledge as a magistrate for Warwickshire, with respect to the condition of the petitioners, he thought their case peculiarly entitled to the attention of the house. He could not at present express any opinion as to the nature of the remedy which they proposed, but he felt that the subject was worthy of consideration.

The petition was referred to a committee.

SEVERN COAL TRADE.] Mr. Protheroe presented a petition of the proprietors of coal mines in the vicinity of Bristol, praying that coal and culm should be exempted from duty upon the river Severn.—Referred to a committee.

LEATHER TAX.] On the motion of Lord Althorp, accounts were ordered "of the duty charged on leather for the last four quarters ending the 5th of January 1818, shewing the amount of each respective quarter, and distinguishing the amount charged in each quarter upon hides and skins charged three pence per lb. and leather otherwise charged, so far as relates to England."

"Of drawbacks allowed upon leather exported, for the last four quarters ending the 5th of January 1818; distinguishing the amount of each respective quarter, so far as relates to England."

"Of the number of ox and cow hides, and also of the number of horse hides, which have paid the import duty in England, for the last two years ending the 5th of January 1818."

"Of the number of ox and cow and also of the number of horse hides exported, on which the drawback has been allowed in England, for the last two years ending the 5th of January 1818."

"Of the duty charged on leather for the last two years ending January 5th, 1818, so far as relates to Scotland, distinguishing the amount of each respective quarter."

"Of drawbacks allowed on leather exported for the two last years ending the 5th of January 1818, so far as relates to Scotland, distinguishing the amount of each respective quarter."

BANK TOKENS.] Mr. Curwen said, he thought it right to state to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the house, a circumstance which had just come to his knowledge, and which appeared to suggest the expediency as well as the means, of facilitating the transport of Bank tokens to London. He understood that those tokens might be had in the country at one per cent. under their nominal value, by any one who thought proper to purchase them. On these terms it was said that speculators were now buying them up, with a view to obtain gold for them at the Bank, which gold could be exported at a profit. From this fact, then, it was obviously the interest of the Bank itself to appoint an agent in each of the principal towns in the country, with a view to collect those tokens, and also to save its gold, which was surely a consideration of some importance, at a period when it was proposed to extend the Bank restriction act, in order to prevent the export of bullion. It was, besides, the duty of government as well as the Bank, to adopt some measures to save the labourers and other poor holders of those tokens from the necessity of selling them at a loss, in consequence of their inability to convey them to London.

SURGERY PRACTICE REGULATION.] Mr. Courtenay moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of surgery throughout the united kingdom. The object of the bill he described to be, first, to provide that no one should be allowed to practise surgery without a testimonial from some of the regular colleges of the united kingdom; secondly, that no more than the usual fee should be demanded and received for such testimonial; thirdly, that surgeons in the army or navy, who have obtained testimonials, shall be entitled to practise in any part of his Majesty's dominions; fourthly, that the provisions of certain Irish acts, for the regulation of public infirmaries or hospitals, should be extended to members of English and Scotch colleges; and lastly, for preventing male persons from practising midwifery, unless they shall have obtained a testimonial. Such being the provisions of a measure, the necessity for which, with a view to save the people from the danger of unskilful practitioners, was quite indisputable, he trusted that no opposition would be made to his motion.

Mr. Lockhart expressed an opinion, that if this bill originated with the surgeons, it must have a monopoly in view; but the effect of the bill would be, to injure a profession which ought to have too much pride to entertain any apprehension of the competition of pretenders.

The motion was agreed to.

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.] The house having resolved itself into a committee on this bill—Mr. Grenfell said, that from some circumstances which had come to his knowledge, he felt it necessary to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A report having prevailed last week in the city, that it was the intention of the right hon. gentleman to propose the funding of Exchequer bills, and that what were called the twopence halfpenny bills would be preferred, he understood that on Saturday last a communication was made to the Stock Exchange by the person who usually made known there the intentions of the treasury, that it was not proposed, on funding Exchequer bills, to grant a preference to any particular description of those bills, but to take those that were to be funded out of the general mass. Hence an impression prevailed in the city, that it was the intention of the right hon. gentleman to fund a considerable number of Exchequer bills. He did not wish for any information from the right hon. gentleman as to any part of his financial plan, which might not yet be matured; but, understanding that it was his intention, in all events, to fund a quantity of Exchequer bills, he requested him to state whether such was the fact? Because, if such were the purpose of the right hon. gentleman, that purpose should have immediate publicity, in order to put an end to the uncertainty and gambling speculations which at present prevailed in the city.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that he had already notified to the house, that it was not his intention to bring forward any part of his financial plan before Easter; and he trusted that it would not be thought improper on his part to decline any premature or partial disclosure of that plan. With regard to the communication to the Stock Exchange, the honourable member alluded, he presumed, to that made by the broker of the commissioners for redeeming the national debt. The fact was, that, understanding that a general expectation prevailed, that if Exchequer bills were funded, a preference would be given to those bearing an interest of twopence halfpenny a day, he gave directions to have it made known, that if any funding of Exchequer bills should take place, no such preference was intended.

Mr. Alderman Atkins expressed a wish, that the right hon. gentleman would favour the house with some further explanation, in order to remove the uncertainty that prevailed in the city. For his own part, he could not think it desirable to fund any Exchequer bills, and so to diminish the floating capital of the country. For how could it be politic to take such a measure as must operate to reduce the price of stock? Government could raise money at less than three per cent. in consequence of the present price of stock, whereas, if that price fell eight or ten per cent. it could not have money under four per cent. Such a fall would, he apprehended, be the result of funding, at present, a great quantity of Exchequer bills, and, therefore, he deprecated any such project as the right hon. gentleman was reported to entertain. Another report prevailed in the city, that it was the intention of the right hon. gentleman to propose the raising of a loan for the purpose of buying up the five per cents., and this was a plan which he (Mr. A.) would also deprecate. But at all events, he thought that no danger could result from the right hon. gentleman's at once explaining what were his views upon the points alluded to; and he hoped that the right hon. gentleman would give that explanation, in order to put an end to the fluctuations of property, occasioned by the present state of doubt upon such important subjects.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer hoped the house would feel the propriety of his silence with regard to the financial plan to be submitted to its consideration, until that plan was fully digested and matured—until, indeed, he actually proposed to have it carried into effect.

Mr. Grenfell approved of the intention of the right hon. gentleman not to make any premature disclosure of his plan, adding, that his only object in putting a question to the right hon. gentleman, was in order to do away the impression in the city, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had finally made up his mind as to the funding of Exchequer bills.

The bill went through the committee, the house resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

MALT, &c. DUTIES BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, and ordered to be reported to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Feb. 13.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] Lord Sidmouth presented, by command of the Prince Regent, another sealed bag of papers, which was ordered to be referred to the secret committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 13.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] The several accounts ordered on the 3d instant, relative to bank notes and bank post bills—the market prices of standard gold, &c.—the public balances of cash in the hands of the bank—the unclaimed dividends, including lottery prizes—the allowances to the bank, and the advances made by the bank, were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

SCOTCH BURGHS.] Mr. Douglas presented a petition of certain persons, members of the Seven Incorporations of the royal burgh of Dumfries, in North Britain; setting forth, "that the Municipal Government of that burgh has from time immemorial been exercised by what is called a town council, consisting of twenty-five members, that is, seven trades councillors elected by the petitioners, and eighteen merchant councillors, and from the latter are annually elected, by the whole council, a provost and three bailies, who do the duty of magistrates; it is extremely probable that Dumfries was erected into a burgh by the Parliament of Scotland, with authority to elect such a body as the town council, but the charter of erection has been lost or mislaid, as no person can now give any account of it; and, without doubt, by that charter the right of franchise was vested in the merchant and trades burgesses, though for a great length of time, from what cause the petitioners will not pretend to say, the town council have been in use to elect four new merchant councillors yearly, and to vote out four to make room for the new ones; the councillors elected by the petitioners being only seven to eighteen, of course, in all cases, the merchant councillors could command a majority; this would have been immaterial had the members acted independently, but it has so happened that the merchant councillors have always been under the domination of some selfish individual, who by adventitious circumstances obtained the ascendancy, and dictatorially named such persons for election as engaged and were best suited to support his views; thus have the merchant councillors almost uniformly been enthralled, and have servilely obeyed their leader, and been a self-elected junto; the evils resulting from that system in all the burghs had attracted the notice of the Parliament of Scotland, and various acts were passed with a view to correct the abuse, some of which acts strictly prohibit the election of any person except burgesses resident traffickers, that is, carrying on trade in the burgh, no doubt for the very obvious reason that they would be best acquainted with the affairs of the burgh, of course best fitted for the management, and most likely to be conscientious in discharging their duty, because interested in the prosperity of the place of their residence: but these very salutary acts have been totally disregarded by the merchant council of Dumfries, and, it is believed, by all the other burghs in Scotland, in so much that it has invariably happened that several members of the merchant council were not resident in Dumfries, some not even burgesses, till complimented with the freedom of the burgh after their election, and frequently persons have been elected though not residing in Scotland, or even in Europe, and in numberless instances it has occurred that the merchant council was partly composed of men improvident in their own affairs, in embarrassed or bankrupt circumstances, and such as were totally unworthy of any kind of trust; many have long anticipated the consequences of such a system, and now the dreaded climax has arrived, very extensive landed property has been frittered away to favourites at inadequate prices, which, with the annual revenues of the burgh, have been dissipated, and, as if to fill up the measure of iniquity, the merchant council, for, as already noticed, the other councillors were always out-voted, have contracted debts to a heavy amount, equal to if not beyond the value of all the funds of the burgh, which is thereby reduced to ruin if not to bankruptcy, and at this moment there is not a shilling to defray the necessary expense of the Municipal Government, and to pay the interest of sums mortified for behoof of public charities, and vested in their hands as a place of security, or to discharge salaries to clergymen, schoolmasters, and others; it is extraordinary, but undoubtedly true, that for above forty years past no statement has been made of the town's affairs; the councillors elected by the petitioners have, times without number, moved for such statement, but the motions were uniformly negatived by the merchant councillors, their leader, for reasons best known to him and them, not choosing it, or probably not daring to meet the disclosure it would have produced, so that every effort of the seven trades councillors proved quite unavailing, and it is understood that no court in Scotland has power to interfere; thus the merchant council are left ad libitum in contracting debts, while it is the opinion of the ablest lawyers, and very generally believed, that all burgesses are liable for these contractions; it certainly is inconsistent that any man, or set of men, should be responsible for the acts and deeds of men they never authorized, as to which they never were consulted, and to which they never assented; it is an outrage against the free principles of our happy constitution, justice denies it, and common sense revolts at such a state of things; in this statement, the petitioners may with truth confidently assert, no particular is exaggerated, and it can to the fullest extent be proved; hence it will appear the petitioners, in thus approaching the house, are not actuated by political motives, or a spirit of innovation, but a legitimate desire to obtain material justice and security, by such a reform as may protect them against the acts of a self-elected junto, the imperious necessity of which is palpable, and they rest in full confidence that the justice and wisdom of the legislature will grant a remedy for evils so clamant; and praying for permission to submit a bill for an act to obtain so desirable a purpose, or that the house may be pleased in their wisdom to grant such relief as may be found expedient."

The Lord Advocate concurred in the necessity of some legislative measure upon this subject, and expressed his intention to bring the question before the house in the course of the session.

Mr. W. Dundas said, that the accounts of the corporation of Edinburgh were regularly and unexceptionably arranged and examined; but he suggested that the accounts of the corporations of the several burghs in Scotland should, as well as those of Dumfries, be subjected to a regular audit. With this view he proposed that those accounts should be annually sent into the Exchequer, which should be authorized and directed to appoint persons for their audit and full examination.

After a few words from Lord A. Hamilton—

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, as was a petition to the same effect from the merchant burgesses of Dumfries.—Both petitions were, on the motion of Lord A. Hamilton, ordered to be printed.

ELECTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. Wynn said, that before he moved the order of the day for the further consideration of the report upon this bill, he felt it his duty to present a petition which he had been requested to lay before the house, although he had not promised to become an advocate for its prayer.—The petitioner who was the Rev. James Holmes, and, as he stated, perpetual curate of Scarsdale, in Derbyshire, while he had also a clerical office in Essex, and another in Middlesex, prayed, that as he had freeholds in Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, and Leicestershire, and as he might not be able to exercise his right to vote in all those places at the same election, a provision might be introduced into the bill before the house, to enable him, and others similarly circumstanced, to vote by affidavit.—(A laugh.)

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

The order of the day was then read, and the house went into a committee.

Mr. Wynn said, he was not aware that any alterations in the bill would be thought necessary, but if any hon. member had a clause to offer, he hoped he would bring it forward now, as it could be more conveniently discussed than in future stages of proceeding. He wished to propose the following exception. It was enacted, "that nothing herein contained shall oblige any justice of the peace to make any such appointment and apportionment of polling places, as are herein directed, for any city, borough, port, or place, where it shall appear that no more than 150 voters have polled at the last contested election, or for either of the two Universities of Oxford and Cambridge." Now, he understood, that nothing could be more regular than the mode of conducting elections in the city of London, where 8,000 electors were usually polled in eight days; and, therefore, he proposed to except that city, as well as the two Universities, from the operation of the bill.

This exception was agreed to, and the words "or the City of London," were added to the clause.

Mr. Lockhart called the attention of the committee to the following clause:—"And be it further enacted, that in every case where a poll shall be demanded at any election of members to serve in parliament, after such apportionment as aforesaid has been made, and such poll shall not have before finally closed, such poll shall finally close at the expiration of the seventh hour from the commencement of the same, on the second day, unless it shall appear at that time, that 400 voters in the whole shall then have polled; and that such poll shall finally close at the expiration of the seventh hour from the commencement of the same, on the third day, or upon any day subsequent to the third, if it shall appear that 400 voters shall not have polled during the course of such day: provided always, that it shall and may be lawful for the sheriff or returning officer, in all cases where it shall be made to appear to him upon oath, which oath such returning officer is hereby authorized and empowered to administer, that the voters have been prevented from coming up to the poll by reason of any riot, disturbance, or other obstruction, to adjourn the poll to the next day, and to keep the same open, although the number of voters herein directed may not then have polled."—It appeared to him, that this clause was not sufficiently distinct. If the 400 had not polled, a candidate might contrive to excite a riot, with a view to obtain time for the collection of votes. Such riot might, indeed, be revived day after day by the unsuccessful candidate, in order to harass his opponent. It also appeared, that the existence of the riot was not limited to the place of polling; for wherever or however it occurred, the power of the returning officer to adjourn the poll was to be established. Such a latitude of discretion might induce the officer to act with partiality, and thus the object of the clause would be defeated. He had not, he confessed, any particular alteration to offer on this point, but he felt it his duty to throw out these suggestions for the consideration of the author of the bill.

Mr. Wynn said, it seemed that some discretion in such cases must be allowed. It should be recollected, that it would afterwards be liable to the consideration of a committee of the House of Commons, and also to the severe censure of that House, if improperly exercised. He admitted, that a riot might take place a mile or two, or a greater distance, from the place of polling, which might prevent the voters from coming up, and it was to meet such a case that the clause under consideration was so constructed.

Mr. Lockhart thought, that the poll should not be re-opened to any voter, unless he swore that he had been obstructed in his progress by a riot.

No further observations being made, the clause was allowed to stand in its present form.

Mr. Wynn then adverted to a clause which empowered the returning officer to proclaim a candidate duly elected in certain cases, although a poll had been demanded against another. In framing this clause, he had endeavoured to keep in view the principle of the ancient rule in parliamentary elections. It was rather hard on a person to incur the trouble and expenses of a poll, when nobody opposed him. The subject, however, was not essentially connected with the rest of the bill. He did not wish to press it, if the sense of the house appeared adverse to it. In most cases, he believed, it would appear that a poll was likely to be demanded against a candidate. But, in the instance of a person having the support of all, it might be right to adopt the particular clause, to save him from considerable inconvenience.—The clause was in these words. "And for the prevention of unnecessary expense at elections, be it declared and enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the passing of this act, if at any election of two members to serve in parliament for any county, city, borough, port, or place, the returning officer shall declare the view or show of hands to be in favour of any two candidates, and if a poll shall be demanded against only one of such candidates, so declared to have the majority upon the view or show of hands, then the returning officer shall in such case direct proclamation to be made, that the other of such candidates, so declared to have the majority on the view or show of hands, will be declared duly elected, unless a poll shall be-demanded against him; and if upon such proclamation being so made, no person duly qualified by law so to do, shall demand a poll against such last-mentioned candidate, such returning officer shall forthwith declare such candidate, against whom no poll shall have been demanded, to be duly elected as one of the members to serve in parliament for such county, city, borough, port, or place, and shall proceed to take the poll for the election of the other member."—This clause was allowed to stand.

A long conversation then ensued on other parts of the bill, and, finally, it was agreed that the following clause should be introduced, immediately after the clause which excepted the two Universities and the city of London from the operation of the bill.—"And whereas in some counties there are separate general sessions of the peace and quarter sessions holden for the different divisions of such counties; be it further enacted, that in all such cases the high sheriff shall summon a general session of all the justices of the peace for such county, by public advertisement, to be holden at such place where such general sessions or meetings are usually holden, upon some day not more than two months from the passing of this act, for the purpose of carrying this act into execution; where such apportionment of the number of polling places for such county shall be made, subject to the like regulations hereinbefore directed."

The house then resumed, and it was ordered, that the report should be further considered on Monday next.

Board of Agriculture.] Mr. D. Gilbert presented a petition of the president and members of the Board of Agriculture, praying for further aid. The Prince Regent's recommendation being signified, the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Lyme Regis Harbour.] On the motion of Mr. Gordon it was ordered, that "accounts be laid before the house of what sum has been actually expended since the last session" (see vol. i. pp. 1825—1829) "in the repair of the Cobb at Lyme." "Of any report or reports of the officer of the royal engineers employed to conduct the repairs, and an estimate of the expense for completing the same." (See the Appendix.)

Chimney Sweepers Regulation Bill.]—This bill was read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

Grievances under the Suspension Act.] Mr. Bennet said, he held in his hand a petition of Joseph Mitchell, of Liverpool, the person to whom allusion had been made in the debate of a former evening (see page 338.) and of whom the Solicitor-General had been pleased to say, that his statements were unworthy of credit, because he had been one of the persons imprisoned. He had, beyond all question, suffered imprisonment without indictment or trial, but whether he was therefore unworthy of credit, he (Mr. Bennet) would leave others to determine. He most certainly believed the representations of harsh usage, unauthorized cruelty, and wanton treatment in the petition to be true. The facts were such as claimed the most serious attention of the house, and the prayer of the petition called upon them not to pass a bill of indemnity to screen ministers from the consequences of their abuse of the powers intrusted to them. The petition was brought up, and ordered to lie on the table.

On the question that it be printed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked whether the hon. member could state that it contained nothing disrespectful to the house.

Mr. Bennet said, it might contain one or two harsh expressions, but its general tenour was respectful.

It was then ordered to be printed. It set forth, "that the petitioner, whilst attending on his business as agent to several publishers, had on the evening of the 2d of March, 1817, his lodgings in Manchester forcibly entered, his bedroom searched for his person and papers, and his portmanteau attempted to be opened by false keys and picklocks, by Joseph Nadin, deputy constable of Manchester, and two of his men called runners; that the petitioner being informed of this nocturnal visit by a person who happened to be in the house at the time, and heard the landlord threatened with the loss of his licence if he informed the petitioner thereof, the petitioner, having a wife and six young children to provide for, sought refuge in the house of a friend; that the petitioner was driven from this retreat by Nadin and his assistants, who forcibly entered his friend's house in the night, and searched the same; and in this manner was the prisoner driven from house to house, Nadin threatening he would have him locked up in prison if it cost him (Nadin) 500*l*.; thus was he pursued until the 9th of March, when he left Manchester to seek a resting-place in the country, but being still pursued, he fled to his disconsolate family in Liverpool; that the petitioner had not remained many days with his agonized family, before he was informed that the police were about to search his house, and fearing that the shock occasioned by his being dragged from home in the dead of the night (that being the time generally chosen for tearing reformers from their beloved families) would be too great for an afflicted wife and six young but affectionate children to bear, he therefore again sought an asylum in the country; that the petitioner, having returned into the vicinity of Manchester, was instantly informed that a number of persons had been apprehended at a public-house in Manchester, charged with having conspired together for the purpose of destroying that town, many of which persons (if at all connected with such a plot) were believed to have been led and instigated thereto by spies and informers, who had gone about for the avowed purpose (as the petitioner was informed) of making Manchester, as they called it, a second Moscow; that the petitioner, finding this to be no resting-place for him, proceeded into Yorkshire, where he was advised to proceed to London and state these facts, with the popular opinion thereon, to some men who were both able and willing if possible to trace these plots to their true source; that the petitioner whilst in London met with a person named Oliver, who professed to be a reformer, and who urged the petitioner to leave London with him, stating, that the petitioner was in danger of being apprehended in London, and that he (Oliver) was in constant apprehension of being taken up, and that he had therefore determined to leave the country, and was then going to Liverpool to see a friend of his set sail for America, and also to prepare a passage for himself and family; that the petitioner left London in company with the said Oliver on the 24th of April, who on the road requested the petitioner to introduce him to a few steady reformers in any of the towns through which they passed where the petitioner had any acquaintance, which he accordingly did, in Birmingham, Wakefield, and Leeds, believing him to be a real reformer; that on the 4th of May the petitioner was seized by two ruffians, who took him by the collar as he was walking on the highway towards Huddersfield, and commanded him to return to some men who (these ruffians said) wanted him, which command the petitioner refused to comply with, asking them by what authority they stopped him on the king's highway? to which question they returning no answer, the petitioner attempted to proceed on his journey, when the ruffians, again seizing him by the collar, said, 'We will let you see our authority;' that the petitioner was by them detained on the king's highway until five or six other men came up to them, who ordered him to go along with them; the petitioner then inquired by what authority they detained and ordered him to go along with them, when two of them said that they were special constables, and that the petitioner should know further when he got to the place to which they intended to take him, adding that, if the petitioner refused to go with them, they would compel him, bidding some of their fellows to drag him along; that the petitioner was therefore obliged to go with them to a public-house, situated in a lonely place called Golker Hill, where he was taunted and otherwise abused through the whole of the evening; that when the petitioner retired to bed, a person was put into his room, who pretending to be a reformer, expressed much regret that it should have fallen to his lot to guard a person whom he could not but respect as a brother, and who exclaimed in bitter terms against those who were the cause of such unjust proceedings, adding, that not only a total change in 'Kings, Castlereaghs, and Commons,' must take place, but that 'all must be pulled down before any good would be done for the people,' which wretch the petitioner believes (as he then told him) was placed there for the purpose of leading the petitioner into some violent expression, and the petitioner was confirmed in this opinion, by hearing another person cough behind the door, on which the petitioner demanded that this vile fellow should leave the room; that the petitioner was next day taken before Justice Haigh, of Huddersfield, who, on one Brooks of Golker Hill stating that the petitioner was a reformer, and had attended public meetings, and that a reward was offered by government for his apprehension, ordered him to be remanded; on the petitioner remonstrating against being detained on so vague a charge, the worthy Justice replied, 'He would take all responsibility upon himself,' and delivered the petitioner into the care of a police officer named Whitehead; that the petitioner was conducted by Whitehead into a room in the George Inn, Huddersfield, where he asked the petitioner if he would pay for a person to guard him, on which the petitioner replied that he had neither the power nor the will to pay money for any such purpose; then Whitehead bade the petitioner to follow him to a lodging which he said was much better than the petitioner deserved; that the petitioner was then put into a place called Towzer, the most damp and nauseous dungeon imaginable, having no fire in it, the floor of which was nearly covered with human excrements, the bedding beyond description filthy, and the whole place was fœtid to such a degree that the petitioner scarcely thought it possible to exist therein until the next day; that the petitioner remained in this nauseous place twenty-six hours, after which he was removed to a room where Oliver appeared as a prisoner in great agitation; the petitioner was shortly removed to another house, where he was ironed, then placed between two thief-takers in a chaise, and conveyed to Manchester police office, and thence to the New Bayley prison; that the petitioner, when in the police office, and also in the New Bayley, demanded to be informed for what he was detained, and by what authority he had been apprehended, but no answer was given to him until the 7th of May, when the petitioner was brought before a number of gentlemen in a room belonging to the New Bayley, where one of them appeared to preside; here Nadin, the deputy constable, deposed that he had seen a warrant, signed (he doubted not) by the Secretary of State, authorizing the apprehension of Mr. Mitchell, on a charge of high treason; that this warrant had been returned to the Home Office, because they had heard that the petitioner was gone to America; that the petitioner requested to know whether the gentlemen who presided intended to keep him in custody on the mere deposition of Nadin? when he was informed that it was their intention to detain him until they heard further from the Home Office; the petitioner then requested to withdraw to his cell and straw bed, which was granted, where he remained until about twelve o'clock on the night of the 8th of May, when he was ordered to prepare for London; during his confinement in the New Bayley, the petitioner was insulted with the felons' allowance of food, and was told that Nadin had given orders that nothing else should be given to him; that the petitioner was then handcuffed, and so conducted to the police office thence to the coach, and was there very heavily ironed, which irons he bore all the way to London; being arrived there, the petitioner was taken to a public-house in Bow-street, and from thence before the Secretary of State, who ordered him to be put into close confinement until the 20th of May, when he was to be brought up for examination, as he understood; that the petitioner was then taken to Cold Bath Fields Prison, and put into a room with another prisoner, where he became dangerously ill, through, as he supposes, the baneful effects of that pestilential place in which he was confined at Huddersfield; the petitioner wishes to state, that although he still feels the ill effects of that destructive place at Huddersfield, he considers his present state of health to be owing to the kind attentions of his fellow prisoner, the doctor, and the governor; that the petitioner was again taken before the Secretary of State, who committed him to close confinement on suspicion of high treason; he was therefore remanded to Cold Bath Fields Prison, where he remained in close and solitary confinement, except being visited by Oliver three successive days on or about the 21st, 22d, and 23d of May, on each of which days the petitioner was fetched by a turnkey into a room in the governor's house, where his interviews with Oliver took place; that on the 30th day of December 1817 the petitioner was liberated, as he understood, without recognizance, until, on the 21st of January 1818, he was informed by the Mayor of Liverpool, that he had received a letter from the Home Secretary, which stated, that in consequence of his lordship having heard nothing against him since his liberation, his appearance on the first day of term in the Court of King's Bench would be dispensed with, and hoping that his future conduct would be such as never to render it necessary to call him into a court of justice; that the petitioner, in consequence of the Mayor's communication, deemed it necessary, though at a great and very inconvenient expense, to appear in the said Court of King's Bench, in order to get such supposed recognizance nullified, that he might not in future be subjected to extraordinary penalties on the misrepresentations of malevolent or interested men; that the petitioner, though altogether unconscious of having violated, or intending to violate, any constitutional principle or law of the land, but who on the contrary has made considerable efforts to preserve the peace of the country and the lives of his much aggrieved countrymen, whom he considered in danger of being goaded on by hunger and by spies to acts of desperation; that, in consequence of the petitioner's unjust imprisonment, his business is totally ruined, himself involved in very considerable embarrassments, his character traduced, and his friends and connections enormously imposed upon, by the misrepresentations of spies and informers, which spies and informers have introduced themselves to the petitioner's acquaintance under the pretence of collecting money for his or his family's use, and have otherwise so made use of his name to excite the more distressed parts of the labouring class to acts of violence whilst the petitioner was in prison, that the doors of his friends are shut against him, and himself precluded the possibility of providing for his helpless family through the common course of trade; that though the petitioner considers that the house furnished the ministers of the crown with that power which they have so wantonly and unprovokedly used against him, in dragging him from his family and immuring him in a solitary dungeon two hundred and forty-one days, yet the petitioner, trusting that such powers were granted for the wisest of purposes, implores that the house will not only refuse to give its sanction to a bill of indemnity, to screen those ministers who have abused the powers the house confided to them, but, as in times less oppressive, when the house interposed their powerful aid to stop the torrent of unjust persecution, they will now so take the petitioner's case into their most serious consideration, as to grant him that redress which will enable him to bring to justice such individuals as have so incalculably injured him, and also enable him to meet his friends and connections as he should have done had he not been so unjustly imprisoned; and the petitioner, forgetting the sorrows of a solitary imprisonment, will, as in duty bound, ever pray."

Mr. Bennet said, he had a petition from another of the same class of sufferers. It was the petition of Thomas Evans, of Newcastle-street, in the Strand. It contained a complaint of inflictions and cruelties, such as he had represented in his petition of last year, and the prayer was for inquiry into the truth of his allegations.—It was ordered to lie on the table.

Sir M. Ridley, on the question being put, that the petition be printed, rose to protest against any precedent that might be established by the Chancellor of the Exchequer having asked, when the question of printing a former petition was put, whether it contained any thing disrespectful, as if a petition respectful enough to be laid upon the table were not respectful enough to be printed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might put such a question before the petition was laid on the table, but every petition laid on the table was entitled to be printed.

Mr. Wynn said, that petitions might be laid on the table which contained statements that might make it improper to print them. It might be proper that the house should know their contents, and yet it might be improper to give them further publicity. The house ought, therefore, to use its discretion as to printing a petition in each particular case. The reason for printing at all, was for the convenience of the members of the house.

Lord Folkestone thought that the hon. member's argument went rather to shew the propriety of printing all petitions. How else could members become acquainted with their contents, unless the six hundred and upwards who composed the house were to go up, one by one, to the table, for the purpose of perusing the written petition? (Hear, hear.) He was surprised to see so many innovations introduced by those who made innovation one of their main arguments against the most important improvements. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was only since the last eight or nine months, that it became necessary to make a distinct motion for the printing of a petition. In his memory, every petition presented was printed at full length. They were gradually shortened; and, at length, a particular motion became necessary for the printing of a petition at all. He had on a former occasion (see page 126.) expressed his regret at this vote. It was a palpable injury to the people that every petition should not be printed, in order to come readily under the observation of the house; for they were only the servants, the representatives, of the people. He should not, however, be surprised, although he should be sorry, to find it ordered, that no petition be printed.

It was then ordered, that the petition of Mr. Evans should be printed. It set forth, "that the petitioner solicits the earnest attention of the house to the grievous and illegal persecutions which he is about to detail, in full confidence that he is able to adduce undeniable proof of the correctness of every allegation, and in ardent hope that the house, as the constitutional guardian of public right and avenger of individual oppression, will interpose their high authority to enable him to obtain plenary justice; that on the 18th day of April in the year 1798, the petitioner was seized, pursuant to a warrant charging him with high treason, issued by his Grace the late Duke of Portland, then one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state; that the petitioner was held under re-examination until the bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act was passed, and was then committed, on pretence of treasonable practices, to the House of Correction for the county of Middlesex, from whence he was transported to the county-jail at Winchester, and again to that at Chelmsford, at which jails he was treated with more rigour than the common felons, being denied during the whole period of this long imprisonment the use of books or the possession of pen, ink, or paper, or the access of friends or relations; indeed so severe was the nature and so lengthened the duration of this unjust confinement, that after his liberation the petitioner was frequently afflicted with a dropsical malady or species of erysipelas in his limbs, which has greatly impaired his former excellent state of health, and sometimes rendered him an invalid eighteen months together; that on the day following his arrest, the wife of the petitioner, though far advanced in pregnancy, was with their infant son committed on the same false charge to the House of Correction, amongst the female felons, from whence she was taken and examined before the Lords of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, through which nefarious artifice sufficient time having elapsed, she was, after enduring three days' imprisonment, permitted to return to the petitioner's house, which she found had, during her absence, been filled with police officers of the lowest and most brutal kind, who had been sent thither to apprehend every person that might visit the house whilst they held unlawful possession, which supposed authority they had acted upon to the extreme, even inviting some of the friends of the petitioner into the house, in order to comprise them within their assumed jurisdiction; and the police officers, when they had satisfied themselves with the number of their seizures, had abandoned the house to whatever accident might have befallen it, had not the sister of the petitioner's wife fortunately arrived and prevented further mischief by her presence; that at the end of two years and eleven months the petitioner was liberated without trial or any recompence for the manifold injuries he had sustained, and before he could proceed to obtain legal redress, the authors and inflictors of those injuries procured from Parliament an especial act of indemnity for this and other similar abuses of their ministerial trust; so that thus ruined in property, debilitated in health, and calumniated in character, his profession reduced, his connections broken up, and all the fruits of his previous industry dissipated, he found himself at length suddenly cast upon the world to maintain his family, under circumstances which seemed to forebode years of penury and privation; that the petitioner, since his liberation from this confessedly illegal imprisonment, had not taken any part in political affairs of any description, but had been sedulously engaged in the business which he had taken up, and from the labours of which for sixteen years he had never indulged in two successive days of recreation, his former persecution and unrequited losses having rendered the utmost industry and carefulness necessary on his part to provide for his declining years, and against the dangerous attacks of the incurable malady contracted in consequence of the rigour and closeness of his imprisonment; that the petitioner had succeeded through his unremitting exertions in establishing a manufactory of patent braces and spiral steel springs, to which he looked up as a secure shelter from the approaches of future distress, when, notwithstanding his inoffensive conduct, he was again assailed in a manner equally as unjustifiable and malignant as his first persecution was acknowledged to have been by the measures enacted to prevent the punishment of his oppressors; that early on Sunday morning the 9th day of February, 1817, the petitioner and his only son were seized by a party of the police led by John Stafford, who produced for his authority a warrant from Lord Viscount Sidmouth, one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, imputing to them suspicion of high treason, and directing the captors to seize their private papers, which having been obtained, the petitioner and his son were conveyed to the police office, Bow-street, where they were furnished with breakfast, but not brought or examined before any magistrate; that the petitioner and his son were about noon conveyed to the office of the secretary of state for the home department at Whitehall, and put into a room with James Watson, Thomas Preston, John Keens, and John Castle, with whom they remained until the evening, when the petitioner was singly taken before the lords of his Majesty's most honourable privy council, and informed that he had been arrested and stood charged on suspicion of high treason, which the petitioner immediately denied, pointing out to their lordships that the suspicion was wholly grounded upon the assertion of lord viscount Sidmouth, inasmuch as his lordship had not issued his warrant on the oath of any existing person; and the petitioner further challenged lord Sidmouth or any other person to depose that he had committed any breach of the law whatever, nor was the petitioner then, or at any other subsequent time, questioned before their lordships or any other magistrate relative to any criminal misconduct on his part; that towards eleven o'clock at night the petitioner was conveyed alone to the House of Correction for the county of Middlesex, on his arrival at which place he instantly in the presence of the king's messenger demanded a copy of his commitment: he was then conducted to what are called the state rooms, and lodged in one of them, in company with Thomas Curtis, a pardoned criminal, who had become an evidence for the crown, and was then in custody to be forthcoming at the trials of some of his confederates; that on the 11th day of February and third of his confinement, the petitioner obtained permission to write at the office of the prison, where he drew up a petition to the house, complaining of the outrage against the personal liberty of the petitioner and his son perpetrated by lord Sidmouth, which petition, addressed to lord Cochrane or sir Francis Burdett, per favour of Samuel Brooks, esq. Strand, the petitioner the same morning delivered to Mr. William Adkins, the governor, to be sent according to its direction, but it was sent to Whitehall and there detained, and in consequence it never was presented to the house; that the petitioner discovered, on his first interview with his wife after his incarceration, that this petition had not been presented to the house, on which the petitioner wrote to his solicitor, directing him to call at the office of lord Sidmouth, and demand that petition, or to procure an order for admission to the petitioner to receive another petition, or to sue out a writ of Habeas Corpus in order to bring the petitioner into court, that some definite legal accusation might be enforced, or his discharge obtained; that on the next interview with the secretary of state, the petitioner complained to his lordship of the detention of his petition at his office; his lordship however denied any knowledge of the circumstance, and stated he would order an inquiry, but on the petitioner meeting sir Nathaniel Conant below, sir Nathaniel, in the presence of Mr. Adkins, told the petitioner that 'the paper was in the office, and that any person might have it that called for it, but that he (sir Nathaniel) did not think himself a proper medium of communication between persons charged with high treason and sir Francis Burdett;' a day or two following, on the 25th of February, sir Nathaniel forwarded this petition to the solicitor of the petitioner, accompanied with a note, stating similar reasons for its detention at his office; that on the 27th day of February the petitioner was visited by his solicitor, when the petitioner furnished him with a second petition, which was the same evening presented to the house by the honourable Henry Grey Bennet; that the petitioner was taken six times before the secretary of state at Whitehall, on each of which occasions the petitioner did invariably solicit in the most earnest manner to be confronted with his accuser, or that the act of treason sworn to should be named, which being invariably refused, the petitioner constantly challenged the pretended charge of high treason as false and unfounded, unsupportable by evidence, and totally groundless in fact; and the petitioner moreover observed to their lordships, that he was held by mere arbitrary authority, inasmuch as no proceedings in law had been instituted against him, nor could he be legally restrained from retiring from that office to his own home; that on the first five times of the petitioner's examinations (as they were improperly denominated) he was each time remanded to prison on commitments by lord Sidmouth and sir Nathaniel Conant, both stating that the petitioner was charged before them on oath, and during this period the petitioner was denied the possession of pen, ink, or paper, or intercourse with his friends, or the knowledge of public affairs, his lordship having assumed the power to dispose of the petitioner at his will and pleasure, although the laws for the security of personal freedom were then in full force; that on the sixth and last time of the petitioner's examinations he was remanded on a commitment by lord Sidmouth only, the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill being then passed, in which commitment his lordship desisted from inserting the mention of any oath against the petitioner; that the petitioner, apprehensive that he would be detained for an indefinite length of imprisonment, did, on the 10th day of April, deliver to Mr. Adkins, the governor of the House of Correction, a petition addressed to the lords of his Majesty's most honourable privy council, praying, that if any legal charge had been preferred against him he might be liberated on bail, or investigation be instituted into his case forthwith, in order to enable him to prevent the utter ruin of his manufactory, and the reduction of his wife to extreme poverty; but in the afternoon of the same day the petitioner and his son (who had been kept separate from the petitioner since the first moment of his confinement) were removed to the Surrey County Gaol, Horsemonger-lane, where they were again separated, the petitioner was put in irons like a felon, and carried to one of the strong rooms or condemned dungeons, in which he remained until the 27th of July, in utter solitude, accommodated with a bag of chopped woollen rags for a bed, a tub in one corner for a water closet, a pail to hold water, a tressel for a table, a chair, a chamber-pot, a stick for a poker, and a bit of an old tin pot for a shovel, the use of candle was prohibited, and fire ordered to be extinguished at dusk; the petitioner was moreover denied the introduction of a box to hold his clothes, and his flute was taken away the instant of his arrival; that in the room beneath the petitioner's were confined three or four condemned criminals, whose lamentations, moans, and death songs or hymns, till the day of execution, were so piercing and incessant, that the feelings excited in the petitioner in that dreary situation altogether precluded him from enjoying any repose, and greatly aggravated his sufferings both personal and mental; that three magistrates visited the petitioner whilst he was ironed, and approved of his accommodation in every respect, unless the secretary of state should give contrary orders; the irons were however removed on the third day; that the petitioner was only allowed to have interviews with his wife through a grated door twice a week, in the presence of the turnkey, and the petitioner's wife was circumscribed to a single hour to visit the petitioner and his son, who was placed quite at the other end of the prison; that the petitioner in the month of June did petition the house for redress, in consequence of which he was visited by some members of the house, after whose visitation the petitioner was admitted to walk for exercise in a passage between two rows of cells, and he was allowed to have his musical instruments, a feather bed was furnished, and the use of candles was permitted; that the petitioner learns with astonishment and indignation that some of the allegations of that petition were contradicted, for the petitioner assures the house that there is no allegation in that petition which he is not prepared to prove at their bar to be strictly and literally true: that on the 27th day of July the petitioner was removed to the room of his son, who had been similarly ill treated during their separation; that throughout the period of the petitioner's recent imprisonment, with the exception of his wife, all his friends and relatives were prohibited from visiting him, notwithstanding his urgent solicitations to the contrary; that on the first day of this present month the petitioner and his son were taken to the office of sir Nathaniel Conant at Whitehall, and there offered to be released on entering into recognizances in the sum of 100*l.* each to appear in the Court of King's Bench on the first day of the present term, and from day to day to answer to such matters and charges as should then and there be produced against them, and not to depart the Court without leave, with which conditions the petitioner and his son refused to comply, insisting upon being brought to trial for the offences imputed to them, or being discharged unconditionally; that the petitioner and his son were liberated on the evening of the 20th instant, by order of lord Sidmouth, without being required to enter into any acknowledgments, and without any compensation for this illegal, unmerited and protracted persecution; that the petitioner particularly wishes to impress upon the attention of the house, that at each of his interviews with lord Sidmouth, between the period of his arrest and final commitment, the petitioner did uniformly insist upon being confronted with the person who was said to have made oath against him, but that no intreaty or demand could induce lord Sidmouth to comply with this just and legal request; and the petitioner consequently believes that the pretended charge of high treason against himself and his son was altogether a mere fabrication for the most wicked purposes, and that no person ever did make oath against them relative to any matter or thing which could warrant a suspicion of high treason; that the petitioner finds his business completely ruined, his future prospects overcast, and his character deeply injured by many false and scandalous rumours originating from this persecution; he has been treated with the greatest indignity, cruelty, and injustice, for no assignable cause whatever, except the personal hostility of lord viscount Sidmouth; the petitioner therefore prays that the house will institute an immediate inquiry into the allegations herein set forth, in order that the grievances of the petitioner may be fully redressed."

Mr. Bennet rose to present a petition from another of the same class of persons. It was from William Ogden, a man 74 years of age, who solemnly protested before God, that he had done no wrong, although he had been kept for nine months in confinement.

The petition was ordered to be printed. It set forth, "that the petitioner is an old man, seventy-four years of age, with a large family dependent on him for support, and during his absence his wife solicited the overseers of Manchester for relief, but was rudely refused any, as he the said petitioner was an advocate for parliamentary reform, although he has paid the poor rate in Manchester for thirty-six years, and by his two wives had seventeen children; he was seized, by a warrant from lord Sidmouth, on Sunday morning the 9th of March 1817, while in bed, the day before the meeting of the 10th; his house was rummaged, his property carried away, and all his papers, and though nothing was found but what was perfectly legal, he was committed to prison in solitary confinement, nor had he any meat allowed him from Sunday morning till Tuesday at three o'clock in the afternoon, when, on complaint to Col. Sylvester, the magistrate, he was ordered a threepenny pye, which was all the meat allowed him at that prison; he also informed the said magistrate that his shoes were broke, and not fit for such a journey, on which the magistrate said, 'Get him a pair, Nadin, get him a pair;' but the catchpole replied, 'Why did you not send for another pair?' to which the petitioner replied, 'I have not always two pair, and did not know of marching orders;' but Nadin replied, 'It's too late now,' and overruled the colonel, as none were given the petitioner; he was then loaded with a manacle not less than thirty pounds' weight, and treated in the most brutal manner by the constable, and Nadin his deputy, whom the petitioner has every reason to conclude was the informant against him; as he had for six weeks before declared to the petitioner personally, that if he did not discontinue his attendance at the public meetings he would apprehend him; conscious of the rectitude of his conduct, the petitioner disregarded his rude threat; but before the meeting of the 10th of March commenced he was apprehended by the said Nadin, and therefore did not attend; on application to face any informant, the petitioner was treated indignantly by the ferocious Nadin, and immediately posted off; the ponderous irons the petitioner was loaded with broke his belly, and caused an hernia to ensue about eight o'clock in the evening, when going to bed, and it was impossible to alarm the gaoler; the petitioner remained in that dreadful state for more than sixteen hours in the most excruciating torture; on the turnkey appearing in the morning, two surgeons were sent for, who, after using such means as seemed to them necessary, found nothing would do but the knife, and apprehended, from the petitioner's age (seventy-four), he should die under the severe operation; the pain he endured was so great, that he insisted on that means being resorted to; they unwillingly commenced the operation, which continued for one hour and forty minutes; and, praised be God, and the skill of the surgeons, the petitioner survived it, contrary to the surgeons' expectation, but much debilitated in his constitution, and he is fearful he shall never be able to follow his employ as a printer; Mr. Dixon the surgeon, and his partner, performed the operation in Horsemonger Gaol, and can witness to the truth of this statement; the wound in the groin of the petitioner was above seven inches in length, and Mr. Dixon had his entrails out of his belly in his fingers, like a link of sausages; Mr. Walters the governor was also there, and can speak to the fact here recorded; thus has an old man been torn from his family, and ruined in his business, by the base municipality of Manchester alone, who alone were the rioters, one of whom was a clergyman, the Rev. Mr. C. Ethelston; for the petitioner declares before God, who is both omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient, he had done no wrong, though he has suffered all this, and been near nine months in solitary confinement, through the machinations of mean unworthy men, who have disgraced the very source that created them; the petitioner, therefore, humbly hopes that the house will not pass any act of indemnity so as to preclude him from seeking that redress his hard case merits, and that remuneration which he is in justice entitled to."

Sir Francis Burdett rose to present a petition of a similar nature. He said, it was scandalous and disgraceful to the nation that so many innocent men could be seized and subjected to imprisonment, to want, and to irons: they were injured beyond almost any parallel. They had been arrested without a charge, they were confined and punished according to the pleasure of ministers, and they were most illegally discharged without an opportunity of proving their innocence and their sufferings. They had always pressed for a trial, but when the time came, their accusers shrunk from such a test of their conduct. He moved that the petition be read, and that it do lie on the table. It would not lie idle there, for the noble lord's (Folkestone) motion would give an opportunity of making due use of it.

The petition was read and ordered to be printed. It was the petition of John Stewart, weaver in Glasgow, and set forth, "that the petitioner was apprehended by the sheriff of Lanarkshire on the 22d of February last year, and put in prison, where he remained seven weeks and three days, when he was liberated on bail, without having been charged with any specific crime; that from the 22d till the 26th of the said month, he continued in jail without fire, candle, provisions, or even a bed to rest upon, in that cold and inclement season of the year; that his prison allowance was only four shillings and eight pence per week, two and sixpence of which was expended in the articles of coals, candle, and other necessary things, leaving only two shillings and two pence to find him in weekly subsistence; that the petitioner has a wife and three children who suffered severely from the want of his labour and company, while the loss of work, the expense of a bail-bond, and other charges connected with his confinement and liberation, have reduced his circumstances and require redress; may it therefore please the house to take the above into serious consideration, and grant such redress as to them may seem meet."

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented a petition of certain inhabitants of the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, which the clerk began to read. It expressed their conviction, in common with that of the whole kingdom, that the house did not in any intelligible or constitutional sense represent the people, that they were the instruments of a weak and contemptible administration, who had suspended the constitution of the country, and punished the people at their pleasure. It then proceeded in these terms:—"If the house will not listen to their complaints, or grant the required reform, they will most certainly resist the payment of taxes."

Lord Castlereagh rose to request the clerk to read the last sentence over again. This being done, he rose again, amidst the cheers of the house, to say, that the language and spirit of the petition were neither respectful to the house, nor reconcileable with the laws and constitution of the country. He, therefore, moved, as an amendment, that it be rejected.

Sir F. Burdett contended, that, as the petitioners were to resist the payment of taxes only in a legal manner, their petition ought to be received. It was the very principle and spirit of the constitution, that the people should pay no taxes but through their representatives. If, then, they were called upon to pay taxes which their representatives had not imposed, the constitution and laws of the country should protect them from the payment of those taxes.

Lord Castlereagh rose again, and barely read the obnoxious sentence.

There was a general call for strangers to withdraw, but the petition was rejected without a division.

Sir F. Burdett then presented ten petitions of inhabitants of Bath, praying for universal suffrage and annual parliaments.—Ordered to lie on the table.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] On Mr. Brogden's bringing up the report of the Exchequer bills bill,

Mr. Tierney said, he had a question to put to the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to which he felt it of great importance to obtain a definite answer. The right hon. gentleman had called for a grant of thirty-nine millions by Exchequer bills: he was then satisfied with a grant of thirty millions, which, it was represented, would be sufficient to meet all the charges on the revenue previous to the Easter holidays. What, therefore, he wished to know was, whether the sum of six millions, to be paid to the Bank on the 5th of April next, was included in these thirty millions? In other words, would this grant meet the current expenses, and discharge the demand of the Bank?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that it would fully meet the current expenses, and the whole sum, due to the Bank, if necessary, but he was inclined to think, that the repayment would be gradual, for the mutual convenience of the parties.

Mr. Tierney said, whether the repayment were in one sum, or by partial payments, was a secondary consideration. The fact he wished to ascertain was, would the six millions be paid to the Bank at the time fixed by the act of parliament for its repayment?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that no part of this sum would be due until the 5th of April. Then the repayment would commence, and, as he had said, would, for mutual convenience, be gradual.

Mr. Tierney remarked, that the convenience of the party to whom the money was to be paid, would be best consulted by liquidating the demand. It was most important to the country that it should be repaid to the Bank at the time specified by law, because it went to afford to the Bank the facilities of meeting its engagements with the country, by paying its notes in cash. But, what said the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night? That on the 5th of April the payment of the six millions would take place? No such thing—it would only commence. So that, if the right hon. gentleman should think proper to pay the Bank a one pound note, he thought the enactment was fulfilled. On a former evening he (Mr. T.) had congratulated himself on having at length pinned down the Chancellor of the Exchequer to something precise. But now they were wholly at sea again. Every thing definite that the right hon. gentleman had before stated, relative to the payment of these six millions to the Bank, at the time specified, he had now knocked on the head. If there had been any arrangement between the right hon. gentleman and the Bank, in common candour why not state it? Then we should start fair. What he now heard, satisfied him as to a rumour which he had that very day heard from persons conversant with these affairs, that the repayment of these six millions to the Bank, as positively asserted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, never was in contemplation. He was never able to comprehend what the right hon. gentleman was at. All persons who thought they understood the English language, fancied the other evening that the right hon. gentleman had said, that the Bank would be paid in money. Now, however, it appeared, that nothing of the kind was to take place. The best rule for hon. members would be, whenever they asked the right hon. gentleman a question, to wait for a fortnight before they satisfied themselves that they completely understood his answer. (A laugh.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was persuaded that the right hon. gentleman was the only person in the house who understood him on a late occasion in the way in which he had described. On that occasion the right hon. gentleman asked him, whether the six millions which would become due to the Bank of England on the 5th of April next, would be paid in Exchequer bills, or in money? His reply was, that it would be paid in money. But he had not said—indeed the question had not been asked him—that it would be so paid on any given day. His answer was simply to be understood in this sense, that government did not intend to renew the six millions in Exchequer bills, but that, at some period within the time specified by act of parliament, that sum would be paid to the Bank in money. He had not stated the precise time when it would be actually paid, but the want of the money could in no way impede the resumption of cash payments by the Bank, abundant provision having been made with reference to that object.

Mr. Tierney observed, that holding in his hand an act of parliament, which said, that the six millions should be repaid to the Bank on the 5th of April next, he had asked the right hon. gentleman whether it was his intention to repay it in Exchequer bills or in money? The right hon. gentleman replied, in money. He (Mr. Tierney) certainly then understood that it was to be so repaid in money on the day specified in the act. Such was the obtuseness of his intellect, that, when he knew that money became due on the 5th of April, and when the right hon. gentleman told him that it was to be paid in money, he was fool enough to believe that it would be paid on that day. (A laugh.)

Mr. S[illegible] wished to ask whether it was the intention of government to pay the six millions to the Bank of England before the expiration of the act which authorized the Bank to suspend their payments in cash?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied [illegible] it would be paid in such sums as might be required (hear, hear.)

Mr. Grenfell declared, that the [illegible] on his mind, from what had fallen from the right hon. gentleman on a recent occasion, was, that this payment was to take place, in cash, or in bank notes, on the 5th of April. But now the right hon. gentleman said, it was to be paid as it might be required by the Bank; though, but two minutes before, he had stated, that it would be paid before the end of the session. By the act of 1816, an option was given to government to prolong the payment to the Bank of this loan of six millions for three years. Did the right hon. gentleman mean to state, that, if the Bank did not require the money, or if he were not disposed to pay it, he should feel justified in delaying the payment to the extent of that period? It was not, however, entirely for the purpose of putting this question that he had risen. He rose to express his hope, that the right hon. gentleman, in raising money, would adhere to the system which had been pursued so advantageously for the public, in the mode of issuing Exchequer bills, during the last five months; namely, to issue them at the rate of two-pence per cent. per diem, which was equal to about three per cent. per annum. If from this were deducted the premium of one per cent. borne by those bills since October, it would appear that money might be raised at present at so small a rate as two per cent. This was certainly a state of things extremely advantageous. Besides the positive saving (which, if the same amount of Exchequer bills were issued this year as in the last, would come to five or six hundred thousand pounds) there was another most important benefit, namely, the tendency to keep down the rate of interest of money in the country. Government being able to raise money at two per cent. must in time establish as low a rate of interest throughout the country. He was one of those who were of opinion, that a low rate of interest must be highly advantageous to the community. It was in itself evidence of a state of prosperity. It stimulated national industry; it stimulated commerce; it stimulated agriculture. It afforded facilities to that great, respectable, and preponderating class, the landed interest, to raise money on the security of their estates at a moderate interest, for the improvement of their property. During the latter periods of the late war, it was absolutely impossible for any gentleman of landed property to raise a shilling on that property at legal interest; and those who felt an imperious necessity to raise money on their estates, were compelled to do so, either by an infraction of the existing law, or by consenting to the most onerous and ruinous terms. He wished to add a few words with respect to the discounts of the Bank of England. He had not the [illegible] to interfere with the [illegible] of the Bank in this respect. He was far from thinking that that house had any right to interfere with the Bank respecting the rate of discount. At the same time, [illegible] the privileges, immunities, and advantages which the Bank derived from their [illegible] with government and the legislature, he hoped he should not be thought too assuming, when, as a member of that house, and with a view to the production of as low a rate of interest as possible, he suggested whether it might not be expedient, and becoming, in the Bank of England to reduce their rate of discount from five to four per cent. If, as a Bank proprietor, he were addressing the court of proprietors, he would recommend such a measure, even on the ground of its advantage to the Bank itself, as there was little or nothing to do while the discount was maintained at five per cent. while, in all probability, there would be a great deal to do were the discount reduced to four per cent.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to the question with which the hon. gentleman commenced his observations said, that the option of postponing the repayment of the six millions to the Bank for three years would not be accepted, but that they would be repaid in the course of the year. He agreed, in a great measure, with what had subsequently fallen from the hon. gentleman, and must express the great gratification which his Majesty's ministers derived from being able to raise money on more advantageous terms than had ever before been obtained in this country.

The report was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

The Malt, &c. Duties Bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

CONSTABLES OF WESTMINSTER.] Mr. Calcraft presented a petition of William Lee, high constable of Westminster, and the petty constables acting under him, praying for a remuneration for attending the houses of parliament. The Prince Regent's recommendation being signified, the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] Lord A. Hamilton rose to make a motion relative to some late transactions in the burgh of Montrose, which were likely to have a material influence on the future situation and destiny of Scotch burghs.—He said, he should commence by declaring what his intended motion was not, and then proceed to state what it was. It was not any disguised motion for parliamentary reform, nor had it any necessary connection with that unwelcome topic. His motion would be, for the production to this house of those proceedings of the privy council, which were technically called the act and warrant, by which a new election of magistrates had been granted by government to the burgh of Montrose, and also a radical and important alteration had been made in the old constitution of that burgh. The learned Lord Advocate had declared last session, when he (Lord A. H.) had supported the prayer of some Scotch petitions for parliamentary reform, that the people of Scotland were satisfied with things as they were. Such a declaration would surely not be made now. They who had observed what had passed in that country for the last six months, who had noticed how many public meetings had been held for the sole purpose of considering the abuses and mismanagement in their burghs, who had seen how all the newspapers in that country had teemed with resolutions from the different burghs, stating the grievances which they actually suffered, and the helpless and cruel condition of distress and insolvency to which they were approaching, would find some difficulty in believing the learned lord's assertion of last year—that the people of Scotland were satisfied with these matters as they were. He was convinced, that neither the noble lord opposite, nor any other member of his Majesty's government, if he could be made perfectly acquainted with what had passed, and was passing, and likely to continue, in the Scotch burghs, would voluntarily continue that system of fraud which wasted the resources, and of self election in the magistrates, which eluded and defied all responsibility. One fact alone would shew the wretched state of things in those burghs—it was this—that the inhabitants of a burgh in Scotland, who had no voice in the appointment of the magistrates of that burgh, and no control over their conduct, were nevertheless liable, according to the best information he had been able to obtain, and according to the highest legal opinions, for whatever debts they might in their magisterial capacity contract. Indeed, it had been solemnly decided, within the last fifty years, both in the court of exchequer and court of session, that they, the said courts, had no jurisdiction against the magistrates of a burgh, in questions of general account. This abuse was founded upon another still greater—namely, self election in the magistrates—a practice contrary to all reason, sense, and justice, and to every principle of the British constitution. Indeed, it was an abuse of such a nature, when applied to a corporate body, which had duties to perform, that the wit of man could not contrive a mode better calculated to produce the most domineering arrogance in these municipal governors, and in the helpless governed the most abject state of subjection and servility. In several burghs in Scotland, the magistrates, if they chose, were, year after year, self elected in perpetuity. In most, the matter of election was so managed that it amounted to the same thing. In other burghs, the magistrates were not bound to reside, and, in fact, did not reside, and were rarely seen in the burgh, whose concerns they pretended to manage, except once a year, to be re-elected. All these were abuses of the most discreditable and injurious nature. It was not his wish or intention upon the present occasion, to excite any unpleasant feelings on the subject. He by no means meant any hostility to the learned lord, or the honourable gentlemen opposite. He should be very sorry if any thing he said or did, should be injurious to that cause which he was anxious to serve. It was the cause of Scotland, and, in his conscience, he believed, that in no way could he more effectually promote the best and permanent interests of that country, than by using his humble efforts to effect the destruction of this odious system of burgh management, to annul that abominable abuse, the self-election of magistrates, and to establish the liability of those entrusted with the funds and possessions of burghs, to have their management brought to the test of strict and accurate accounts. He would now proceed to detail the particulars of the case, which had occasioned his motion.—What had occurred was this:—In the course of last year, an irregular election of the magistrates took place at Montrose—it was deemed, indeed, wholly void—and thus the burgh, in its corporate capacity, had lapsed, and become dormant. There existing no power within it to revive itself, application was made through the Lord Advocate to the King in council, to re-establish the functions of the burgh, by granting what is called a poll-election, that is, an election of the magistrates and council by a general vote or poll of the burgesses. Thus far he had nothing to object to. But, besides this poll-election, the act and warrant of his Majesty in council had taken to itself the privilege of also granting a change in the set or constitution of the burgh; and this, he contended, was an usurpation of illegal power.—And although he was ready to admit, that the alteration was an improvement, and a benefit to the burgh, yet he must object even to a benefit, if it was conferred through the medium of an usurped and unconstitutional power in the crown. He would illustrate his meaning by reference to what took place last session, in regard to the distinguished person who lately sat in the chair. A message from the crown was brought down to the house, soliciting the means of making provision for Lord Colchester. Now, although the sense of the house was in favour of the thing to be done, there existed a very general, and very just, resistance to the manner of doing it, because the house of commons thought that any pecuniary remuneration to their speaker ought to emanate and originate from themselves. So, he said, with regard to Montrose. The crown was right in reviving the dormant power of election, but if any change were to be made in the burgh itself, it ought to have been made by parliament, and not by the mere will of the crown, that is, by ministers. He would not pretend to set up his opinion in opposition to the opinion of the Lord Advocate, of the Attorney and Solicitor-general and the privy council—nor did he; but he had endeavoured to avail himself of legal authority in Scotland by every means in his power, and could find no authority, dead or living, which would sanction this extraordinary power in the crown. Would the privy council do the same thing in other burghs under similar circumstances? What had been done amounted to nothing more nor less than this—that the crown took on itself to alter the constitution of a burgh in such a way, as materially to affect the representation in that house. It constituted new offices, to which the right of voting for a member of parliament was attached. Was the noble lord of opinion, that, as often as any burgh in Scotland fell into a situation similar to that in which Montrose had been placed, such burgh might not only be revived by the crown, to which indeed there could be no objection, but might also be new-modelled according to its pleasure? It was no argument in favour of the proceeding, to say that the new set granted to Montrose was superior to the old one. If the crown, on its own specific authority, could give a constitution better and more enlarged than that which originally existed, it might, if it chose, under the same power, or assumption of power, give one worse and more contracted; nay, further, if the crown could change the set in September last, as it had done, it could change it again in January, and again in June, and thus the form, if not the existence, of all the Scotch burghs was dependent upon the mere will of the crown, or rather upon the will or caprice of its ministers. He wished to have this preliminary point settled previous to calling the attention of the house to a more extensive consideration of the subject on a future day. What he called in question was, the power of the crown to alter the constitution of these burghs, and not its power to revive their lapsed or dormant existence. Supposing that parliament should take into consideration the grievous mismanagement, and decayed state, of the Scotch burghs, and should effect an amelioration of their situation, what cause would Scotland have to rejoice in such a just and beneficial measure, if, the moment afterwards, his Majesty's ministers might abrogate all that had been done, by granting a new set, and making what alterations in it they pleased? There was another point to which he wished to advert. The learned lord knew very well, that there was a society in Scotland called the Convention of Burghs. This Convention, he believed, claimed the power by law, but certainly had in fact exercised the power, of altering the constitution of several burghs. Now, if this Convention had such right, and if his Majesty's government had also the same right, he begged to know to which of these authorities the burghs must submit? He would ask the learned lord which of these conflicting powers was supreme, which subordinate? or, whether they had both concurrent jurisdiction? And in the last case, if their edicts in these matters should not agree, who was to decide between them, and what was the legal remedy, or appeal? Many of the burghs of Scotland were so overwhelmed with debt at this moment, that little or no revenue remained for their current expenses, and the burgesses felt considerable alarm for their own individual and private property. He believed, that, according to the best authority on this point, the burgesses were liable for the debts of the burgh. And it was notorious throughout Scotland, that many of the burghs were involved in the greatest financial difficulties, and were threatened with dissolution. It had already happened in one, that no persons could be persuaded to undertake the office of magistrates. Several individuals had refused to act after being elected. If no political interests were concerned, he was sure that the state of long continued abuse they had suffered, and of degradation into which they were fallen, would excite the sympathy of all parties in the house. But he would not now enlarge on that subject, he would rather say too little than too much on these collateral points; his object was, to procure a fair and candid consideration of the immediate subject before the house. He must repeat, that his objection was not to the thing done, but to the manner of doing it; not to the alteration of the set, but to its being done by the crown, which he could not but think as illegal in fact, as in spirit it was unconstitutional. The noble lord concluded with moving, "that there be laid before this house, a copy of the act or warrant of his Majesty in council, dated in the month of September 1817, authorizing the guild brethren and inhabitant burgesses in the burgh of Montrose, to elect fit persons to be magistrates and town-councillors of the same, and authorizing and ordering an alteration in the former set or constitution of the said burgh in all time coming."

Lord Castlereagh said, that if he had regarded this as a mere legal question, involving the consideration of a branch of the laws of Scotland, he should have left it to his learned friend, (the Lord Advocate) to reply to the statement of the noble lord; but viewing it in another and in a more extensive manner, he should object to the motion on those grounds. He felt great pleasure in admitting, that the speech of the noble lord had been marked with every degree of candour:—he had stated, that it was not his wish to connect the particular reform which he desired, with any general reform in the representation—he had rather in view an improvement in the administrative than in the representative character of the burghs: but although he had not opened the general question of parliamentary reform, his motion certainly went to that object. The reform which he wished would lead to an extensive change in the burgh elections of Scotland, and, therefore, would carry reform into the representation of that part of the country. But he had not adduced very strong reasons for the production of the document, even on the more limited ground of improvement in the administration of the burghs. There might be defects in that administration, as there were in every institution; but, in so far as his Majesty's ministers were acquainted with the state of the country, there was no part where the population was in a sounder condition than in the burghs of Scotland. There seemed, however, to be a defect in the law with respect to those burghs. The noble lord had stated, that the inhabitants had no power to take cognizance of their pecuniary concerns, or to control the administration of their funds. But this evil might be obviated by the bill which he understood his learned friend (the Lord Advocate) intended to introduce. With respect to assuming a right of taxation, he could not conceive that, in any of the burghs, the magistrates and town-council would think of setting up an arbitrary right of assessing their fellow-citizens, or that there could be any difficulty in resisting an attempt of that nature. As to the legality of what had been done, he thought that the house were not likely to be good judges of that subject. Whether the charter was or was not legal, according to the law of Scotland, was rather a question for the judgment of a court of law, than for the decision of that house. No individual of Montrose could be affected by the change who had not his legal remedy: he might, in a court of law, question the legality of the election of magistrates under the new charter. The question might also be brought forward in the convention of Burghs; that convention might refuse admission to the delegate from Montrose, and then the question, whether that delegate had a right of admission or not, might be discussed. The noble lord had argued, that though the present arrangement for the burgh of Montrose was good in itself, ministers might afterwards make other arrangements, of a very different character, to favour political views. But here, it appeared that, the act had grown out of the circumstance of the suspension of all the powers of the burgh. The relief was generally solicited—there was not one complaining party; and, therefore, it was unfair to consider an act called for under such circumstances, as the beginning of an arbitrary system of interference with the constitution of these burghs. It was enough to shew, that, in the present case, the crown had not wantonly invaded the corporate rights of the burgh. Whether the crown was authorized to act as it had done, was a question that might come before the house in a much more suitable way than by the present motion. It was not impossible that the election of the member for that class of burghs to which Montrose belonged, might be questioned by the unsuccessful candidate, and a committee of the house, acting on their oaths, under the Grenville act, might have to dispose of it.

Mr. Abercromby contended, that this question had no connection with the subject of parliamentary reform, except in so far as any question which had reference to the persons who returned members to parliament could be considered as connected with that subject. Had the crown in this case only exercised those powers which were necessary to give activity to the administration of the burgh, which was suspended by the non-election of magistrates at the proper time, no complaint could have been made; but not contented with this, the crown had completely altered the set of the burgh.—The alteration might be very beneficial in this instance; but a precedent was established, which, in the hands of bad ministers, might be employed to justify the worst encroachments. The noble lord had told them, that the question might be discussed with more propriety elsewhere. But it was not likely that any of the inhabitants of Montrose, who were all pleased with the alteration, would dispute it in a court of law. A committee under the Grenville act might decide on the merits of a particular election, but could not determine the general question. He could have wished that his noble friend's motion had been more complete—that he had also moved for the old set of the burgh, that the house might have seen the extent of the alterations made by the crown. If the crown had exercised a power which did not belong to it, parliament was bound to interfere. He was not acquainted with the laws of Scotland, but, in his view of the question, the act of the crown, in altering the set, was illegal, as the rights of the burgh were not abrogated and dissolved, but only dormant. In England, when there is a failure to elect corporate officers, the corporation is, so far as relates to its power of action, dissolved, until revived by the crown. At all events, an inquiry ought to be instituted, more particularly as he understood that, in the course of the present year, five or six burghs would be in a similar situation to that in which Montrose had lately stood. Connected as he was with Scotland, he was glad to hear from the noble lord a language respecting that country so different from that which he had heard from him before:—all was now smooth and tranquil, there were no secret committees, no disloyalty or disaffection, and it was owing to the excellent conduct of the magistrates of burghs that things went on so orderly!

The Lord Advocate said, that, upon a late occasion, no charge of disloyalty or disaffection had been brought by his noble friend, or himself, against the people of Scotland generally—it was only Glasgow and its neighbourhood to which the charge of taking illegal oaths applied. With respect to the question now before the house, the noble lord (Lord A. Hamilton) had stated, that the magistrates of a burgh in Scotland possessed an unlimited power of taxing the property of the inhabitants. That this statement was unfounded must be obvious to the house, and he was surprised that its absurdity had not struck the noble lord himself. Had the noble lord forgotten, that, in the declaration of grievances, at the revolution, it was expressly stated, that, to levy money, without the consent of parliament, was illegal? He would ask the noble lord, whether, in any of the burghs which he declared to be in a state of utter insolvency, a single suit had ever been brought against any one of the inhabitants for payment of the debts of the community? From the revolution downwards, with, he believed, one single exception, and which was so only in appearance, no case had occurred in which the burgesses were held to be liable for debts contracted by their magistrates. He knew that opinions had been given by counsel, that the inhabitants were liable for the debts of the burgh; (hear) but, although those opinions had been given many years ago, no suit had ever been commenced on them, and opposite opinions had been given, even by some of the counsel whose names had been so triumphantly, but so unusually, proclaimed on a former evening. (See page 2[illegible]7.) He could inform the noble lord, that the magistrates of some burghs had attempted to levy petty customs for the defrayment of the public debt; in Aberdeen, for instance: but the question was ultimately decided, on appeal to the House of Lords, that the magistrates of burghs had no such power to levy customs. The noble lord, in another part of his argument, had referred to a case decided by the barons of the exchequer, but he had quite mistaken it. It was alleged, that, by an old Scotch act, the barons of the exchequer were empowered to audit the accounts of royal burghs; but, in the case in question, the barons refused to sustain that jurisdiction. This was, however, merely a question of audit. There was hardly a year in which some of the burghs did not make application to the legislature for a power of levying money to pay their debts: but, if the magistrates possessed that power, would they think it necessary to apply to parliament? The noble lord had stated, that the inhabitants of the burghs were placed in the most abject state of servility, because the old council annually elected the new. But, surely, the power of appointing successors, was not worse than the power of holding places for life. In a great many parts of England, the magistrates of boroughs were appointed for life. It was strange, then, that those who blamed the Scotch burghs, did not blame the close boroughs in England.—The noble lord had said, that the advice given to the crown, in the case of Montrose, was illegal, but he had not adduced a single argument in support of his proposition. Perhaps, the noble lord was not aware, that the legality of the power exercised by the crown, in the case of the burgh of Montrose, was virtually recognized in the declaration of grievances. The grievance imputed to King James was, not that he had altered the constitutions of burghs, but that he had done so of his own authority, "without judgment, surrender, or consent." In the case of the burgh of Stirling, in 1781, a similar warrant had been issued. Counsel were heard in that case before the new constitution was granted; and although the set of that burgh was afterwards brought before the court of session several times, and before five or six committees of election in the House of Commons, it was never objected, that the warrant was void and null. In 1789, a motion was made to inquire into the state of the burghs in Scotland; and, in the report of the committee, the modes were discussed in which alterations could be legally made, by course of time, by the burghs themselves, and by the act of the crown. The case of Stirling was referred to, and the right of altering the set, as was done in 1781, was not questioned. The alteration in Stirling was precisely the same as that which had been made in the burgh of Montrose. There was, therefore, no ground for the allegation, that the exercise of the prerogative of the crown was illegal.—But the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Abercromby) had contended that the act of the crown was illegal, because, when a burgh in Scotland was reduced to the state in which Montrose had been, its charters were not, as in England, abrogated, and dissolved, but were only dormant. From this he inferred, that the hon. gentleman admitted that, in England, when a burgh lost its charter by a failure to elect corporate officers in the terms of its charter, it might be revived with such alterations in its constitution, as the King might deem advisable. Now, if this were admitted by the hon. gentleman, and he believed it could not be denied, there was an end of the question. The hon. and learned gentleman had professed himself to be totally ignorant of the law of Scotland. It appeared by the question now at issue, that he might have professed himself equally ignorant of the law of England. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that, in England, when there was a failure to elect corporate officers, the whole corporation was dissolved. But was the hon. and learned gentleman so little read in that law as not to know, that that point had been solemnly argued before Lord Mansfield in the year 1775, and settled, by the unanimous opinion of the Court of King's Bench, exactly the other way? In fact, in this respect, the burghs of England and Scotland were in precisely the same situation; and if, when a warrant of revivor was granted in England, changes could legally be made in the constitution of the burgh, the same might be done in Scotland. He had been asked by the noble lord, whether he intended to propose the same alteration in every burgh, which, by neglect, might be disfranchised? He should answer no. Every case must stand on its own merits. The same constitution could not possibly be applied to all the burghs, because electors, with the same qualifications, could not be had in all of them, the situation of the burghs being radically different. And here he wished to state distinctly, that no general measure could be adopted for reforming the charters of the Scotch burghs. Their charters, no doubt, might be abrogated in a mass, and their ancient rights destroyed—the burgh system might be overturned, and a new one introduced—but, by one general measure, to require that all the burghs should adopt the same constitution, would be absolutely and physically impracticable.—It was said, that the question did not touch on parliamentary reform. This was true, if the question was confined to the consideration of the particular case; but if, in defiance of the act of Union, it was intended to introduce a new system of election in all the burghs, it would have the same effect as a sweeping measure of parliamentary reform—(Hear, from the opposition.) The gentlemen opposite imagined that there was an inconsistency in this argument; but he contended, that the power which the crown had enjoyed before the union, was continued to it by that act. His assertion in the last session, that the people of Scotland were satisfied with the constitution of their burghs, he would repeat. He did not mean to say, that they were unanimous. The Scotch were not famous for unanimity, as it was always supposed that an argument was a favourite amusement with that ancient people. (Hear.) But he had no doubt that the majority were satisfied, though great pains had been taken to excite a ferment. In four-fifths of the burghs there had been no meeting, and in the others, the meetings had taken place among those subordinate corporate bodies, who wished to have the privilege of choosing their own deacons. He was convinced that the greatest alarm would prevail, if a general change in the constitution of the burghs were apprehended. He would merely add, that it was his intention, during the present session, to bring in a bill for the regular audit of the accounts of the burghs, and this would remove all the objections to the present state of the law.

Mr. Abercromby explained. He said, that the learned lord had wholly misapprehended his argument, which was, that in England a corporation is dormant until revived by the crown, which decides whether it will revive the corporation at all, and upon what terms; but that, as he understood, in Scotland the crown was not only bound to revive, but to revive in a certain and precise form.

Sir James Macintosh said, that the learned lord had used an argument, connected with the question of parliamentary reform, which he could not help noticing. He had said, it was strange that those who blamed the Scotch burghs, did not blame the close boroughs in England. Now, in England, there were some close boroughs, and some in which there were rights of popular election; but in Scotland, there were none of the latter description; so that, whoever supported the English constitution could not like the constitution of Scotland. In Scotland, there was the most perfect uniformity on an oligarchical principle.—Of all systems, he most abhorred that of universal suffrage: it was, indeed, the worst of all—(hear) if not a monstrous inconsistency with all forms of human society. (Hear.) It never existed in this country, and if it had, he should have thought its abolition the best plan of reform. (Hear.) But, in Scotland, there was an uniformity of the opposite kind. There was no popular election, or pretence of popular election. So that Scotland, though it by the union enjoyed the protection of the free constitution of England, did not in the nobler sense participate in it. It was a gross fallacy, therefore, to compare the state of the representation in Scotland with that in England.—He did not wish to speak to the dry legal question, but legal questions affecting the constitution, and particularly the rights of election, were peculiarly subjects for the consideration of that house. The question now was, not whether the crown possessed the power of reviving a burgh, whose charter had been lost by an intermission of election, but whether it possessed the power of altering its constitution. This was a question on which great doubt existed, and he did not mean to give an opinion on it. The right rested on a single case,—that of Stirling; which had never been decided in a court of law, or in parliament. In such a case, it was the duty of the house to require information, and he should, therefore, vote for the motion.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, he should not give any opinion on the point of law discussed by the learned lord, but, if the crown had power to alter the constitution of a burgh, when the functions of the corporation were suspended by accident, which might frequently occur, some specific regulations should be introduced by the legislature. The ministers themselves, if they saw that such cases were likely to happen, ought to take the opinion of parliament, on the extent to which the crown should be allowed to go. With respect to the quietness of the people under the present system, he had very different information from that of the learned lord. No one complained of the alteration in this case, as it affected the inhabitants of the burgh; but, if such a power came frequently to be exercised by the crown, it should be exercised according to some general rule. There was no probability of redress from the courts of law; because, any application to the court of session must be made by a constitutional member of the body whose election was complained of. It was necessary, therefore, that the house should interfere.

Sir R. Fergusson said, no one who looked at the deplorable state of the representation in Scotland, could agree in the eulogies which had been pronounced on it. The people were, not in a state of ferment, but of great anxiety for a better system, of which they had seen a good example in the new constitution of Montrose.—The hon. baronet then read the parting address of the late magistrates of Aberdeen, who declared, that a new constitution was necessary, for the sake both of the magistrates and people. This address was written by gentlemen who had been in the uniform habit of supporting his Majesty's ministers. The hope of a change in the constitution of the burghs had been fostered by the commissioners at Montrose, one of whom, the sheriff of Perthshire, praised the liberal constitution which the paternal government of the country had provided for them, and adduced it as a proof that the ministers were willing to effect reform, whenever reform was necessary. He hoped that his Majesty's ministers would act up to the liberal ideas which were thus praised by their warmest adherents.

Lord A. Hamilton replied. He observed, that the learned lord had not met the question fairly, but had justified what was now done at Montrose, by what had been done at Stirling in 1781—and, by the same rule, what had now been done at Montrose would form a precedent for any similar transaction, next year, in any other burgh. The question, however, still returned, whether the crown had legally the power to alter, by its own authority, the constitution of a burgh,—how it pleased—when it pleased—and as often as it pleased. The question was, certainly, worthy of being settled, and if the crown had any such legal power, even under circumstances similar to those of Montrose—he meant when an alteration was requested by the burgh itself,—the consequence must be fatal to the stability of the burghs, even under any improvement they might receive. For if such change might be made, the influence of the crown was so great throughout Scotland, that it might easily procure an application, to be made for alteration in almost any of the Scotch burghs, at such time as its ministers conceived to be convenient. The learned lord had maintained very positively, that the burgesses were not liable for the debts contracted by the magistrates. —He had heard the opposite opinion affirmed by legal authority quite as good as that of the Lord Advocate.—He did not wish now to argue that point any further.—He apprehended, however, that the declaration of the learned lord's opinion, this night, would alarm the creditors of some burghs, and bring their claims, and the other municipal concerns, to a speedy crisis. One thing, however, he must pointedly remark. It was this: that although the learned lord had denied that the burgesses at large were liable for the debts of the burgh, he had taken care to avoid stating who were liable. Surely, the creditors were not wholly without remedy or redress. The learned lord, too, had disputed the fact of the dilapidation and ruin of the burgh funds. (Here Lord A. Hamilton read a statement of the condition of Aberdeen, to prove the mismanagement of its funds; which, he said, he had received from unquestionable authority.) "Aberdeen had once been one of the richest corporations in Scotland; its funds were now dissipated, and its corporate managers had further contracted a debt of 230,000*l.* They had, during a few years past, borrowed 57,000*l.* to pay the interest of their debt. The magistrates were ex-officio managers of the charities in the neighbourhood, and they had borrowed these funds, and thus involved these charitable institutions in the general wreck. They had taken up money of every kirk-session that would lend it. At the last election, only two persons could be found to accept the office of councillors. There exist now only six, instead of nineteen, that is, four under a quorum, qualified to act. The citizens have now an action before the court of session, by which they hope to disfranchise the burgh, with the view of obtaining a new set." He appealed to an hon. member present, (Mr. C. Forbes) whether this were not substantially correct. Similar facts, to a greater or less extent, might be adduced in the case of half the royal burghs in Scotland, as he could prove before a committee of the house. Well as he was acquainted with the gross abuses existing in Scotch burghs, and their general prevalence, still he had been surprised, since the time he had given notice of this motion, by the numerous representations he had received of facts, new to him, offered to be substantiated by proof, and of complaints of grievous injury and impending ruin; all tending to establish the same point, the cruel, ruinous and oppressive mismanagement of the burghs. The general subject, however, was not now before the house, and though he foresaw plainly, that his present motion was to be negatived, he should feel it his duty to bring this very questionable power of the crown, to alter the set of a burgh, again under consideration, together with a more extended view of this important subject.

Mr. Farquhar observed, that the affairs of the corporation of Aberdeen, had lately experienced considerable improvement. So far from being in the state which the noble lord had represented, they had actually paid four and a half per cent. on their debt, and were now in a condition to pay five per cent.

Mr. Forbes stated, that the burgh of Aberdeen had been involved in some difficulties by the purchase of a large quantity of ground which, for some years, the corporation could not let on building leases, but lately they had made a great number of feus. Every question had two sides, and the noble lord appeared to have seen only one of the present—that against the corporation. In a short time, the state of the burgh would be materially improved.

Mr. W. Smith said he had been a burgess of Aberdeen for more than forty years, and he hoped that he should not suffer from the frightful picture of its debts which some persons had been pleased to draw. The funds were not in so bad a condition as had been represented.

Mr. Douglas said, that the embarrassments of the burgh were so far removed, that after paying the interest of their debts, the corporation had been enabled to form a sinking fund of 800*l.* a-year.

The question was then put, and negatived without a division.

Droits of the Crown.] Sir J. Macintosh moved for an account of all prizes of war, otherwise called droits of the crown, or droits of admiralty, together with such prizes as have been adjudicated to the captors since 1793, with the date, amount, resource, and application of each receipt.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested, that such an account would be attended with great difficulty and expense, and the motion was withdrawn.

Surgery Regulation Bill.] Mr. Brogden brought in a bill "for regulating the Practice of Surgery, throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." It was read a first time, and, on the motion of Mr. J. P. Grant, was ordered to be printed.

After reciting, that ignorant and incapable persons are not restrained by law from practising surgery; whereby the health of great numbers of persons is much injured, and the lives of many destroyed; it enacted, that from and after it shall not be lawful for any person to practise surgery, for lucre or profit, unless he shall have been personally examined, as to his qualification and fitness thereto, by the Royal College of Surgeons in London, or by the Royal College of Surgeons in Edinburgh, or by the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, or by any other college of surgeons which may hereafter be legally incorporated in any part of the United Kingdom; and unless he shall have been admitted a member of the college before which such examination shall have been made, and thereupon shall have received a diploma or testimonial of his knowledge and ability to practise surgery, and of his admission under the seal of such college; for which diploma or testimonial not more than the usual fee shall be demanded and received.

And be it further enacted, that every person who shall have been so examined, and shall have received such diploma or testimonial under the seal of any one of the said royal colleges, or of any other college of surgeons which may hereafter be incorporated as aforesaid, shall be entitled and shall have the right to practise surgery, in any and every part of his Majesty's dominions, any law or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that all and every person or persons who shall have been duly examined by one of the said royal colleges, or by any other college of surgeons which may hereafter be incorporated as aforesaid, and shall have thereupon obtained a testimonial of qualification as a principal surgeon in his Majesty's army or navy, and who shall have actually served in that capacity, shall be entitled to practise surgery in any and every part of his Majesty's dominions.

And whereas by a certain statute of the parliament of Ireland, passed in the thirty-sixth year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled, "an Act for the further Regulation of Public Infirmaries or Hospitals," it is enacted, that from and after the passing of that act, no person should be capable of being elected a surgeon to a county infirmary or hospital, who should not previously have obtained letters testimonial of his qualification under the seal of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland; and that no other qualification or examination should be necessary to make any person capable of being elected surgeon to such infirmary or hospital: and whereas by a certain other act, passed in the fifty-fourth year of his present Majesty, intituled, "an Act to amend several Acts for erecting or establishing Public Infirmaries or Hospitals in Ireland, so far as relates to the Surgeons or Apothecaries of such Infirmaries or Hospitals," it is provided, that letters testimonial of the College of Surgeons in Ireland, shall be laid before the grand juries in the said act mentioned, previous to the requiring or making any presentment of any sum of money to a surgeon of any infirmary or hospital by such grand juries: and whereas it is just and expedient that the provisions of the said acts should be extended to the members of the Royal Colleges of Surgeons in London and in Edinburgh, and to any other college of surgeons which may hereafter be incorporated as aforesaid: be it therefore enacted, that the members of the Royal College of Surgeons in London, and of the Royal College of Surgeons in Edinburgh, and of any other college of surgeons which may hereafter be incorporated as aforesaid, shall be eligible to all the offices and appointments, mentioned in the first recited act, and shall be entitled to all benefits and advantages given and intended by the second recited act, on the production of the diplomas or testimonials under the seal of their respective colleges, in the same manner as the members of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland have been since the passing of the said recited acts.

And whereas surgical knowledge is frequently required in the practice of midwifery, and it is expedient that male persons so practising should be qualified to render surgical aid; be it therefore enacted, that from and after it shall not be lawful for any male person to practise midwifery, unless he shall have obtained a diploma or testimonial as aforesaid of his knowledge and ability to practise surgery, under the seal of one of the said royal colleges, or of any other college of surgeons which may hereafter be incorporated as aforesaid; or unless he shall have obtained as aforesaid a testimonial of qualification as a principal surgeon in the army or navy, and shall have actually served in that capacity; or unless he shall have obtained the degree of doctor or bachelor of medicine from an university of the United Kingdom.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that nothing in this act contained, shall be deemed or taken to extend to any person resident in Great Britain or Ireland, and actually practising surgery or midwifery at the time of the but that every such person may continue to practise surgery or midwifery respectively, so far as any such person lawfully might have done if this act had not been passed.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that nothing in this act contained, shall extend or be construed to extend to lessen, prejudice or defeat, or in anywise to interfere with any of the rights, authorities, privileges or immunities, heretofore conferred upon, vested in, or legally exercised and enjoyed by any of the universities in the United Kingdom, or by any of the colleges of physicians in the United Kingdom, or upon, in or by the faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow, or by the master, wardens and society of the art and mystery of apothecaries of the city of London; but that the members of the said universities, and of the said colleges of physicians, and of the said faculty of Glasgow, and of the said society of apothecaries respectively, shall have and enjoy all such rights, authorities, privileges and immunities, in as full, ample and beneficial a manner, to all intents and purposes, as they might have done before the and in case the same had never been passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 16.

Grievances under the Suspension Act.] The Earl of Carnarvon said, he had a petition to present to their lordships from a person who had suffered under the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and who stated, that he had been imprisoned without any cause. If the forms of the house would permit it, he should wish to move, without loss of time, that the petition be referred to the secret committee; but as notice of the motion must be given, some delay would arise, and the report of the committee might, perhaps, be made to-morrow.

The Earl of Liverpool said, the report would not be made to-morrow, nor, perhaps, for a day or two. It was the custom of their lordships' house for some notice to be given of such a motion as that which the noble earl proposed to make. The noble earl might, therefore, move that the petition be received to-day, and give notice of his motion for the earliest convenient day.

Lord Holland said, it was important that petitions of this kind should be sent to the committee, and he could see no objection to their being immediately referred. Papers of another description had been so referred since the committee was formed. This certainly was a fact, unless the reports which had reached him on that subject were singularly erroneous.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that no papers had been referred to the committee since it was formed, except such as had been sent down by command of the Prince Regent.

The clerk carried the petition to the Lord Chancellor, and it was found to want the word "humble;" beginning "The petition of," instead of "the humble petition, &c."

The Earl of Carnarvon said, he had read the petition, and could assure their lordships that it was respectfully worded. The omission of the word "humble," he hoped, would not be considered of such consequence as to prevent its being received.

Lord Holland begged their lordships to consider, that as this was a petition from a person who complained of nothing less than illegal and unjust confinement, it was one which they ought not to reject on the ground of any light or trivial informality.

The Earl of Liverpool thought, that it would be proper to have the petition altered, as he understood it was not the custom of the house to receive petitions so informally worded.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, that where there appeared no intention to treat the house with disrespect, there could be no reason for rejecting a petition. His noble friend had stated, that there was nothing improper in the wording of the petition, except the omission which had been mentioned. When such complaints as that now offered were made, their lordships ought not to make objections to petitions on mere form, but open wide their doors for their reception.

The Lord Chancellor said, that the petition bore on the face of it a reason for not receiving it. It was quite contrary to their lordships' practice to receive petitions so worded.

Lord Holland asked, whether the noble lord meant to go the length of saying, that no petition, in which the word "humble" had been omitted, had been received by the house?

The Lord Chancellor said, he had by no means pledged himself to any such thing. It certainly was not the practice to receive petitions with the omission which occurred in the present case, and it would require, perhaps, more time to ascertain whether there was any precedent for such an omission than to get it supplied by a new petition.

Lord King wished to press on the consideration of the house, that, as this was a petition which purported to come from an injured individual, every facility ought to be afforded to the complaint. The noble earl who brought it up had assured their lordships, that it contained nothing disrespectful; and the objection related only to one word, and that a word of omission. It appeared to him, that it would, therefore, be highly improper to refuse it, especially when the noble earl meant to move, that it be referred to the secret committee, for which there might not be time, if an alteration in the petition were insisted on, as he understood that it would be necessary to send it to Manchester.

The Earl of Carnarvon hoped, that there would be time for the motion he intended to make, before the secret committee reported to the house. If there should be time for altering the petition, he would get it done before he made the motion for referring it to the committee. In the mean time he moved, that the petition be read.—Ordered.

The petition was then read by the clerk. It purported to be the petition of Philip Drummond, of Manchester, reedmaker, and set forth, that the petitioner had been present at a meeting in March last, called for the purpose of petitioning the Prince Regent to withhold his assent from the bill for suspending the habeas corpus act. The petitioner was addressing the persons assembled for this purpose, when a troop of horse came among them to break up the meeting. It could be proved, that there never was a more peaceable and regular meeting in Manchester than that which had thus been disturbed, until it was broken in upon by those riotous, not to say drunken, soldiers. The petitioner was arrested and conveyed to the Old Bailey Prison in Manchester, where he was allowed only four ounces of bread and one ounce of cheese for the day. He applied for other food, and offered to pay for it himself, but was not permitted to have it. He was sent off to London, without being allowed any time for preparation. Mr. Silvester, hearing of his distressed situation, sent him some things, which would have been useful to him, but he was not allowed to receive them. When sent off, he was chained by the leg to another prisoner, by a chain of not less than thirty pounds weight. He arrived in London on the 15th of March, and was conveyed to the house of correction in Cold Bath Fields. He was afterwards carried before Lord Sidmouth. When before his lordship, he stated openly what he had done, and called upon the noble lord to bring forward his accusers. He was told he should have a fair trial, and was remanded. On the 28th of April, he was removed to Dorchester gaol, and afterwards to Exeter. In the month of December, he was set at liberty, on entering into a recognizance to appear in the Court of King's Bench on the first day of term, and every subsequent day, until he was discharged. He accordingly came to London, and, in compliance with the conditions of his recognizance, attended the Court of King's Bench, until he was, with others, finally discharged on the 31st of January. While he remained in London he was obliged to contract debts, and he had been furnished with no means of defraying the expense he had been put to, or to enable him to return home, by his Majesty's ministers, though it was by their order he had been illegally arrested, and obliged to undergo all these hardships. He had solicited an interview with Lord Sidmouth before he left town, intending to represent his case to him, but the noble lord would not see him. The petition concluded with urging on the consideration of the house the sufferings of the petitioner, and his loss by the debts he had been obliged to contract, and prayed, that their lordships would not consent to any bill of indemnity which might be proposed for ministers.

The Earl of Carnarvon, after giving notice that he should on Thursday next move that the above petition be referred to the secret committee, asked, whether it was likely the object of the motion might not be disappointed by the report being in the meanwhile made?

The Earl of Liverpool replied, "certainly not before that day."

Monday, Feb. 16.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] An account was presented of exchequer bills and bank notes deposited by the Bank in the Exchequer (pursuant to an order of the 3d instant). See the Appendix.

CONVEYANCERS.] A petition was presented of certain attornies of York, complaining of persons not of the profession drawing conveyances. It was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It set forth, that by the laws now in force no person can be admitted to practise as an attorney and solicitor unless he has duly served a clerkship of five years, and has paid stamp duties on his articles of clerkship, and on his admission, amounting together to upwards of 145*l*.; and that these laws have been highly beneficial to the public by increasing the respectability of attornies and solicitors; that conveyancing is a principal part of the business of an attorney and solicitor, and requires a liberal education and extensive learning, and that the practice of it by ignorant persons is highly injurious to the public, by frequently invalidating or rendering insecure the titles to landed property; that the stamp acts of the 44th and 55th years of his present Majesty authorize any person to draw and prepare conveyances, who shall take out a yearly certificate on an eight pounds stamp, provided he be a member of one of the four inns of court, and that a person may become a member of one of the inns of court at an expense of 28*l*. or thereabouts, without keeping any number of terms, or producing testimonials of professional education; that, in consequence of the low stamp duties on the yearly certificates of conveyancers, and the easy means of obtaining admission as members of an inn of court, sheriffs' officers, auctioneers, discarded writers from attornies' offices, inferior schoolmasters, tradesmen of almost every description, and other ignorant and incompetent persons, are now practising in various parts of the kingdom as certificated conveyancers, to the great injury of the profession, and the public detriment; and praying that the house would be pleased to take the subject into immediate consideration, and that an act may be passed for preventing uneducated and incompetent persons from practising as conveyancers, and for regulating the examination and admission of such persons as may in future be admitted to practise, and that they may be subject to the same extent of stamp duties as are now imposed on the articles of clerkship and admission of attornies and solicitors, with such other regulations and provisions as to the house shall seem expedient.

COTTON MANUFACTORIES.] Lord Stanley presented a petition of persons employed in the cotton factories of Bolton-le Moors, for a restriction of the time of actual labour. It set forth, "that the petitioners are generally kept at work at such factories from thirteen to fourteen hours in each working day in the week, save the interval of dinner, and also except on Saturdays, on which days the hours of labour are somewhat lessened; that this extended labour is found, by fatal experience, to be attended with the most baneful consequences to the health of the persons thus employed, as a large portion of them can abundantly prove, being performed in rooms which, in addition to the ordinary insufficiency of ventilation, are often rendered still more unwholesome by artificial heat, or steam, and by a mixture of dust with light particles of cotton continually flying off in the progress of the manufacture, which cannot fail to be imbibed at every breath; that those who survive to a very moderate age, are by such long and pernicious confinement, and the attendant evils thereof, rendered feeble and emaciated, which disqualifies them to perform the usual quantum of work, and then the employers dismiss the unhappy objects, who must give place to those more active and robust, no master (according to the established custom) choosing to employ any but such as can turn off a sufficient quantity; thus, at an age at which in other businesses persons are termed most useful and steady, the labourer at a cotton factory is termed superannuated, and forced to finish his days in indigence and misery, whereas, if the hours of daily labour were abridged, many useful lives would be saved, and those of others rendered longer useful in the manufacture and to their families; that the petitioners, in representing their own unfortunate situation, beg leave to observe, that they also feel the unhappy condition of young children working in the said factories, who in many instances are connected by the dearest ties of relationship with the petitioners, and who from the length of time and unwholesome nature of such employment manifest early appearances of deformity in their limbs, and all the other evils of sickly and impaired constitutions, which none can wonder at who are informed that these young children, from six years of age and upwards, seldom leave the factory or mill, not even for refreshment, from their coming in the morning till they go home at night, when their pores being open with the intense heat of the factory they are exposed to the severity of the winter's blast, to snow or rain, with very oft a scanty covering; hence frequent maladies are contracted in youth, which bring on weakness and consumptive habits to such as arrive at puberty, which many do not, and thus the race of many families are vitiated, and hereditary complaints entailed; that the petitioners might add many more grievances, were it not to tire the house, and, grievous as they are, there remains not the least hope of relief but from the wisdom of the legislature, because certain masters will always be found desirous of keeping their hands at work as long as possible, and others better disposed are unavoidably led to adopt the destructive example, that their yarns may not be brought to the market upon more unfavourable terms; that the petitioners have patiently expected, during the last two years, that some amelioration to their hardships would be provided, agreeable to the regulations proposed in Sir Robert Peel's bill, but they cannot adequately express their concern at the disappointment; they therefore deem it expedient to submit to the protecting wisdom of the house the very many and peculiar sufferings which they and their children working in cotton factories endure, and to pray relief: the petitioners, therefore, most humbly pray, that upon consideration of the said evils attendant on the extraordinary hours worked in cotton factories, which will be fully proved in all the allegations before the house, or a committee thereof, whenever it shall be thought proper, that a law may be passed to restrict the time of actual labour in all cotton factories to ten hours and a half each day, so as to allow, within the ordinary space of twelve hours, half an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner, which time is of general observance in other employments much less prejudicial to health than those of the petitioners, or to do in the premises as to the house shall seem proper."

Mr. Philips said, it was the most anxious wish of the cotton manufacturers, with a view to the refutation of the calumnies so industriously circulated against them, that the house would appoint a commission to inquire into the actual state of the manufactories, and he was persuaded that the result would shew, that there were no manufactories in the kingdom in so healthy and good a state as those for spinning cotton. Great mischief had been occasioned by the combination of workmen: they had a kind of central committee, whose proceedings were calculated to promote the spirit of Luddism. Combinations among the workmen respecting the amount of wages were very easily excited by the means that had been resorted to.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

A petition was then presented of owners and occupiers of cotton mills, for the appointment of a special commission to inquire into the state thereof.—It set forth, "that the petitioners have heard with concern that it is intended to move in the house the revival of the committee whose labours extended over so large a portion of the session of 1816, in inquiring into the condition of children employed in factories; that the minutes of the evidence taken before that committee are very voluminous, and contain a mass of vague and inconsistent charges, which it is impossible to distinguish from the truth without much laborious application or personal inspection of the factories; that the minutes contain also statements of facts confirmed by documents which, as the petitioners humbly conceive, establish beyond doubt the generally good state of the health, morals, and instruction of persons employed in factories, and that parliamentary interference for their protection is wholly unnecessary; that the petitioners, anxious that the truth should appear, did invite, previous to the session of 1816, such members of the house as are connected with the county of Lancashire to visit the several factories in the town and neighbourhood of Manchester, that they might from actual inspection and comparison form their own opinion, and be better prepared to appreciate the testimony which might be offered; and the petitioners humbly pray, that if the house require further information upon the subject they will be pleased to appoint a special commission of their own members, for the purpose of examining upon the spot into the actual condition of persons employed in factories, and of comparing it with that of persons employed in the various departments of the cotton and other manufactures."

It was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

LONGITUDE.] Mr. Alderman Wood presented a petition of Christian Siemers, praying the house to take into consideration a new mode he had discovered of ascertaining the longitude.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] The house went into a committee on the chimney sweepers regulation bill.

Mr. Bennet observed, that it was a desirable object to abolish the practice of employing persons under twenty-one years of age to sweep chimnies after the 1st of May, 1819.

Sir G. Clerk approved of the bill, and wished to have its provisions as to Scotland clearly expressed. He moved some amendments for extending it to the United Kingdom, and for inserting the word "stewartry," as to some Scotch counties, which were agreed to.

Some other verbal amendments were made and agreed to, and the report of the bill was brought up by Mr. Gordon, and received.

MALT DUTIES BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the third reading of this bill.

Mr. Brougham asked, whether there was any additional amount of taxation for the malt duty, as arrangements in such bills frequently produced new taxation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was only the annual bill.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the third reading of this bill.

Mr. Grenfell said, he had understood from the right hon. gentleman, that the Bank loan of six millions was to be paid off, at some period, out of the supply voted during the present session. He now rose to ask, whether, supposing the payment should be protracted beyond the 5th of April next, the time specified in the act, the same rate of interest as now paid, four per cent., would be continued, or what other rate paid to the Bank for the loan? The bill, he was aware, enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to protract the time of payment, if he pleased; but the rate of interest was not specified. By the present mode of issuing Exchequer bills, (at two pence halfpenny) money could be raised by government at a rate of little more than two per cent., and it was important to ascertain whether the Bank should have the old rate of four per cent. continued for this advance?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that as measures would be immediately taken to put this loan in a course of payment, the rate of interest, if even continued at the previous rate, would make but little difference to the public for the time the loan would remain unpaid.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] Mr. Grenfell rose to move that the papers relative to the exchange of notes and deposits of Exchequer bills between the Bank and the Exchequer, presented to the house this evening, be printed. 'I wish, (said the hon. member) to explain to the House the particulars of this matter. For many years back, it has been the practice of the Bank to send two or three clerks to the Exchequer, there to receive, and carry away, such Bank notes as have been received from the various branches of the public service. For these notes it is the habit and practice of the Bank to deposit at the time, as a security, Exchequer bills, bearing interest—for whom? not for the public, whose money is taken on this security, but for the Bank. The Bank may, therefore, according to this system, deposit one day a million of Exchequer bills bearing interest, be it remembered, for themselves, and take away a million of Bank notes—with these they may go into the market, buy up Exchequer bills, carry them on the following day to the Exchequer, take out an equal number of Bank notes in lieu of the deposit, and so continue trafficking and realising interest on the public cash, simply leaving at the Exchequer the security of bills so bought, and bearing interest for themselves. The importance of this to the Bank may be ascertained from this fact, that, according to the accounts this evening presented, on an average of the whole year, the amount of money so carried away by the Bank was no less than 4,500,000*l.*" (Hear.) He, therefore, moved that these accounts be printed.

Mr. Manning observed, that every one acquainted with the business of the Bank knew, that the exchange and deposits alluded to had been the practice ever since the establishment of the Bank. The provision on this arrangement was a very wholesome and constitutional one, and the public should certainly be the last to complain, as the security or deposit of Exchequer bills given by the Bank for the notes taken from the Exchequer, was the most certain and available one. It was also known, that the Bank were authorized by the house to purchase any amount of Exchequer bills they pleased. There was nothing in this transaction that deserved to call forth the animadversion of the hon. gentleman. The Bank would be at all times ready to give every information, to shew the openness and fairness of their dealings.

Mr. Tierney.—" My hon. friend has not impugned the conduct of the Bank in these transactions; he has not said a word against them. (Hear, from Mr. Grenfell.) The hon. member says, that the practice is a wholesome one—there can be no dispute on that—it is a wholesome one for the Bank, and must agree very well with its constitution—but is it equally wholesome for the public? (Hear.) Here they may receive one million of Bank notes in a day, in exchange for a million in Exchequer bills, the notes may the next day be transformed into other Exchequer bills, and again exchanged for the Bank, who may continue this course, always reserving to itself the interest on the bills so purchased. This is, to be sure, all very well for the Bank, but is it equally so for the public? The hon. member has this night, for the first time, admitted, that the Bank purchase Exchequer bills, as contradistinguished from those they receive for advances made to the public. This is an admission that I have been aiming at for a number of years, and out it has come at last." (Hear, hear.)

The accounts were then ordered to be printed.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition of John Bagguley, apprehended at Manchester, stating that he had been confined in irons for a month, and praying against the passing of any bill of indemnity.

Mr. Brougham thought it was due to the house, that either then, or on some future day, some of the right hon. gentlemen connected with the Home Department, should state to the house, whether or no the allegations in these petitions were true. The present petitioner alleged, that he was kept in irons for one month. The infliction of such sufferings was never contemplated by the law; the power given by the legislature was to detain in safe custody. If petitioners ventured by falsehood to impose on the house, it amounted to a breach of privilege, and the house, being in possession of the facts, would know how to uphold its own dignity. But it was incumbent on the right hon. gentlemen of the Home office to give the house the necessary information, and, while they withheld it, he must feel disposed to credit the allegations of the petitioners.

The petition was then received, and ordered to be printed. It set forth, " that the petitioner was on the 10th of last March, while addressing a peaceable meeting, legally called for the purpose of petitioning his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to withhold his royal assent from the habeas corpus suspension bill, suddenly surprised by a body of military, who without any the least cause rode through the people, trampled upon and treated them in the most inhuman manner, and after the petitioner had been repeatedly struck by the military, he was conveyed to the New Bailey, Manchester, where he remained until the following day, when he was informed he must go to London; the petitioner was then chained to the leg of another prisoner, and conveyed to Cold Bath Fields prison, where he remained until the 15th of March, on which day he was ordered to appear before the honourable privy council, when he was informed by Lord Sidmouth he must be committed to prison on suspicion of high treason; the petitioner was then removed to Horsemonger gaol, Surrey, where he was put in irons and locked up in a room until the 10th of April, on which day an order was received that he must be removed to the county gaol at Gloucester; on his arrival he was compelled to enter a cistern of cold water, which caused a severe sickness, insomuch that the physician ordered him to be removed into the hospital; during his illness he requested Mr. Baker, one of the visiting magistrates, to allow some person to remain in the room, as he was unable to help himself, but was informed by that gentleman, that Lord Sidmouth's orders specified that the petitioner must be kept alone, and that no person must see or converse with him but the keeper and magistrates; after the recovery of the petitioner he was ordered back to his former apartment; during the first four months of the petitioner's confinement in this prison he was not allowed to speak with any person, no, not even a common felon, and when the door of his room was unlocked, which was four hours every day, the petitioner no sooner left the room to take the benefit of the air, than the keeper always locked the door, thereby preventing the petitioner from returning to his room, so that he was repeatedly forced to endure the inclemency of the weather; on the 6th of August 1817, an order was sent by Lord Sid-mouth that the petitioner must be allowed the company of another prisoner four hours each day; in the month of October another order was received, that the petitioner might walk in the prison yard whenever he thought proper; on the 13th of November a King's messenger came into the room of the petitioner, and informed him that, in consequence of a petition sent by his father to the honourable privy council, the petitioner would be permitted to visit his mother at Manchester, who at that time lay upon her death-bed, and is since dead; on his arrival in Manchester he was confined in the New Bailey two nights and one day, at the expiration of which he was removed to Lancaster Castle; on the arrival of the petitioner in that prison he was informed by the worthy governor, that he had received orders from Lord Sidmouth to keep the petitioner in close and solitary confinement; the petitioner was then conveyed to his destined abode, which was a flagged cell four yards square, the window of which was boarded up in the form of a prison shutter; the petitioner was allowed to walk two hours each day on a terrace which surrounds the keeper's house; after he had been confined three weeks in this cell he was discharged, on entering into his own recognizances in the sum of 100*l.*, to appear in his Majesty's court of King's Bench, Westminster, on the first day of the present term, and so from day to day; the petitioner has accordingly travelled to London, in order to answer to such recognizances, and has appeared day by day until the 31st of January, on which day his recognizances were discharged; the petitioner having endured all this unjust imprisonment, at the end of which he was compelled to enter into recognizances, in order to evade future imprisonment; it is likewise the humble but firm belief of the petitioner, that the treatment which he received in the prisons of Horsemonger and Gloucester was wanton and cruel, and he prays that the house will procure copies of orders sent by Lord Sidmouth to Mr. Walters, the governor of Horsemonger gaol, Surrey, and to Thomas Cunningham, the governor of the county gaol of Gloucester; and if such orders do not warrant the treatment which the petitioner received, that the said governors, particularly the latter, may be by due course of law called upon to answer for their conduct; and the petitioner further prays, that the house will afford him such redress as it may of its wisdom think fit; but, above all, the petitioner most humbly and most fervently prays, that no bill of indemnity may be suffered to pass, but that his Majesty's ministers may be called to an account for the cruel wrongs which they have inflicted upon his Majesty's loyal and peaceable subjects."

Five petitions of freeholders and other inhabitants of Harrington, near Liverpool, against any indemnity, were then presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

CONSTABLES OF WESTMINSTER.] Mr. Calcraft moved, that the petition of William Lee, high constable of Westminster, and the petty constables attending the Houses of Parliament, for remuneration (presented on Friday last), be referred to a committee, to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their observations thereupon to the house. The committee were appointed, consisting of Mr. Calcraft, and several others, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

ROYAL BURGHS (SCOTLAND).] Sir George Clerk moved, that the petition respecting the providing of prisons in the royal burghs, (presented on Wednesday last), be referred to a committee to examine the matter thereof, and to report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the house. The committee were named, consisting of Sir George Clerk, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, the Lord Register, Lord Archibald Hamilton, and others, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, Feb. 17.

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.] The thirty millions Exchequer Bills Bill, and the Malt Duties Bill, were brought up from the House of Commons by Mr. Brogden and other members, and read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, Feb. 17.

NORTHERN COUNTIES.] Mr. M. Angelo Taylor begged the attention of the house to the consideration of the very important subject of which he had given notice for that day. It was impossible that the house should not feel the necessity of that consideration, when it was recollected, that the evil which it was his object to redress, excluded from the ordinary administration of justice four counties in England. In all the other counties of England, commissions of General Gaol Delivery and Nisi Prius were held twice every year; in Ireland, twice; in the principality of Wales, twice; in Scotland twice, and, on extraordinary occasions, prisoners were brought up for trial to the High Court at Edinburgh. The counties of Durham, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Cumberland, with the county and town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, formed the sole exception in the United Kingdom. On what principle an evil, thus impeding the administration of justice, had been so long continued, he was wholly at a loss to account. Those counties were numerously inhabited; they contained within them large trading and commercial towns, which enjoyed an intercourse with every part of the world. He feared that they could not claim a greater exemption from the commission of offences than the other counties of England, and, therefore, they ought to possess equal advantages in the speedy administration of justice. There were persons now confined in the prisons of those counties whose trials would be postponed, not till the spring, but till the summer assizes. So that nine, ten or eleven months must intervene before those unhappy individuals could be brought to trial. Was such an evil to be tolerated in this enlightened age? The civil causes in those counties were not trivial either in number or form. In Durham alone, at the last commission of Nisi Prius, there were fifty causes on the list. If the accounts that he had some days ago moved for were on the table, the house would feel, that the evils arising from an obstruction to judicial business were progressive every year. Even in the ordinary proceedings of an ejectment between landlord and tenant, an interval of three years would elapse before the landlord could recover possession of his property. It might be said, why had not representations been made by the parties aggrieved? The answer was, that those who felt the grievance most severely, were disinclined by the hurry of other business, and the anxiety to return to their private pursuits; such, for example, was the case with grand juries. The prisoners themselves could be expected to do little. They might apply to the Secretary of State for the Home Department on their individual sufferings. He would refer them to the ordinary tribunals, or they might appeal to that house by petition. What chance of redress had they, unless their petition were supported by high authority? The house should remember how little alive men in general were to the ordinary impediments of justice. There must be some specific suffering to attract public consideration. Men must writhe under a sense of pain before they are roused to complaint; and, indeed, in many instances, they feel the pressure without thinking of applying for the remedy. What a number of years elapsed before any step was taken to remedy the evils arising from the system of appeal causes, and the delays in the court of chancery? Every man felt the injury which the administration of justice sustained in these points, yet how long had that subject slept, until he had the honour of first introducing a specific proposition to the consideration of that house? He felt it was unnecessary to state more at present, in order to induce them to take steps for correcting so gross an evil. The great question was, as to the remedy. It was impossible, after a system of abuse had continued for so many years, not to feel every step in the pursuit of correction surrounded with difficulties. But, in looking for a practical remedy, he had first to request the house to reflect on the great increase in our population, agriculture, and commerce, since the reign of Elizabeth, and then to ask itself whether, if twelve judges were then necessary to the administration of public justice, some relief ought not to be afforded to the various courts of law, to enable them to dispose of the vast increase of public duty that had since taken place? The hon. member then reviewed the growing business for some years past in the courts at Westminster, and observed, that, in the last session, parliament had deemed it expedient to afford relief by passing two acts—one, to facilitate the progress of business in the King's Bench—the other, to facilitate the hearing and determining of suits in equity in the Exchequer. It was a lamentable fact, that the sessions at the Old Bailey, which, in former times, commenced every eight weeks, on a Wednesday, and terminated on the succeeding Saturday, now lasted, on the average, for a fortnight, while there were instances of longer duration, and of the Recorder and Common Serjeant, to whom the business, from the necessary absence of the judges, at one time devolved, being obliged to call in the aid of the chairman of Middlesex, on the trial of traverses. The crown, by virtue of its prerogative, could direct commissions of gaol delivery to be held, but, without a legislative enactment, from the attendant expense, commissions of assize and Nisi Prius could not be directed, as no person could be appointed below the rank of a serjeant at law. In that house, therefore, the bill must originate, as it was a money bill. He would now proceed to state the plan which seemed to him to be the most feasible. There was an officer in the court of Exchequer called the Cursitor-Baron. The present Cursitor-Baron (Baron Maseres,) was a sound lawyer, and a man of great science. His situation, however, was one that afforded him considerable leisure, in proof of which it was enough to state, that he had for a time acted as deputy Recorder of the city of London. In fact, all he had to do was, when the Barons of the Exchequer came into court, to be sworn in, to make a handsome bow to them, and to retire. What he (Mr. Taylor) proposed was, to make this office effective—to make the Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer forthcoming (if he might so express himself,) to take his turn for the assizes, and to sit at the Old Bailey. For these duties he might be allowed an additional salary of three thousand pounds, and the arrangement would afford a substantial relief to the judges.—He had another proposition to make. It might be proper to have a cursitor judge of the court of King's Bench, who should take the whole of the bail during term, and be, in fact, an effective judge for the Old Bailey, for Nisi Prius, and the assizes, though not in banc. At present, the term did not afford sufficient time for disposing of the numerous causes, and other matters, that were to be heard; and the judges were compelled to resort to a variety of expedients to supply the deficiency, so that the assistance of these two persons would be highly valuable to them. The whole cost of the plan would be trifling, if, indeed, expense were to be at all put in competition with the evils of the present system, by which it frequently happened that individuals were imprisoned in the four northern counties, before trial, for a period longer than that to which their crime, even were they found guilty, would subject them by law. He had heard it said, but he could not suppose it possible, that his plan would be objected to on the part of those persons in office in the counties in question, who had to entertain the judges, and whose expenses would, therefore, be doubled, should the assizes there be put on the same footing as in other parts of the kingdom. He was persuaded that the sheriffs of those counties would not make such an objection, nor did he think it would proceed from the bishop of Durham.—After expressing a hope that, if the house should agree to his motion, he might have some communication on the subject with government, and especially with the law officers of the crown, in order to ascertain how the matter might be best arranged, the hon. and learned gentleman concluded by moving, "That an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, praying that he will be graciously pleased to issue his commission of Oyer and Terminer and general gaol delivery, for the counties of Westmorland, Cumberland, Durham, and Northumberland, and the town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, twice in every year; and also his commission of assize and Nisi Prius; and to assure his Royal Highness, that this house will make good any expense attending the same."

The Attorney-General said, he did not rise to enter into all the arguments of his hon. and learned friend, but to express his regret that he had not stated some specific proposition which might have been a fit subject of consideration by the legislature. Before so great an alteration in our judicial constitution was agreed to, it ought to undergo the most deliberate investigation. He objected to the motion, because it proposed that to be done suddenly, which, if done at all, ought to be done with great caution; and because no present emergency existed that required any immediate step to be taken on the subject. He by no means meant to say, that after due consideration it might not be deemed advisable to adopt some arrangement, by which the four northern counties might be put on the same footing as the rest of the kingdom; but he could not consent to the hasty proposition of his hon. and learned friend, and he should, therefore, move the previous question.

Sir C. Monck thought that the hon. and learned gentleman could not have understood the nature of his hon. and learned friend's proposition. His hon. and learned friend had not argued that there was any sudden occasion for a departure from the established law and usage of the land; he had only stated what was notorious to every body, the grievances under which the four northern counties had long laboured. The purity of justice in England was the theme of general and just admiration; but it should not be forgotten, that promptitude was an essential part of the administration of justice. Why should not the assizes be as frequent in the northern counties as in Cornwall, which was equally distant from London? So far was he from agreeing with the Attorney-General that his hon. and learned friend's proposition was too great a departure from the ordinary course of the administration of justice, that he wished that proposition had been more simple and direct. He wished it had been merely to address the Prince Regent to extend to the northern counties the usual assize commission in spring, which was now confined to York and Lancaster. When he recollected how easily the house had the other evening voted 400,000*l.* to purchase the abolition of the slave trade from Spain, he could not believe that they would hesitate in granting the trifling sum that would be necessary in order to defray the expense of communicating to the four northern counties the blessings of equal justice; and he thought that if they agreed to the previous question moved by the hon. and learned gentleman, they would be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the objection to the motion was, that the house could not be suddenly prepared to venture on an address to the crown, which must of necessity occasion a very extensive change in the composition of all the courts in Westminster Hall. For one, he felt quite incompetent to determine on the probable advantages or disadvantages of the hon. and learned gentleman's plan; and he apprehended that the house at large must be pretty much in the same situation. He imagined that the hon. and learned gentleman had attained the object he had in view, namely, calling the attention of the house to the subject. On the importance of it he by no means differed from him. It was certainly extremely desirable, that all the inhabitants of the kingdom should equally enjoy the benefits of the administration of justice; but to decide on the best mode of effecting that object, required more information than the house at present possessed. If the hon. and learned gentleman had moved for an inquiry, as in the case of Wales, last year, he should have had no objection to the proposition (hear, hear); but he had come to the conclusion at the very outset.

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, he had brought forward his motion, in order that the subject might be discussed; and whether it was discussed in the present shape, or under that of a motion for inquiry, was to him indifferent. With the permission of the house, therefore, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Brougham concurred in the general opinion which facts had so irresistibly impressed—that it was impossible longer to deny an equal administration of justice to the four northern counties. He was much gratified to find that the only objection was to the mode in which the remedy was to be applied. He strongly urged his hon. and learned friend, therefore, not only to withdraw his motion, but immediately to follow up that step by moving for a committee of inquiry.

Mr. W. Smith agreed entirely with the motion. He stated, that he had received a letter which convinced him that some alteration of justice was absolutely necessary in the north of England.

Mr. Warre expressed his satisfaction that an inquiry was about to be instituted into the subject.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, he had always been impressed with the expediency of having the assizes in the northern counties twice in the year, and he thanked his hon. and learned friend for the motion which he had submitted to the house.

Mr. Wynn observed, that although he felt that some measure was necessary, yet he was glad that his hon. and learned friend was about to withdraw his motion, to which he could not have consented, considering the near approach of the spring assizes, and that no person who had a suit would be sufficiently aware of the new arrangement.

Mr. Taylor then withdrew his motion, and gave notice that he would to-morrow move for a committee of inquiry on the subject.

IRISH TREASURY BILLS.] An account was ordered "of all Irish Treasury Bills outstanding and unprovided for on the 13th day of February 1818, in British currency."

BRITISH CLAIMANTS ON FRANCE.] A petition was presented of Francis Franco, of Portland Street, Daniel Reardon, of Corbet Court, executor of Jacob Franco, deceased, and Edward Du Bois, assignee of the estate of William John Frederick and James Du Bois and others, British claimants on the government of France; setting forth, "that in the years 1792 and 1793 the petitioner Francis Franco and the said Jacob Franco, deceased, who is represented by the petitioner Daniel Reardon his executor, and the said William John Frederick and James Du Bois, who are represented by the petitioner Edward Du Bois, were creditors to a very great amount of sundry subjects of France, and that their property was confiscated and sequestrated by the then revolutionary government of France, and that the same has never wholly or in part been restored to them, although they have resorted to every means in their power to obtain restitution thereof; that by a convention signed by Lord Castlereagh, the Duke of Wellington, and the Duke de Richelieu, at Paris, on the 20th day of November 1815, concluded in conformity to the ninth article of the principal treaty, relative to the examination and liquidation of the claims of the subjects of his Britannick Majesty against the government of France, it was provided, amongst other matters, that the subjects of his Britannick Majesty, having claims on the French government, who, in contravention of the second article of the treaty of commerce of 1786, and since the 1st of January 1793 had suffered on that account by the confiscations or sequestrations decreed in France, should, in conformity to the fourth additional article of the treaty of Paris of the year 1814, themselves, their heirs, or assigns, subjects of his Britannick Majesty, be indemnified and paid, and which convention the petitioners believe to be already before the house, and printed by their order; that, on the part of the British government, all claims for the maintenance of French prisoners of war in England were abandoned, on the express condition that the claims of the petitioners and all other British subjects, to their own property (which though considerable, as it respects all the British claimants, is yet very inferior in amount to the sums so relinquished by the British government) should be satisfied and paid by the French government; that the commissioners appointed to examine the commercial claims of British subjects on the government of France in pursuance of the said convention, and provided for by the sixth article of the said convention, have not to this time, nearly three years, (notwithstanding the process prescribed by the said convention, and the French commissioners, to the petitioners and the other British claimants in proof of their claims, have been complied with, and vast expense incurred in the pursuit,) determined, liquidated, or settled any one commercial claim, as far as the petitioners are informed; the petitioners therefore most humbly hope that the house will take into its consideration the injustice and hardships they have suffered, as well as the breach of agreement between the two governments, by which that of France was immediately benefited, while the British subjects remain to this day without redress, notwithstanding the justice of their cause, and the sums far more than equivalent, renounced on that condition by the British government."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Sir F. Burdett presented a petition of James Leach, flannel weaver, of Broadoth Lane, near Rochdale, in the county of Lancaster; setting forth, "that the petitioner was arrested on the 28th of March 1817, under the suspension of the habeas corpus act, at the Georgius tavern, Hardwick, in the town of Manchester, along with some other men who were entire strangers to the petitioner, by the police officers, and escorted to that prison by a troop of dragoon guards, and put into a cold damp cell flagged with stone, without victuals, for that night; the only furniture it contained was an old bed of straw swarming with vermin; the petitioner remained in that situation for ten days; his victuals, which consisted of bread and cheese, were given him through the iron bars which served him for a window, and his cell door was seldom suffered to be unlocked; on the evening of the 7th of April, the petitioner was ordered out of bed about nine o'clock, and taken into the court with about ten others, and, after their names were called over, justice Heys said a king's messenger was just arrived for the petitioner and two others, William Kent and George Plant, with warrants from Lord Sidmouth to take them to London, to be examined before the secretary of state for the home department, and he wished them to prepare themselves for what they were likely to meet, for he could assure them they stood charged with high treason, and with having under their protection men and arms to wage war against his majesty and his liege subjects: the king's messenger then shewed his authority, and ordered to take them off by the first coach; they were then taken back into the prison, and the petitioner was put alone into the felons' day-house; in vain he begged to retire to his cell, but the cold flags served him for his bed that night, resting his head upon bars of iron; about five o'clock the next morning, the petitioner was fetched out of this cold and dismal place and heavily ironed on both legs, Kent on one side and Plant on the other; finding that one of his bazels held him too close, he begged of the deputy constable to change it for another, observing that he should not be able to bear it to London; but, damning the proud limbs of the petitioner, he said if he would not behave well with what he had already got, he would furnish him with an iron collar for his neck; they then stepped into the coach for London, and they arrived at Bow Street office about twelve o'clock on the 9th, and after having their irons taken off, and a little refreshment, they were conducted to the secretary of state's office for the home department, and underwent a short examination before Lord Sidmouth and other privy counsellors, charging the petitioner with high treason, but did not say what it consisted in; he was then taken to the Brown Bear public-house, and the day following to Cold Bath Fields prison; on Tuesday the 15th, the petitioner was again brought up for examination, and likewise on Tuesday the 22d, and likewise on Tuesday the 29th; on this his fourth examination before Lord Sidmouth, his lordship said he was regularly receiving information against the petitioner, and from such a respectable source that authorized him to commit the petitioner to close confinement till liberated by due course of law, and if he had any thing to say why he should not be committed, he was then at liberty; at which the petitioner said, he had arrived at the age of a young man, and had never violated the law, and whatever his lordship's information was that gave him that authority, it was incorrect; his lordship then added, that the petitioner was committed, and at some future day he should be brought to trial, for which he should have timely notice, with a list of the evidence against him; the petitioner was then taken back to Cold Bath Fields to his former situation; on Thursday the 1st of May, he was removed to Chelmsford gaol, in the county of Essex, conducted by a king's messenger and a turnkey, handcuffed to one Flitcroft, from Stockport; while the petitioner remained in that prison he was never suffered to sleep with his clothes in the same cell, they were taken away from him every night and returned every morning; his bed was purely searched every morning, and when he attended divine worship in the prison often overturned; that, on the 14th of November he was taken before a bench of Magistrates to enter into recognizances which bound him in one hundred pounds to appear in the Court of King's Bench on the first day of the next term, and day by day, and not to depart the Court without leave; and the petitioner returned home to his distressed parents, who, by the fatal consequences of his imprisonment, had not reduced them to beggary only, but brought them near to the grave; on the 21st of January, he received a letter signed by John Entwisle, esquire, one of his Majesty's justices of the peace, stating that he was desired by Lord Sidmouth to acquaint him, that as nothing had appeared against him in his conduct since his discharge, his appearance in the Court of King's Bench on the first day of next term, pursuant to his recognizance, would be dispensed with, and his Lordship hoped that his future conduct would never render it necessary to call him into a court of justice; the petitioner can assure the house that he never was guilty of any such treason, or any breach of the law, that it was always his principal motive in promoting peace and quietness; therefore, as an object truly deserving compassion, after eight months of unjust imprisonment, with his health impaired, with an injured character, out of employment, and in a state of starvation, the petitioner most humbly implores and petitions the house to take his case under their most serious consideration, and for such redress as in their wisdom they can grant him."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. Brougham said, he had to present to the house a petition of Benjamin Scholes, of Wakefield, in the West Riding of the County of York, and late a prisoner under the suspension of the habeas corpus act. He was a victualler and alehouse keeper, by which business he had supported himself and his family with comfort. In the month of July, however, he was apprehended by a warrant from Lord Sidmouth, thrown into prison, and notwithstanding the prison of Wakefield was well secured and well regulated, he was conveyed to the castle of Cambridge. There he was detained till January, in which month he was set at liberty without any more cause for his liberation than had been stated for his detention. (Hear, hear.) In consequence of his imprisonment, he had been ruined, his house and business broken up, and himself materially injured in health. He (Mr. Brougham) had in his possession a certificate from a respectable member of the college of surgeons who had attended him, which declared, that the confinement which the petitioner had endured had caused the illness under which he had laboured. His health was broken, and he was ruined in circumstances; and he had now to state to the house the sole reason of those proceedings which he had been able to discover. A charge had been laid against him by two persons of the names of Oliver and Bradley, (hear, hear,) for having been concerned in meetings held in his own house for seditious purposes. The particulars of that transaction he should relate to the house. Scholes first became acquainted with Oliver through the introduction of a person of the name of Mitchell, who was travelling about Yorkshire, as others had done in various parts of the country, pretending to come from societies in London, and making use of the name of the honourable baronet the member for Westminster, as well as of that of his noble colleague. In the course of their proceedings, Oliver, as the petition stated, was very constant in instigating Scholes to go farther; and, not to trouble the house with more than one instance of his conduct, he might state that Oliver said it was in vain to petition, petitioning was of no use; that they must have recourse to physical force. (Hear, hear.) Scholes, in consequence, had some suspicions of the man, and threatened to lay an information against him before the magistrates. Then came Oliver's plans; for he being threatened with exposure, no sooner found himself in danger of an information which could be supported by good evidence, than, with his associates, he wrote circular letters to call a meeting at the house of the petitioner. Scholes denied that such a meeting had ever been held at his house. He thought that other circumstances might throw much light upon that fact. Indeed, he believed that an hon. friend of his had found means to obtain some information on that point; that he had discovered Oliver himself complaining to others of the slackness of Scholes, and of his refusing to allow meetings to be held in his house. (Hear.) The petitioner denied that he ever had been present at any such meeting in his life. Indeed, he stated, that he never had any knowledge of any, but one, for promoting the cause of constitutional reform, which had ended in a petition that had been presented and received by that house. Inquiries had been made, and the result had been in every way favourable to the petitioner's character. He (Mr. B.) stated that, because he did not think it right to bring such charges rashly, especially when they involved considerations of such importance. The first reason that he had for believing Scholes to be a person of good character was, that he had at different periods filled offices of considerable respectability. He had been employed as deputy-constable in the neighbourhood of Wakefield at a period of disturbance, and, principally by his exertions as deputy-constable, the peace had been so well preserved, that the provisions of the watch and ward act, then in force, had almost directly ceased to be applied. In consequence of the vigilance which he manifested, his services were received with unanimous approbation, and he believed with the thanks of the magistracy under whom he acted. He had also received the thanks of the deputy-lieutenant. In addition to that, he might state, and to some persons in the house it might be a considerable improvement of his former character, that the petitioner had been upwards of three years a collector of assessed taxes. These things, he trusted, would not be forgotten, for he had had means of communication with most respectable persons, and from them he was informed that the petitioner had for many years fulfilled the duties imposed on him with the greatest propriety. He had had communications on the subject with the noble lord the member for Yorkshire, as well as the venerable personage to whom he was related; and he might read one or two letters which would inform them what was the character of the petitioner. [The hon. and learned gentleman then read an extract from a letter, in these words:—" I have taken some pains to inquire into his (Scholes's) case, as I was at first prepossessed with an unfavourable opinion of him. But I am now thoroughly convinced that he has been most unfairly dealt with, and that he has had no more connection with any illegal or seditious designs than Mr. Wilberforce (hear, hear,) or the most innocent man in the kingdom; and I have no doubt that this will most evidently appear, if a full and fair investigation can be had of his case."] The suspicions of the man's character which appeared to have been entertained, were the consequences of all such cases. The moment it was heard that a man had been apprehended on a charge of high treason, or of any thing seditious, he was instantly suspected of being a very bad character. The hon. member (Mr. Wilberforce) would see that his name had only been introduced as the most striking person of the kind that was suggested to the writer. The petitioner, in one part of his statement, related a circumstance which he should read to the house. [The hon. and learned member then read a part of the petition, which prayed that the house would take the statement he had made into consideration, and that they would grant him such redress as they in their mercy and clemency might think proper; and that they would use such interest with the secretary of state as would cause him to return the papers which were taken from him, and an old memorandum-book, the property of a poor widow, which furnished the only evidence she had of a debt that was due to her of 17*l.*] It was singular, that after all he had experienced—he would instance that as the most striking proof of his character—that after all he had endured, he asked but for the property which had belonged to himself and others to be restored to him. He called for nothing to be done to those by whom he had suffered; he invoked no vengeance upon their heads; he demanded no justice; but he (Mr. B.) trusted, that this would not be held as any argument for their turning a deaf ear to what was laid before them;

he hoped that they would no longer have evidence so repeatedly proffered, without allowing those who were supposed to possess it to adduce their proofs.

The petition was then brought up, read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

It set forth, "That on Wednesday the 2d day of July 1817, the petitioner was taken from Wakefield by a king's messenger, and carried before the right honourable the secretary of state for the home department, and others, by whom he was committed to Cambridge castle, or New County gaol, where he remained in close confinement until the first day of January 1818: that in consequence of the arrest and detention of the petitioner, his home has been broken up, his business totally lost, and himself at the age of forty is thrown into the world to seek for a livelihood as if he had now to begin life anew; that on the 3d day of January, after his liberation, the petitioner was taken ill, so that he has never since been able to do any thing towards the procuring of a livelihood, and that his disorder has entirely been the consequence of his confinement, as a certificate of the surgeon will testify; that thus injured in health and ruined in business, the petitioner is destitute of the means of supporting himself in the same comfortable and honourable manner which he did previous to the time when he was taken from his home, and he trusts most undeservedly immured in prison; that the petitioner has been informed that his arrest and confinement have had their origin in the information of a person of the name of Oliver, and another of the name of Bradley, who had falsely informed the honourable the privy council, that the petitioner had taken part in several meetings of persons calling themselves delegates who harboured treasonable designs against the existing government; but the petitioner can prove that a person of the name of Mitchell, who had been travelling through the country on a pretence of encouraging constitutional parliamentary reform, first introduced Oliver to the petitioner under the appellation of a delegate from the friends of parliamentary reform in London, and as the particular friend of Sir Francis Burdett and Lord Cochrane: that the said Oliver strongly solicited the petitioner to become an agent for the sale of the Black Dwarf and other similar publications, which the petitioner positively refused; that the said Oliver first talked to the petitioner of resorting to physical force to obtain reform, as petitioning had proved of no avail; but on hearing such language from him, the petitioner threatened to lay an information against him before the magistrates, renounced his acquaintance, and desired that he might never see his face again; that the said Oliver and Mitchell, without any knowledge of the petitioner, did write circular letters to call a meeting of persons from different parts of the kingdom, to be held at the house of the petitioner; but as soon as he heard that a meeting was about to be held at his house for political purposes, the petitioner interfered and discharged them from assembling there; nor, notwithstanding the numerous statements professedly official to the contrary, has any meeting of delegates for secret political purposes, been held there at that or any other time since the petitioner has kept the said house; and that the petitioner never had any political connection with any man living in any unlawful purposes, nor ever attended any political meeting but one, regularly called to consider of a petition for parliamentary reform, which petition was afterwards presented and accepted by the house; that the petitioner can refer with confidence to his past conduct as a full and satisfactory proof of the loyalty and uprightness of his principles; that the petitioner for three years, during which period the mischievous Ludding system was at its utmost height, held the situation of deputy constable of the populous townships of Stanley cum Wrenthorpe, near Wakefield, in which situation his exertions were such, that that district was altogether exempted from the provisions of the watch and ward act, though that act was put in force in all the neighbouring villages by the deputy lieutenants, whose thanks the petitioner received for his active and useful exertions; that during the time the petitioner held the above office, all depredations were by him prevented through the precincts of those extensive and populous townships; that the petitioner also held for three years the situation of collector of assessed taxes throughout the same townships, during which period he was honoured with the warm commendation of the receiver-general for his diligence and punctuality in that office; the petitioner therefore humbly prays the house to take the above statements and the present situation of the petitioner into their kind consideration, and that the house will grant him such redress as in their mercy and clemency they may deem expedient and proper; and that the house will interpose their good offices with the right honourable secretary of state, that he may have the goodness to return to the petitioner the papers and old memorandum-book taken from him, which are the property of a poor widow, and furnish the only evidence she has of a debt of seventeen pounds, and her only security for its recovery."

Lord Folkestone then rose, pursuant to notice, and moved that the petition of Francis Ward, (presented to the house on the 29th of January) the petition of William Benbow, (presented on the 31st of January) the petitions of John Knight, and Samuel Haynes, (presented on the 6th of February) the petitions of Joseph Mitchell, Thomas Evans, William Ogden, and John Stewart, (presented on the 13th of February) and the petition of John Bagguley, (presented on the 16th of February) should be entered as read. This being done, the noble lord proceeded as follows:—"Sir, when the house consider all the circumstances detailed in those petitions, I am persuaded that they will think it their duty to pause, before they are induced to entertain, as a matter of course, a bill of indemnity. I have been led to introduce this subject to your notice at the earliest opportunity, because the noble lord (Castlereagh) has stated that a bill of indemnity is to be brought forward, not for the grave and serious discussion of the house, not as a measure that is to depend on its own merits, and to be rejected or approved as the conduct of his majesty's ministers shall warrant; but as a measure which the ministers are entitled to demand of the house, as a matter of course, and which the house in its legislative capacity, cannot refuse. It appears to me that a strange confusion prevails in the minds of several persons with respect to that bill. They seem to think that it is really due to the ministers of the crown, as the noble lord has stated, without any previous investigation; but if I know any thing of the principles of our constitution, I will be bold to say, that it is the duty of the house on this occasion not to take care so much of the ministers of the crown as of the liberties of the people. (Hear, hear.) Before they suffer themselves to give any countenance to a bill of indemnity, they should see that the people have not been damnified: they should first appoint a committee to examine the grievances which the petitioners have stated, and to ascertain whether the ministers have not exceeded their powers. Nothing can be more hostile to the spirit of liberty, nothing more destructive of that generous plan of power which our forefathers have delivered down to us, than the doctrine that a bill of this nature should be passed as a matter of course. During the last hundred and twenty years, the habeas corpus act has been suspended nine or ten times; but there is only one instance, the noble lord and his colleagues can find only one precedent of a bill to indemnify ministers for the measures which they have pursued under the suspension. It is singular, too, and not the least point that requires attention, that almost the very same persons then applied for a bill of indemnity who apply for it now. They are acting, therefore, on a precedent which they have made for themselves; they are calling upon the house to screen them from the consequences of their late violations of the law, merely, as they state, because they have been protected from such consequences before. Whatever some gentlemen may think of this matter, it is a curious fact, that the system now proposed to the house is of very modern date. I have taken some pains to look into the proceedings of parliament, and I find that the first instance of a bill of indemnity occurred in the 40th year of the reign of the present king. When ministers thought proper to apply to the legislature for a bill to suspend the habeas corpus act, they asserted that sedition and treason prevailed in several counties, and that the ordinary powers of the law were not sufficient to repress them. This was the ground upon which they desired to be intrusted with extraordinary powers. But what has been the result? The only instance which we know of any outrage having arisen from the evil spirit which was said to prevail, was that which occurred in Derbyshire, which was followed by a trial for high treason, and three individuals suffered the punishment of the law. No gentleman has shewn that any other case of treason had been found to exist. It is evident, therefore, that the dangers of the country were exaggerated beyond their proper dimensions; and that they might have been removed, had government taken a different course from that which they have pursued. With respect to the manner in which ministers have exercised the powers given to them by the act for suspending the habeas corpus, the very fact of asking for a bill of indemnity is a confession that they have abused the laws. (Hear, hear.) They have violated the law in all respects, and I am at a loss to know how gentlemen will justify themselves in the eyes of their constituents, in what manner they can reconcile it to their own consciences to grant an indemnity under such circumstances. It is admitted on all hands, that the suspension of the habeas corpus act gave no new powers of apprehending or dismissing persons. (Hear, hear, from Sir S. Romilly.) As to taking up persons in a different form, and executing warrants in a different manner, from the ordinary course of proceeding, ministers may look in vain to the suspension act for any sort of justification. The law has appointed regular and stated forms by which persons are to be apprehended and discharged; those forms are regulated by the authorities of our law books, and by acts of parliament; but, in the present instance, not one of those forms has been pursued. I will not dispute the power of a secretary of state to commit:—but it is undoubtedly an usurpation, and the practice is not of ancient date. It was by no means recognized in the time of King William. In the trial of Kendall and Roe, it is expressly denied by Sir Bartholomew Shower, who was counsel for the prisoner, and a long argument followed on his denial:—and though it was determined by the court in that case, that the power existed, yet it is not a little remarkable that, in that very case, which is said to have established and settled the point, the grounds of it were so indistinctly understood, that Mr. Justice Rokeby, affirming the power, drew as a necessary inference this conclusion:—that the secretary of state must have power to administer an oath—a power which from that day to this has never been exercised or so much as claimed by him.—A little before this time, it is clear that the power was understood not to exist, for by the licensing act of Charles II. though power is expressly given to the secretary of state to issue a warrant, (and this is the only act which does give such a power) the power to commit is so far from being given, that it enacts that the persons so apprehended shall be taken before a justice of the peace, and be by him committed:—thus in truth negativing the power of committal in the secretary of state altogether. I will not now dispute the power of the secretary to issue a warrant; but it is an undoubted usurpation, and was so pronounced by that great and excellent lawyer, Lord Camden, in which the three other judges of the court of common pleas agreed with him; and how it arose nobody knew. It is, in fact, a perfect anomaly; and if it is to exist, I, for one, should prefer that the power should be given to a secretary of state to administer an oath, in order to destroy the anomaly. With respect to forms, I certainly do not find any statute, or any judicial decision, by which a particular form is to be gone through by the secretary of state; but the same forms should be attended to on these occasions as are adopted in ordinary cases. In all cases of felony, a justice of the peace is to take the examination in writing of the accuser and witnesses on oath, and to send it to the proper court. It is not to be supposed, then, that if this necessity exists in inferior cases, it is not to be followed in superior cases: if particular forms are required in felonies, the same precaution should be taken towards those who are accused of the crime of treason. If a justice of the peace commits for treason, he must proceed in that way; because he commits not for treason, but for a breach of the peace. Now, none of these forms, as far as I have been able to ascertain, were followed in the recent proceedings. In regard to the first petition which I presented, it appears that the warrant for the arrest of the petitioner (Francis Ward) originated not with the secretary of state, but the magistrate at Nottingham, and that the parties entered the house, and refused to shew the warrant. It has been said, that, with respect to the treatment experienced by this man at Nottingham, great exaggerations have been made, and probably it may be so; but I shall insist, that irons ought not to have been used in any of these cases, unless absolutely necessary. I cannot help observing, that though the secretary of state may have given directions that these people should not be ill-treated, yet he took care that all those who are the proper guardians of such persons, the magistrates and justices of the peace, should be prevented from ascertaining whether they were ill-used or not (hear, hear, hear); and, therefore, if they were ironed, he is responsible for it. (Hear.) Some of the grievances may be expressed in language rather too strong; but I do not wonder that persons taken away from their families, and subjected to solitary confinement—a punishment unknown to the old law of England, and not inferior to death itself—should consider themselves much aggrieved, and express themselves in the strongest terms. In other times, the house has not been in the habit of turning a deaf ear to such complaints. It appears by an entry on the journals of the house, that in the year 1689, Lord Castlemaine, a member, was committed to the Tower, under a warrant of the secretary of state, for high treason; and the house being informed that he was not allowed to see his friends or servants, a debate arose touching the close confinement and ill usage of prisoners in Newgate, and several other prisons, and a committee was appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for the better regulating the imprisonment of the subject; and further, the Attorney-general was ordered to prosecute Mr. Richardson, the keeper of Newgate, for his illegal usage of several of the King's subjects during their imprisonment. Such were the resolutions of the Commons at that time; and I hope that the house will follow the example, and appoint a committee to examine into the truth of the matters alleged in these petitions, and take measures for giving redress. (Hear, hear.) I now beg to call the attention of the house to the case of these people. I maintain, that they were committed to prison without the ordinary process of the law, and were dismissed without due process. No lawyer will say that this was not irregular; no one will take upon himself to assert, that a person committed for a known offence can be released without some process of law. As to the recognizances of the parties themselves, it is an inferior sort of bail, and one of less security. It is a mode of discharge as illegal on the part of the officers of the crown, as it is unjust to the prisoners. It is illegal, because it is contrary to all the statutes from Edward I.; and unjust, because it leaves the parties with a stigma on their characters, which, if they had been tried, would most probably not have attached to them. The first statute on this subject, is that of the 3d of Edward I., commonly called the statute of Westminster. This act relates to replevins, the only sort of bail known at that time, and enacts, that prisoners that be taken for treason touching the King shall be in no wise replevisable. This act of Edward I., is re-enacted and confirmed by the 1 & 2 of Philip and Mary; so that I hold it to be most clear and decided law, that no magistrate can bail in case of high treason. But even admitting, (which I only do for the sake of the argument,) that magistrates have the power of bailing for high treason, they do not possess that power as lately exercised; for in the case of the prisoners, one magistrate took their recognizances in some instances, whereas by the act of Philip and Mary, the presence of two is required for the performance of that duty. These persons, therefore, could not legally have been bailed; for if it was regular now under the suspension act, as that act did not make any change in the law regarding the right of commitment or discharge, it would be regular in other cases. But it is said, that in this case there is the authority of the court of King's Bench, in favour of the doctrine that magistrates can bail for high treason, for the prisoners appeared before that court to have their recognizances discharged, and the legality of entering into them had thus been acknowledged. To this I cannot assent; no subsequent act of the prisoners could have any retrospective effect, so as to render legal what was previously decided to be contrary to law. But, after all, the question now in discussion was never brought before the court; the legality or illegality of the proceeding was not the point submitted, no decision, therefore, was or could be taken on it. I beg the house to consider what this doctrine, if admitted to this extent, would lead to. My hon. friend (Mr. M. A Taylor) has spoken of the delay of justice in the northern counties; and I will put the case of the commitment of a person, on the warrant of the secretary of state, to some gaol in Westmorland, immediately after the assizes; there he may lie for 11 months, and upon the near approach of the assizes, may be bailed by a magistrate, and thus may be left without any remedy, not having even the means of bringing an action for false imprisonment. Such a case may arise at any future period in the four northern counties, if the principle lately acted upon is admitted to be law It may appear strange, that I, who am so decidedly against the late imprisonments, who think the arrest and treatment of the persons who suffered by them were uncalled for and oppressive, should yet complain of their discharge; but on a little consideration it will be allowed that I am perfectly consistent. I complain of the manner in which these men were discharged, because it took from them all remedy—because it deprived them of all means of clearing their character, and obtaining compensation for the losses they suffered, and the hardships to which they were subjected. But this is not my only motive, nor is it the only duty of the house to see these men righted. It is the duty of the house to take notice of the violation of the laws, and to punish those who were the violators, though the petitioner might not quarrel with the transactions in question, and had no complaints to make against the government. (Hear, hear.) In regard to what was said in a former debate in this house. and the regret then expressed, (see page 163) that persons of more weight and greater consequence, who inflamed the public by their speeches, had not been arrested, I think that it is now manifest. why this was so. Doubtless the ministers would have been too happy to have given such an eclat to their measures, if they could have found any tolerable grounds for such steps; but they were unable to do so. Neither the hon. baronet (Sir F. Burdett) below me, nor any other gentleman, gave them the desired opportunity. Still, however, some victims must be had. It was not safe to lay hold of others who would not have submitted so quietly to their fate, or have accepted of their discharge on such conditions, who could neither have been imprisoned nor turned out of prison without creating some noise. (Hear, hear.) Not only is the rank of these victims such as to preclude them from making their complaints be heard with effect, but the house is told that their complaints ought not to be listened to, because their allegations are false. It has been argued, that they could not be believed, and that therefore their petitions for inquiry laid no sufficient ground for the present motion. Even admitting the premises of the gentlemen opposite, I cannot see the justness of their conclusion. If the allegations of the petitioners were as false as they are contended to be, I still think the present motion ought to be entertained, in order to have them disproved, and to shew to the country if that were the case, that the ministers, in the exercise of the extraordinary powers intrusted to them, have not proceeded with unnecessary rigour, or acted contrary to the authority of law. It has been said, that Francis Ward, whose petition I have made the ground of this motion, is a bad character, and therefore unworthy the attention of the house; but I will ask on what ground the charge is advanced? Has he done any thing which has been proved against him—has he been convicted of any offence? On the old maxim of law, which I am sorry to see discountenanced by some members of the house, (hear) every man ought to be presumed innocent till he is found to be guilty; and this person ought, therefore, to be considered as honest and credible till he is convicted of being the contrary. I shall not only rely on this general doctrine, but I will say, that I have the authority of government itself for this man's innocence. He was taken up at Nottingham, immediately after the disturbances which agitated the neighbouring districts, and which were made the subject of legal investigation at Derby; but if this man were the dangerous and turbulent character now alleged, why was not the power intrusted to the government used before? Why was he not taken up when his activity might have promoted the disturbance? He was left in tranquillity, in fact, till the storm, which it is now said he was concerned in raising, was dissipated. This fact must therefore be taken either as an acknowledgment that the present allegations are false, or else that he was left at large as a means of ensnaring and decoying others. Let ministers make their choice. But if there are any objections against the character of Ward, there can be none against that of the petitioner whose case has this night been submitted to the house, by my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Brougham), and that case, with others, may be referred to the committee. Even, however, on the admission that the conduct of Ward is indefensible, that fact cannot be pleaded as an argument for doing him injustice. Whether he is a good or a bad man, his case deserves to be inquired into, and he ought to be placed on an equal footing with any other subject till his guilt is proved. I have received a testimonial of Ward's character, which I will read to the house, if it is necessary; but I do not ground this motion on the petitioner's character, but on the breach of the law which has been made in his person. I shall therefore not trouble the house with any further observations, but conclude by moving,

"that a committee be appointed to inquire into the truth of the allegations in the said petitions, and report their opinion thereupon to the house."

Lord Castlereagh said, that the speech of the noble mover did not seem to accord with the words of the motion of which he had given notice. He had understood the noble lord formerly to allude to the case of Francis Ward, and to move for a specific inquiry into the allegations of his petition. He had, however, widely departed from that declared intention, and introduced into his speech the discussion of more comprehensive topics, connected with the general measure of the suspension act, and the cases of all those who had been imprisoned under the powers which it conferred. But though the noble lord had altered his course, he would not alter his. He would particularly advert to the case of Ward, which the noble lord threw in the back ground, and for inquiring into which, had the noble lord confined himself to it, he would not have objected to a committee. He was willing to allow that, if such a committee had been appointed, the noble lord might consistently have moved to refer other petitions to it: but by his speech he had departed from the grounds of his motion, and dwelt only on the necessity of a general investigation. He had alluded to the probability that his Majesty's ministers would introduce a bill of indemnity to protect them from any of the legal consequences of the late exercise of the powers intrusted to them by parliament, and he had apparently bestowed some attention to the nature and history of such a measure; but he could not compliment him on the accuracy of his reasoning or the success of his search. He had said, that though there were numerous instances of the suspension of the habeas corpus act, from the commencement of the last century down to the present time, yet that there was only one precedent for a bill of indemnity, and that had been passed as a protection to a cabinet composed nearly of the same persons who were now about to apply for it. Relying on the accuracy of this statement, the noble lord had called upon ministers to produce another instance of the passing of a bill of indemnity after the exercise of the powers conferred by the suspension act; but he (Lord C. should be more correct in challenging the noble lord to produce an instance where it was necessary to exercise the extraordinary powers of the suspension, which was not followed by an act of indemnity. (Hear, hear.) The last precedent, he allowed, was peculiar in its circumstances, for it extended to acts done under all the suspensions of the constitution, from 1793 down to 1801; but it was not singular in its occurrence. In the reign of King William, not less than three bills of indemnity were passed. There was one after the rebellions in 1715 and 1745. In fact, the noble lord would find, that an act of indemnity had been granted in every case where a suspension act had passed, and where it was found necessary to put in force the powers conferred for the stability of government, and the safety of the country. (Hear.) The noble lord had assumed, that an application for a measure of this kind, after the exercise of the extraordinary powers put into the hands of government by the legislature, amounted always to a confession of the oppressive rigour with which they had acted, and of the commission of deeds which they could not justify to the country on their responsibility. This was an unfair view of the case. The suspension act, which was never passed by the legislature except with the view of meeting a danger which it believed could not be encountered by the ordinary powers of the law, only allowed government to commit suspected persons, and bound them over to prosecute. In the exercise of this authority, he denied that his Majesty's ministers had committed any unnecessary acts of severity, or had transgressed the bounds of the trust reposed in them. He denied that his noble friend, the secretary for the home department, had been guilty either of cruelty or injustice; he denied that he had given his warrant for commitment without the evidence of credible witnesses, taken on oath: (hear, hear) he denied that he had committed one individual on the testimony of the person (Oliver) so much alluded to by the other side of the house: he denied that a single arrest took place without not only having the depositions of credible witnesses, but the authority of the law-officers of the crown. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord, however, went on such grounds as would render any justification of this kind quite inadmissible, and would prove the criminality of ministers in whatever manner they exercised the powers intrusted to them by parliament. He had argued, that there was no necessity for the suspension act. The house had, however, thought otherwise; and having placed in the hands of ministers extraordinary powers, which they were called to exercise on their own responsibility, those ministers would have betrayed their trusts, if, seeing the necessity of exercising them for the maintenance of the public tranquillity, and the preservation of the government and constitution, they had refrained from acting as they had done. Parliament had proceeded to legislate on two reports, the main facts of which were believed by gentlemen on both sides of the house. Both those reports stated, that a dangerous conspiracy existed against the frame of government and the peace of the country; and that this conspiracy was endeavouring to take advantage of the unavoidable distresses of the times, to turn the physical force of the people against the existence of the state, and the order of society. Government had been armed with powers to meet the danger, and had exercised those powers consistently with the tenor of existing laws and the conditions of their trust. On this ground he would meet the noble lord, and say that there had been no violation of the law. He agreed with him that all the forms of law should be observed, that witnesses should be examined, and that no arrest should take place without proper evidence; but he denied that this principle made it necessary to place a witness, who gave his oath under the suspension act, in the situation of other witnesses, or that a magistrate was bound to bring his informations into court, as he would be bound in ordinary cases. The ordinary course was for a magistrate to lay the evidence on which he committed, with the names of the witnesses, before the bench; but it was plain that this principle could not be acted upon on the present occasion without defeating the object which the legislature had in view. He would put a case:—supposing a magistrate had offered to the secretary of state evidence on oath, on the truth of which he completely relied, affecting the existence of the government, or necessary to the preservation of the public tranquillity, and supposing that that magistrate could only obtain or transmit such evidence on condition that the names of the witnesses were to be concealed, or that neither he nor they were to be exposed to the consequences of giving such important information, could his noble friend, acting on his responsibility, have refused to listen to such testimony, or could he have refused his warrant to commit the person whom it affected? He was convinced that such a principle could not be maintained, and should be glad to be informed in what situation his noble friend would stand, if, after having acted on such evidence, he was required to justify in a court of law the commitment he had made? It was altogether a false view of the bill in contemplation, to consider it as a bill for the protection of the ministers of the crown: it was for the protection of individuals who had come forward to give information of the utmost importance to the security of the country; but which could not be elicited otherwise than by the prospect of such protection as the measure alluded to held out. The ministers of the crown had only their choice of two difficulties. They must have received such information under the only conditions it was judged safe to communicate it, or hazard the peace of the country by adhering to the ordinary course of law: but if the ordinary course of law had been sufficient, why should recourse be had to the suspension of the habeas corpus? The suspension was for the express purpose of protecting individuals from the hazard which might attend the disclosure, in an open trial, of the information which they had given; and without such protection no information could be had, as none would venture to offer it at the risk of his own safety. On such grounds indemnity was always judged necessary, not to cover ministers, but to protect those who saved their country. If the question were at all inquired into, it would appear, that upon every principle of justice such a protection was necessary, and to deny it would be attended with insurmountable difficulties. With respect to the hardships of imprisonment, of which so much had been said, the question could not be entertained by the house without great irregularity; for those individuals who thought themselves aggrieved, had always their remedy at hand; the ordinary courts of law were open to them, and there was nothing to preclude them from bringing their action. The suspension of the habeas corpus act only prevented trial during the operation of that measure. When that was no longer necessary, there was nothing to prevent individuals, who conceived themselves aggrieved further than by mere confinement, from seeking redress: but this was a question to be tried only by the judges of the land, and to this they were fully competent. He trusted, therefore, that the house would agree with him in thinking that there was no necessity for a committee of inquiry. With regard to the hardships of which those petitions complained, great delusion had been practised, which had produced much inflammation without, and misrepresentation within that house. Many petitions had been presented on that subject last session; some not even signed by the persons from whom they purported to come. In one of them, heavy complaints were made of the great danger arising to the petitioner's health from the damp state of the dungeon in which he was confined. Upon inquiry, however, by several members of the house, it was found that the accommodations were comfortable, and that the rooms were such as the hon. gentlemen themselves, if committed to prison, would not think it a hardship to dwell in. These petitions were brought forward for the purpose of putting the house into an invidious predicament—for the purpose of creating clamour, inflammation, and discontent, because parliament would not step out of its way to interfere with what evidently belonged to other parts of our system. Let the plaintiffs commence their action in the proper place, and there could be no doubt of inquiry. With respect to the number of petitions now brought forward, he had to observe, that there was nothing startling in the case. In no one instance had a bill of indemnity been contemplated, but similar petitions were brought forward, and gentlemen were equally ready to vouch for the truth of the statements which they exhibited; but this never induced the house to step aside to inquire into such ex-parte statements by a committee who should examine witnesses not upon oath. The statements of Mr. Ward were a pregnant instance of misrepresentation. The manner in which he stated his original imprisonment was quite incorrect. He was arrested by the magistrates of Nottingham, upon suspicion of being concerned in the outrages of the Luddites in that part of the country. When he was within a few days of being dismissed from confinement on this charge, he was detained under a warrant from the secretary of state, on charges of a treasonable nature. The complaint of being confined with common felons was applicable only to the first period of imprisonment, when he was confined as a felon. With respect to the place of his confinement, it appeared from the affidavit of the gaoler (which his lordship read) that the walls were perfectly dry and free from damp; that there was no offensive smell but what arose from fumigation; that the petitioner never made any complaint to the gaoler, nor was he ever loaded with irons or fetters. He was shortly after removed to Oxford; and when he was there, he wrote to the secretary of state to desire some changes to be made in his treatment, which were all granted, and he sent a letter to Lord Sidmouth to express his gratitude. This man affected the character of an extremely moral and religious person, and complained much that he had not the privilege of attending public worship. He had been confined there from the 21st day of June, and from that day to the 1st of August, he never once expressed a wish to that purpose; and the first notice they had of such a wish was by a letter to his wife. This letter, which the gaoler never saw, was transmitted to the secretary of state. Inquiry was immediately made why the prisoner was not allowed to attend public worship. The gaoler wrote in reply, that he should have allowed the state prisoners to attend divine worship, if they had desired it, at the chapel of the gaol, in his own pew. They were then allowed to attend public worship at the regular times. The petitioner had complained that he had been improperly treated on his way to town. The two officers denied any ill-treatment, and the man to whom he was fettered had expressed great gratitude to them for their treatment. But the petitioner had also complained of solitary confinement, and that the room was unsuitable in which he was confined. The inconvenience of the room was, that it smoked during certain winds. The gaoler offered to make any alteration in the chimney which should be suggested, and an alteration was made, and no complaint was afterwards heard. He was allowed also, on his request, to live with another prisoner. He left prison apparently in as good health as he entered it, though his constitution, especially as to his lungs, was defective. It was excessively painful to allude to the moral character of an individual, but it was necessary, to prevent the house from being carried away by their feelings. He must protest against the attempt to mislead them by ex-parte statements. The house, he trusted, would not suffer their feelings to be trifled with, nor call in question the conduct of ministers in the exercise of an arduous duty, on such grounds as the petition on the table contained. As to the morals of the petitioner, he could prove them to be very different from what the petition might lead gentlemen to expect. He must here, however, refrain from entering into all the evidence he could produce on the subject, for the same reasons for which he could not bring forward the evidence against those committed under the suspension act. The danger of disclosure to those who gave evidence was the cause of concealment. But he could, notwithstanding, satisfy the house as to the petitioner's moral character. From the terms of his petition, he might be supposed to be more than ordinarily religious: when complaining of the officers, he says,—"having always conformed to the laws of no less a personage than Jesus Christ, 'do unto others as you would they should do unto you,' I believed I had nothing to fear." Then, to give an idea of his distress, he says:—"figure to your imaginations a man who through life has taken a very active part in it, being accustomed to labour hard for his bread, by frequently having to work 12, 14, 16 hours a day, and sometimes more, and on whom a numerous family depended for subsistence, suddenly dragged from home and labour, to be immured in a dungeon. Add to this," he proceeds, "that I am possessed of all the finer feelings that can adorn human nature (a general laugh), and that those feelings were put on the rack," &c. Now, in complete contradiction to all this, he was prepared to shew that this petitioner had been engaged in the most atrocious crimes. (Hear, hear.) In 1816, two persons were convicted and executed at Leicester and Nottingham, who made a full confession of their crimes a short time previous to their execution. Their confessions were taken by the magistrate, and forwarded to his Majesty's ministers. The confessions he would now read, suppressing all the names alluded to in them, except the name of Francis Ward. The first was the confession of Josiah Mitchell, who was executed at Leicester for a felony committed at Loughborough. In this confession he stated:—"B. shot A.—C. told me that Francis Ward had mentioned the thing to him on Saturday evening, and said there would be a deal of money in it, the workmen had offered to give one hundred pounds for the machinery. Several of us met at the Navigation Inn, and formed our plans. I received from three to four pounds from Ward for acts I performed. Ward gave me ten pounds for the part I took in destroying the works at Wood-peck-lane, in Nottingham. Our committee met at the Duke of York in Nottingham, Francis Ward was the treasurer. Ward belonged also to the Loughborough committee. Ward employed me to shoot a man who had refused to turn out, and offered four pounds as my reward." The noble lord requested that the house would not consider this as incredible; assassination was a crime bargained for, and set at a regular price, like a piece of stockings or any other work. More than one jury had convicted on evidence which shewed that four pounds was often the price for shooting a man. The confession went on. "Ward offered ten pounds for shooting some of Kendal's men. He offered ten pounds for shooting another master manufacturer; and five pounds for shooting one of his men for working. He offered a large sum for murdering the judge at the last assize. We met at the Jolly Bacchus, and when none agreed to do this, Francis Ward took out a golden guinea and said, he was determined it must be done." The second confession was that of

Thomas Savage, who was executed a few weeks after Mitchell. It corroborated the former confession. The noble lord trusted the house would now see the course of proceeding they were called upon to adopt; he trusted they must now be aware of the true character of this petitioner. (Hear.) Whether this man could be put on his trial for the foul crimes with which he was charged, it was not for him to determine. It was enough to say, that he had been committed on the evidence of two credible witnesses, and that he was charged with having been engaged in those dreadful and infernal actions, by the confession of two of his associates, given in the most solemn moments,—in the last moments of life. He could assure the gentlemen opposite, that there were circumstances which would appal their convictions, as to the whole proceedings of ministers, as much as in this case. In this case there was nothing wanting to a moral conviction but the judgment of a jury; but without that, every moral mind must be satisfied as to the petitioner's character. He hoped he had now said enough to prevent the feelings of the house from being run away with. If then the motion was not rational in the case of Mr. Ward, he would contend that it was not rational in any other case. The house would not, therefore, on those ex-parte statements, think it necessary to institute a committee of inquiry into the allegations of those whose crimes threatened the country. When the conduct of ministers should be fully inquired into by the committee above-stairs, it would be the conviction of the committee, and from their report it would be the conviction of that house, that ministers had shewn no malignant spirit, no oppressive temper, no disposition to injure or distress any individual; but, on the contrary, that they had shewn every forbearance and lenity consistent with their sense of duty. The noble lord opposite wished, by his motion, to bring forward those who had given evidence on the faith of government, and to bring them before a committee of that house. He should satisfy the committee already appointed, that no individual had been committed but upon oath, and upon evidence satisfactory not only to the secretary of state, but to the law officers of the crown, and he would further prove to the committee the probability of the crimes of which they were suspected. If the house would not allow secret information to be received and acted upon, conspirators, who contracted for assassination with the same precision and formality as for any other engagement, could not be detected or punished. The outrages that broke out in the places from which the suspected were taken, proved the existence of strong grounds of suspicion, and the necessity of such measures as were adopted in order to put down insurrection; for an insurrection it was. He therefore trusted that the house would not suffer such inquiry as was now required; this he trusted, not from any apprehension of the principles on which ministers had acted, but in justice to those whose names they were bound to keep secret: for the consequence of such an inquiry would be, either that ministers must submit to all the charges brought against them, or abandon those who had given evidence on the faith of concealment to the vindictive attacks of those whom they had detected. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. John Smith said, he had supposed that the present motion was to be confined to the case of Ward, and with this supposition he had resolved to vote against it. (Hear, hear.) No man could believe one word in Ward's petition. If falsehood was detected in one part, that was good ground for discrediting the whole. The part, then, that reflected on the magistrates of Nottingham was most false. He had no motives for saying of those magistrates what he did not believe, but he appealed to ministers whether those magistrates could be surpassed by any set of magistrates in honour, fairness, and fidelity. (Hear, hear, from the ministerial benches.) Information on oath had been given them that there were arms in Ward's house, and this information was given the day after the Derby insurrection. Mr. Enfield, the clerk, a most respectable gentleman, hesitated to give a warrant at first, because the information was not in writing. This occasioned any irregularity that might attend this part of the case. But the magistrate had information, that Ward had been concerned in the horrible murders at Loughborough, the most horrible that were ever known in any part of the country. He was grieved to say, that there were still circumstances which made it dangerous for witnesses to come forward in that quarter. There was one circumstance to prove this man's participation in those crimes which he had occasion to know, and which the noble lord had not mentioned. Previously to the trial, Mitchell confessed the main part of the facts respecting Ward, to a professional man; whether desired to do so in order to prepare for his defence, or whether he had done it to relieve his mind, the hon. member could not say. The professional man felt himself obliged to conceal this while Mitchell lived; but after his death the obligation ceased, and he then confirmed the confessions read by the noble lord. For these reasons he had come down to the house, resolved to oppose the motion, but he found it to be a different motion from what he had expected. It was not confined to Ward, but included all the petitioners; and, therefore, he did not know that he was to neglect all the complaints of the many other petitioners, because Ward, a petitioner, was a very bad character. (Hear, hear, from the opposition side of the house.) He, being connected with such a populous district, had often happened to apply to the noble lord at the head of the home department; and he believed no man was more likely to do what was fair and humane than his lordship. But it was not equally clear that his intention was always carried into effect. Many who acted under his orders, but not immediately under his eye, might have indulged party feelings to which his lordship was a stranger. He could not at all see that the falsification of Ward's individual statement afforded any fair ground for refusing to go into an inquiry. If any one case of improper severity was made out, the house were bound to inquire into it: he could not, therefore, because one case had been negatived, oppose a motion, the object of which was to go into an inquiry on all. If not a word of all the statements were true, he wondered that the parties making them had not been brought to account. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Golding said, he was possessed of some local knowledge on the subject of a part of these petitions. He held in his hand a declaration of the gaoler of Reading, which stated, that three prisoners, James Sellers, Nathaniel Hulton, and John Knight, were brought to him on the 10th of April, at about nine o'clock in the evening; they complained that they had tasted no provision during the whole of their journey from London (the house would recollect that that journey was only 39 miles); he then conducted them into his own kitchen, fed them on cold roast beef and pickles, with strong beer; they had as much as they could eat. He then provided them with beds in the best apartments of the prison; they were feather beds of the best quality, and Sellers was placed in the state apartment; Knight was placed over the chapel. On the day following he stationed them in a ward, where they had an apartment 16 feet by 14: annexed was a list of luxuries with which they had been supplied. Instead of being separated, they continued together for 16 days; and it was not possible that this should have been otherwise arranged, except under the orders of a visiting magistrate. Those orders were afterwards given, and Knight was placed in the room over the chapel; the deputy-gaoler was removed to accommodate the others, and their apartments were all well furnished; insomuch that the prisoners expressed to their relations their satisfaction at the good treatment they had received. Knight, who had spent 10s. 6d. in tobacco, and had received many presents from the gaoler, returned thanks for his kindness and generosity. When he was first placed over the chapel, the sashes of his apartment were nailed down, to prevent him from communicating with some workmen, who were employed opposite; but on his applying for a ventilator, it was immediately granted. The apartments allotted to him had since been occupied by gentlemen debtors. Knight's situation was more comfortable than even that of Sellers and Hulton. Sir Nathaniel Duckenfield, Mr. Stone, Mr. Farmer, and many other magistrates, had visited the prisoners continually, and could prove that they expressed themselves entirely satisfied. He held in his hand an acknowledgment of two of them, made to the magistrates of Berkshire, thanking Eastaff, the governor of the gaol, for his kindness and attention; he had furnished Sellers and Hulton, on their departure, with extra clothing and money for their journey. The hon. gentleman said, he should not trouble the house any farther on this subject, but he had felt it his duty to put them in possession of these facts, as an act of justice to the gaoler. (Hear, hear.)

Sir W. Lemon declared, that no man in England could be less suspected of severity than the noble lord at the head of the home department, nor did he think that his Majesty's ministers were desirous of using that law, which he, and other members, had thought it their duty to oppose, to any bad purposes. But petitioners now came to the house complaining of oppressions, of which the noble lord might or might not be guilty; but it was by no means so clear that those employed under him were altogether blameless. An hon. gentleman under him had admitted that one of the petitions was not borne out; perhaps none of them might be borne out; but whether that should turn out so or not, it was the paramount duty of that house to inquire into all cases of grievance that were laid before them. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Gordon wished to say a few words on the petition of Bagguley. In consequence of that petition, he had written to the gaoler of Gloucester, whom he knew to be a man of great humanity, and the reply to his inquiries was a complete contradiction of the petition. The prisoner stated, that on his arrival he had been plunged in a tub of cold water; and that a dangerous fever and cold had been the consequence of this immersion. The gaoler stated, that so far from the water being cold, the rules of the prison required that a warm bath should be always used on such occasions: the prisoner, who had travelled all night, declared at the time, that he found this extremely comfortable, and so far was he from being ill, that he went into prison on the 11th of April, and never complained till the 20th of May. The part of the prison in which he had been confined, had since been allotted to gentlemen debtors. He was allowed to walk out whenever he pleased, and was allowed a guinea a week for provisions. (Hear, hear.) The bills brought in to him for various articles were carefully examined that he might not be imposed upon, and he expressed himself in every way satisfied with his treatment. Notwithstanding Lord Sidmouth's circular, the governor had permitted all magistrates to visit him; not visiting magistrates only, but even some who did not belong to the county, and among them Sir George Paul. He (Mr. Gordon) thought it was but justice to the governor of Gloucester gaol to state these particulars, but the governor himself was anxious that an investigation should take place. (Hear, hear.) And even if all the petitioner had stated were false, he thought it no reason against commencing an investigation: for the house ought to know on its own authentic inquiry how far the petitions were true, and how far false, in order at least to punish those who had made false representations.

Sir W. Guise read a letter from a respectable clergyman, a magistrate, confirming the statement that had been made respecting Bagguley, more especially as to the fact of the warm bath, and the various comforts that were supplied him. His general behaviour, it was added, was extremely regular, and the governor had not once occasion to find fault with him. The hon. baronet contended, nevertheless, that the house was bound to go into an inquiry wherever a grievance was alleged, and, therefore, he thought it right to support the motion.

Sir F. Burdett regretted that he could not come to the discussion of this question with a mind quite so unbiassed and unprejudiced as those gentlemen had professed who had delivered their sentiments before him. He could not but call to mind, that when he first drew the attention of the house to the conduct of the governor of the prison in Cold Bath-fields, when he was charged with crimes of the blackest die, (of which he, Sir F. Burdett, possessed the fullest evidence, but was never permitted to bring it forward)—he repeated, he could never forget, that at that time, just as on the present occasion, gentlemen rose up in various parts of the house, some declaring on their own knowledge, others on statements made by Aris himself, that he was a man of the most kindly and benevolent disposition; that he had never been guilty of any cruelty or oppression whatever, and that the prison was conducted on a system of uniform mildness. The hon. gentleman who was then member for Yorkshire, (Mr. Wilberforce) had stated, that nothing could equal the attention paid by Aris to the prisoners; that he was a pattern of humanity, and indeed too good for his station; but the house would probably recollect that story, which at the time it was told seemed to excite very little sensation in the house—a story which was paralleled only by the history of the prisoner in the Bastile, and his companion the spider; that prisoner, in the course of a long and solitary confinement, by way of some object to divert his weary hours, had attached to him a large spider, which, by degrees, became so intimate as to visit him at regular intervals, and receive its food; it served as a companion, and gave an interesting occupation to the wretched prisoner. He watched its motions, and taught it to spin its web in a peculiar way; but the malicious gaoler, observing the pleasure he derived from this mode of diverting his mind, killed the spider, when the unhappy prisoner declared, that he had lost the only tie that rendered existence supportable. The story he had told of Aris was much of the same description: he had confined a prisoner for 15 months in a solitary cell. In the course of a hard winter, a robin flew into the window: it soon became a favourite with the prisoner, and his only solace. After a long interval, Aris, who very seldom visited the cell, entered one morning, and seeing the bird, crushed it in his hand, notwithstanding the most earnest entreaties on the part of the prisoner that its life might be spared. The agony the poor man suffered was that of one who had lost his dearest and most valuable friend; so bitter had been the infliction of solitary confinement. Aris nevertheless represented himself as the most humane of mankind—a man whose foible was benevolence, and whose fault always to relax the discipline of the prison. He only mentioned this to say that the house ought not to be surprised if he was not quite so ready to believe what gentlemen or what gaolers themselves stated in proof of their own good qualities. He had no doubt that the gentlemen who made these statements meant well, and themselves believed all they had advanced; but he could not avoid being himself a little more sceptical on the subject. With respect to the hon. member for Nottingham, (Mr. J. Smith) he begged pardon, but he could not avoid saying, that the whole of his speech relating to the business of Ward was nothing to the purpose. The question whether he was a bad man or not was nothing to the house; the real question was, whether he had been justly charged with high treason, whether he had been legally committed, and whether he had been legally treated under that commitment; that was the question, and not whether he was a man of good or bad character. He should therefore contend with those gentlemen who said they believed these statements, and yet called for an inquiry, that such an inquiry ought to be instituted; for what could be such scandalous trifling with the public, as to hold out redress for grievances, and yet refuse to inquire whenever a case was brought forward? The noble lord opposite had left very little for him to do, because he had not in any manner met or answered the arguments of the noble mover; and though he complained that it would waste the time of the house to inquire into grievances which might turn out to be false, yet he thought it no waste of time to enter into long statements, of which not a syllable could ever be capable of proof. He put it once more to the common sense and candour of the house, and he would ask, could any person be biassed by the statement of a gaoler in his own favour? It had been said, and it might be true, that a great number of gaolers had not even been accused of harshness; if so, the expression of one of our poets, that "the steeled gaoler was seldom the friend of man," should be now applied to the steeled minister; and if any misconduct had been committed by any under the noble lord's authority, he should say that the noble lord was liable, even though he was not privy to such misconduct. It was a maxim of the common law, that qui facit per alium facit per se, and the noble lord was answerable for the acts of all who were placed under him. The noble lord's characteristic mildness and benevolence had been used as an argument for obtaining extraordinary power, and the same character was now thrust forward as a ground for stifling all inquiry; so that this individual character was to supersede the principles of the constitution, and set at nought the ordinary course of justice, when the power granted to him had been so shamefully, disgracefully, cruelly, and illegally applied. Some of the gaolers had themselves stated, that they were sorry they were ordered to proceed more harshly than was necessary, and that they thought there could be no use of irons to secure those who were immured in a solitary cell. A gentleman had said that many of the statements made were false; they might be so, but there were many of them which loudly called for inquiry. He should be glad to be informed why Ogden's case was not to be investigated—a man 74 years old, who had suffered most severely, and who, like many others, was transferred from one gaol to another, and exposed as a spectacle to their countrymen. It was asserted, and was not contradicted, that two men had been chained together, even in bed, and were besides loaded with heavy irons, where there could exist no pretence of safe custody—why was not this to be inquired into? Sufferings from cold and hunger made but little figure upon paper; but they were great miseries to endure, and whether they had been justly or unjustly endured, it became the house to ascertain. Was it any answer to the general claim, for a member to produce in his place, a letter from a gaoler, who stated that the water in which the prisoner had been plunged was warm, and that it was very delightful and comfortable, when the prisoner himself declared that the water was cold, and that the consequence of it was a fever, from which he with difficulty recovered? This fact shewed that inquiry was necessary; and though in one or two cases it had been admitted that the keepers of the prisons had behaved with humanity and kindness, yet there were many others where complaints were made of a treatment directly the reverse. No doubt, however, the house would decide against the motion, and many members would hold that the statements in the petitions were all false. Why?—because the noble lord had so asserted. The noble lord had great confidence (far too great and too well founded for the interests of the people) in the discernment of parliament, at least as far as respected his own arguments and assertions. He (Lord Castlereagh) was sure hon. members would think with him that all investigation was needless; and in the same confidence that all he alleged would be implicitly credited, he had gone on to state, that ministers wanted no bill of indemnity, and required no protection. The house could not fail to recollect in what manner the noble lord had talked at the time the habeas corpus suspension was first brought forward; he had spoken of the heavy responsibility about to be thrown upon ministers, and he and they appeared almost to lament that so grievous a burden was about to be cast upon them. Of course he (Sir F. Burdett) never believed a word of it; he knew it was a mere pretence, and he had proposed several motions to lighten the weight; first that it should be followed by no bill of indemnity; and next to obtain a declaration by the house, that it was not its intention that under the suspension bill torture should be inflicted by loading the prisoners with heavy irons, or confining them in solitary dungeons. What was the answer given on the other side? The character of the noble Secretary of State for the home department. It was impossible to suppose that such a kind-hearted man as Lord Sidmouth would consent to such practices, and the motion was an unnecessary imputation upon his character. Many gentlemen thought it was impossible that such things could have been done; but had they not been done? or if the assertions of the sufferers were disputed, why was not inquiry to be made? The majority of the house undoubtedly entertained high notions of ministers; they could be guilty of no misconduct as long as they were ministers; and because they were ministers, they had not been guilty of any misconduct in this instance; the bare mention of misconduct on their part was enough to acquit them, in the house; but not out of it; for such notions did not extend beyond the walls of the place in which they were supreme. The question was, who broke the law? The prisoners answered, the noble lord and his friends; but assertion would not satisfy the country, and the gaoler of Gloucester himself solicited investigation; the offenders, if such they were, were anxious for trial, even at the risk of their lives. Ministers alone resisted it, maintaining that the time of the house would be wasted, and its character degraded. He (Sir F. Burdett) should be glad to know what a house of commons was to do, if not to inquire. The noble lord had said, that it could not take evidence upon oath, and so forth; and was for completely destroying its inquisitorial functions, formerly esteemed of such value and importance. The noble lord was a perfect Proteus in argument; he could "confute, change sides, and still confute." When he wished to shield his own acts and those of his colleagues, then said he, appoint a committee; but a committee of his own selection, of which he was himself a member; a committee in which ministers sat to be their own judges, and who were aided by those who would ask for nothing but what the noble lord was pleased to shew them, and who would credit any thing which he requested them, without inquiring, and out of compliment to himself, to believe. Such a gross delusion would satisfy no man out of parliament. But if a body were proposed, from which placemen and pensioners were to be excluded, and who would go to work thoroughly and fairly with the delinquencies of the noble lord and his friends, then they were not to be trusted, the time of the house would be wasted, and its dignity degraded! But, said the noble lord, it is a great mistake to suppose that ministers want an indemnity: what they wish is, to cover their friends, Oliver, his fellow spies, and accomplice informers; in short, the bill of indemnity was admitted on the other side to be for the protection of those secret and infamous sources of private accusation, whose purpose was to destroy the happiness and reputation of every honest man. Was it possible that at this time of day such an avowal should be made—that in England it should be professed that innocent men might be solitarily confined, cruelly tortured, and unjustly accused, and should never have an opportunity of discovering to whom they were indebted for all these deprivations and sufferings? The illegality of letting these unfortunate men out of prison with the ridiculous mummery of their own recognizance, was as great as the illegality of their first commitment. He (Sir F. Burdett) did not rest the question upon the merits or demerits of Ward;—that had been already answered, at least as far as was necessary for a fair decision upon a motion which did not respect his petition merely; and he could not help hoping, that when gentlemen considered the subject seriously (more especially those who had voted for the suspension,) they would feel themselves bound in honour, and for their own sakes, to vote for an inquiry. They ought to recollect, that this very subject of arbitrary imprisonment on suspicion of treason, had occasioned some of the severest domestic struggles this country had ever known; they ought to recollect that the words of the great charter were, nulli negabimus, nulli differemus justitiam; yet now the answer was, negatur, differtur, for justice was delayed and denied to those who, in the confidence of their own innocence, had clamoured in a court of justice for trial by the laws of their country. This fact of itself was a condemnation of ministers. The injured men were refused a trial, not from the tender mercies of government, but because they knew that the acquittal of the innocent would be the conviction of the guilty. Magna Charta had become obsolete of late: it was old-fashioned law, not suited to the refinements of modern times; and the declaration, that nullus liber homo capiatur, aut imprisonetur, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, had been totally neglected and forgotten. It might not be amiss if gentlemen would refresh their memories, and enlarge their minds a little, by recurring to the wholesome laws of Henry II. and Edward III., by all of which it was provided, that no man should be imprisoned without being duly brought to trial *. Though not quite so old, the Petition of Right seemed equally to have escaped recollection; it consisted of four parts—first, that no tax shall be imposed without common consent, by act of parliament; next, that no arbitrary imprisonments shall be allowed without information upon oath, and subsequent trial; thirdly, that the people shall not be compelled to receive soldiers and mariners into their houses, against the laws and customs of the realm; and fourthly, that the kingdom shall not be governed by martial law.—If the measures lately adopted were to be pursued, it would be utter nonsense to talk of the happy constitution of England; and if it were to be infringed, far better would it be that it should be done by the King than the Commons. Nothing could be more lamentable than that this house should take upon itself unwarrantable innovations; for if the King made attempts of the kind, the Commons might be resorted to, but it would be a mockery to appeal to the Commons pro formâ against its own acts.—As this would, probably, not be the last time he should have an opportunity of addressing the house on subjects on this nature, he would not trouble them further at present.

Mr. Wilberforce begged to state, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. baronet, that he derived his intelligence respecting the humane character of Mr. Aris, late governor of the house of correction for Middlesex, from the rev. Mr. Owen, chaplain-general, who for many months had been in the habit of visiting the prison, and was well acquainted with its condition and management. He requested, in return, that the hon. baronet would state his authority for the story he had told regarding the bird wantonly killed by Mr. Aris. With respect to the question before the house, he thought that all the presumptions were in favour of the correctness and legality of the proceedings of ministers, and it was a great mistake to suppose that the character of Mr. Ward had nothing to do with the merits of the motion; if he had stated what was untrue, as was evident, what right had he to ask for investigation, unless, indeed, that he might be punished as his crimes deserved? Hon. gentlemen from all quarters had borne testimony to the good conduct of gaolers, and in several instances it was established that the petitions contained nothing but falsehoods. True it was that the house possessed the privilege of inquiry; but nothing was more dangerous to a privilege than its abuse. All ancient constitutions had possessed some extraordinary means of meeting extraordinary dangers; and it was the glory of our own, and that which had given it stability, that while sometimes it allowed the infringement of the strict bounds of law, to avoid sudden and imminent peril, it had the faculty of returning unimpaired to its first beauty and dignity. Surely some alteration in the ordinary mode of proceeding was required, when the people of England had resorted to assassination as a trade, as was the case with the Luddites, and when the life even of a judge, venerable for his age, and admirable for his learning, had been threatened, if not attempted, while the perpetrators were to be rewarded by money raised in subscriptions of 5*s.* each. If from the petitions on the table any truth could be sifted, it would be easy for individuals to make themselves acquainted with the facts, and to bring

* The trial by jury, though not near so ancient as some writers have imagined, was certainly very general in the reign of Henry II; for we find in that time many questions of fact relating to property were tried by twelve liberos et legales homines juratos, sworn to speak the truth, who were summoned by the sheriff for that purpose.—See also Lord Lyttleton's History of Henry II. Vol. I. p. 508.

the matter forward upon a future occasion; but at present, he trusted that the house would reject an inquiry, the effect of which might be to mark men out for slaughter, and to send witnesses into the country as victims to private malignity.

Sir F. Burdett explained, that Mr. Wilberforce Bird, chairman to the committee upon the House of Correction, had related the story of the robin and Mr. Aris to the house.

Mr. Wilberforce asked, whether Mr. Bird had spoken from his own knowledge.

No answer was returned.

Sir S. Romilly observed, that a bill of indemnity being about to be passed, the question now was, whether it should be done without inquiry, when gross abuse of the power intrusted was imputed to ministers. He begged the house to recollect, that though bills of indemnity had before been agreed to after the suspension of the habeas corpus act, yet never in any other instance than the present, after a committee should have sat and made its report: the notoriety of the facts was therefore put out of the case, and a sort of grand jury (most extraordinarily constituted, having power to examine all the evidence for the accused, and none for the accuser) was appointed to make some kind of investigation. Why, then, should not these petitions go before them, or some other tribunal better selected? It was asserted that people had been dragged about the country in fetters, as proofs to the inhabitants of an existing plot; and the question was, whether unnecessary severity had not been employed. There could not be a subject more worthy of the interposition of parliament. His principal object in rising was, to refute a statement made by the noble lord, in the humble hope of influencing some few votes, namely, that if the facts stated in the petitions were true, the sufferers would not be deprived of their remedy by the bill of indemnity. How unfounded this assertion was, appeared from his lordship's next sentence, in which he observed, that the bill of indemnity now required would be the same as that of 1801, which in the first clause expressly enacted, "that all personal actions heretofore brought, or which may be hereafter commenced or brought, against any person on account of any act, matter, or thing done, recommended, directed, ordered, or advised to be done, for apprehending, imprisoning, or detaining in custody any person suspected of high treason, shall be discharged and made void." It was clear, therefore, that the parties who had so severely suffered would be deprived of all redress, if the bill of indemnity in question were adopted. He would now say a few words as to the petitions. There were, he believed, eleven of them, from different persons in different parts of the kingdom, and containing different allegations. Suppose three of these should be proved to contain false charges, was it consistent with justice, would his hon. friend (Mr. Wilberforce) assert, that the other eight petitions should be rejected unexamined, on account of the hollowness of those three? What answer had been given to the complaint of that wretched man, Ogden, who, at the age of 74, and in a state of lamentable disease, had been loaded with fetters like a common felon? There was at least some ground for supposing that his petition contained truth; for he had referred to the surgeon, Mr. Dixon, who had attended, and cured him of the complaint produced by the weight of his fetters? He would ask his hon. friend, whether he thought it just to dismiss that petition without inquiry. There were seven other petitions which stood on the same footing, against the truth of which not one syllable had been uttered; and, when he considered what extraordinary pains had been taken to refute the statements contained in some of the petitions, he could not but think that those which had not been impeached, were, on that very account, unimpeachable. Silence was a proof that nothing could be said against them. As to the denial given by a gaoler to the statement of a petitioner, he conceived that nothing could be more absurd than the production of such testimony. The hon. baronet had founded a very just argument on the conduct of the house with respect to Aris, on a former occasion; and his hon. friend (Mr. Wilberforce) had, instead of giving an answer, completely mistaken the object of the hon. baronet's observation. The hon. baronet had intended no imputation on him, when he alluded to his testimony in favour of the humanity of Aris, but had justly inferred, that if a member of such integrity and sagacity had been imposed upon in that case, it was not impossible that the gentlemen who that night had spoken in such high terms of different gaolers might likewise have been deceived. What, then, was the deduction from this? Surely not, that no inquiry was necessary, but that the strictest examination should take place immediately. Aris, notwithstanding the testimonies to his character, was afterwards convicted of the grossest delinquency; and it was not impossible that similar results might follow, if proper inquiries were to be instituted on the present occasion. His hon. friend had lately said, when a case of enormity was brought forward, "Why had not the hon. mover (the member for Shrewsbury) taken pains to make inquiries, and to examine witnesses as to the truth of the allegations?" The hon. member for Shrewsbury answered that he had examined: that he had seen the witnesses and questioned them in person: yet his hon. friend, instead of being satisfied with this compliance with his own desire and sense of justice, had voted against a motion so founded and supported. (A laugh.) He trusted, however, that his hon. friend would yet retrace his steps. He hoped he had repented of that vote, and would yet make amends. As to Ward's character, it was certainly a bad one: indeed, the only wonder was, that he had not been brought to justice long ago, if indeed he was as criminal as had been represented. It was said, that previous to the suspension act, he had been in gaol on a charge of felony; if this were the case, he should like to know why he had not been tried —why his life, if the case required it, had not been sacrificed to justice. But this had nothing to do with the allegations in the petition, some of which, notwithstanding the great preparations which had been made by the noble lord, for the purpose of contradiction, had been left completely unanswered. He alluded particularly to the statement of Ward's having been, every alternate four days thrust into a loathsome cell, from which he was only taken because it was impossible for him to exist in it more than four days at a time: and yet for all this, and for similar abuses of power, an indemnity was to be obtained: and the report which was to warrant this indemnity, was to come from a committee, before which the accused brought only such evidence as they pleased, while the accusers were not allowed to bring any at all. As to the personal character of Lord Sidmouth, of which so much had been said, there was no man more ready than himself to do justice to the humanity and excellent disposition of the noble lord; but that was no answer to the charges of misconduct in his agents. He would not say if all the facts in the different petitions were proved, that they were in themselves illegal, but he would say that they were unnecessary and wanton abuses of power. What, for instance, could be a greater mockery and insult than the parading those men from town to town in open daylight, and loaded with chains: and what possible objects could be answered by such a wretched triumph, except to convince some miserable minds that some extraordinary plot existed against the state? (Cheering.) His hon. friend (Mr. Wilberforce) had thought proper, in one part of his speech, to pass a glowing eulogium on the suspension of the habeas corpus, and had referred to the history of ancient republics in illustration of the advantages of suspended liberty; but did not his hon. friend know what was the consequence of those occasional dictatorships to which he had alluded? Did they not at last end in a perpetual dictatorship—in a tyranny never to be shaken off? (Loud cheering.) For his own part, he believed most firmly, before God, that these frequent and unjustifiable suspensions of the habeas corpus would (unless the House of Commons should do its duty, which it had not hitherto done) end in the complete ruin of our liberties. (Loud cheering.)

Mr. Ashurst read a long statement, made to the magistrates of Oxford, relative to the condition of the county-gaol: it described all the accommodations to be most excellent; and asserted, that the state prisoners confined there returned thanks for the treatment which they had experienced, nor was any complaint made, except by one man, who said that his room had a smoky chimney.

Mr. Holme Sumner thought the house had reason to complain of the mode adopted by the noble mover. (A laugh.) He had brought forward only one case, that of Ward; and when an answer had been prepared and given to that case, but to that case only, the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down, took advantage of the circumstance, and asked what answer had been given to the other ten cases which had not been brought forward. As far as regarded himself, he was able to give some information of one case, that of Ogden. This man had told falsehoods from the beginning to the end of his petition. Whether the prisoners had been ironed before they were taken to Horsemonger-gaol, he could not say; but he knew that in consequence of an application to Lord Sidmouth, the irons were immediately struck off. As to the disease of Ogden, it had been ascertained that he was afflicted with a rupture when he entered the prison. (Cries of hear, from the opposition, echoed by the ministerial benches.) Ogden had even said that he thought it a blessing that he had come to that prison, for he could never have been cured elsewhere. (The same cries repeated.) He had also expressed the utmost gratitude to the gaoler for his kind treatment. (Hear, hear, from the ministerial benches.) —The hon. member then argued, that most complaints against gaolers turned out to be nugatory. He instanced first the commission of inquiry sent some years ago to Lincoln, which, he said, completely disproved every article of the charges brought against the gaoler: he next instanced the case of one Colville, who had been confined in Cold Bath Fields, and whose petition had been brought before the house by the hon. baronet (Sir F. Burdett), who had paid so much attention to that prison, but who on that occasion was so convinced of the fallacy of the allegations, that he concurred with the rest of the committee of inquiry, that no steps ought to be taken on the subject.

Sir F. Burdett said, it was very true that on the occasion alluded to, he had found the rest of the committee, on all points, unanimous against him, and he at last consented to their report; but it was solely on the ground, that inquiry might lead to disclosures injurious to persons then in a foreign country,—at Hamburgh.

Mr. Holme Sumner appealed to the house, whether they did not recollect the hon. baronet's concurrence with the report.

Sir F. Burdett.—"I have just told the hon. member, that I did concur in that report, and I have also just told him my sole reason for so doing." (Hear, hear, from both sides.)

Mr. Bennet observed, that the complaint made by Ogden was, that the disease with which he had been afflicted, and of which he was so ably cured during his imprisonment, was produced by the chains and irons imposed upon him. The inquiry before the magistrates on this subject was confined to the case of the Evanses. There was nothing in the representation of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ashurst) that contradicted the statement contained in the petition. He believed the case of Bagguley was fairly stated, nor did the letter read by the hon. gentleman disprove any of the circumstances which were described as having taken place in the gaol at Oxford. The account of the treatment experienced by Mr. Knight, of Reading, threw no imputations on the gaoler; it was of being carried to Salisbury Gaol, a gaol of which no hon. member had spoken or would speak in commendation, and of being again removed to Worcester, that he complained. The only reason that he could conceive for thus parading the petitioner about the country was, to create alarm, and to withdraw him from the observation of the Berkshire magistrates, as not sufficiently subservient to the minister of the day.

Mr. Philips rose amidst loud cries of question, for the purpose of confirming his hon. friend's representation of Ogden's case. The fact alleged was, that the distemper had been so much increased by the treatment he received, as to render a severe operation necessary.

The Attorney-General declared, that he had attentively read the petition of Ogden, and he thought it clear, that the statement in it was intended to create a belief, that an old man had been seized with a violent malady in consequence of the weight of irons which been imposed upon him. However the detention of persons charged with offences against the state might be justified under the late act, and admitting that a bill of indemnity, on the precedent of that of 1801, should be passed by parliament, he begged leave to say, that such an act would not indemnify a gaoler for any cruelty or excess beyond that restraint which was necessary to the safe custody of the prisoners. He would still remain liable to a criminal prosecution, and to answer to the party injured in a civil action. A question might arise, whether, when a person so charged was apprehended in a disturbed district, it might not be proper to place fetters on his limbs to prevent the danger of an escape. If done for this purpose, and without any unnecessary rigour or violence, it was legal and justifiable. His hon. and learned friend (Sir Samuel Romilly) had no colour for saying that some of these unfortunate men had been removed to different prisons, and exhibited in different parts of the country, for the purpose of exciting alarm. The secretary of state had two duties to perform—that of keeping them in safe and close custody; and, secondly, of rendering their situation in every other respect as comfortable as possible. He would have been justly open to reproach had they been left in an unhealthy or painful situation. The noble lord who brought forward the motion seemed to think, that when a man was once lodged in gaol upon a charge of treasonable practices, the door ought to be hermetically sealed upon him till the day of trial arrived. But by the law of this country, although a justice of the peace could not discharge after commitment, and before indictment, a secretary of state might, and, without the assistance of any suspension act, arrest on a charge of treason, and afterwards discharge his warrant if he thought the accusation could not be substantiated. (Hear, hear, hear.) He contended that all the allegations of these petitions, as far as they had been examined, were falsified; and that the secretary of state had, by his great exertions, broken the link of a confederacy which threatened society with all the evils of universal pillage and disorder. If that simultaneous movement which had been proved to be in contemplation, had been suffered to take place, and the expected multitude from the north had joined the disaffected in other quarters, what justification would then have been received on the part of the secretary of state, for not having exercised the powers with which parliament had armed him, and for a dereliction of duty which had led to such destructive consequences?

Mr. Lamb said, he considered it would be unwise and dangerous to lay before an open committee the grounds on which these people were detained. Had, however, the motion been limited to any alleged severity during the period of their confinement, it would be imprudent to deny it. The present motion not being so restricted, he felt it his duty to oppose it.

Lord Folkestone briefly replied. He contended, that sufficient grounds had been laid to induce the house to institute a full inquiry into the treatment of the petitioners, but he had no objection to the appointment of a secret committee for that purpose.

The house then divided.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.] Mr. Ogle rose and moved, "that leave be given to bring in a bill to prevent imprisonment for debt on mesne process." There were very few members in the house at the time, and the motion was negatived without a division.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, Feb. 18.

THE PRINCE REGENT'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS, ON THE OPENING OF THE SESSION.] His Royal Highness's most gracious answer to the address on the opening of the session (see page 14), was this day reported as follows:—

"My Lords,—I return you my warmest thanks for this very dutiful and affectionate address.

The manner in which you have expressed your feelings on the late afflicting dispensation of Divine Providence is, in the highest degree, grateful and consolatory to my own.

You may rely on my constant and cordial support of all such measures as may contribute to the increasing prosperity of the country, and to the welfare and happiness of all classes of his Majesty's subjects."

IRISH GRAND JURIES ACT SUSPENSION BILL.] The royal assent was given by commission to this bill. The commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Cholmondeley, and the Earl of Shaftesbury.

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.] The thirty millions Exchequer bills bill was read a second time.

MALT, &c. DUTIES BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, Feb. 18.

EX-OFFICIO INFORMATIONS.] An account was presented (pursuant to an order of the 4th instant) of the fees taken in the crown-office for copies of ex-officio informations for libel.—Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

SEVERN COAL TRADE.] The petition for a bill (see page 363) was reported, and a bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Protheroe and Sir William Guise.

PUBLIC REVENUE.] Mr. Lushington presented an abstract "of the net produce of the revenue of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in the years ended 5th of January 1817 and 5th of January 1818; distinguishing the quarters, and also the total produce of the customs and excise."

Also, an abstract "of the net produce of the revenue of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in the years ended 5th January 1817, and 5th January 1818; distinguishing the quarters, and also the total produce of the consolidated fund, the annual duties, and the war taxes."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

LONDON PRISONS.] Mr. Alderman Wood said, that in moving for a committee to examine into the state of the prisons in the metropolis, it was not his intention to trespass on the house with unnecessary arguments. Much had been said of the abuses that prevailed in those prisons; but he believed that a full investigation would establish the conclusion, that where evils existed, as he was willing to admit some did exist, they were not to be attributed to any oblivion of duty on the part of the magistrates. There were many things that required alteration. Great abuse arose from the number of convicts kept in these prisons. But when he mentioned that evil, it was a duty he owed to the noble lord at the head of the home department, to state, that he had done every thing to remove the convicts as rapidly as circumstances permitted. To attach reproach to the magistrates of London in the management of their prisons, was very unjust. His hon. friend (Mr. Bennet),—and who could feel disinclined to testify to his meritorious exertions in alleviating the miseries of the wretched and the destitute?—had, in a recent publication, given the magistracy a severe lecture, though it would be found that the evils for which they were blamed, were imputable to the want of room in the prisons. Besides, later customs had operated to fill the prisons prematurely. Formerly, in Middlesex, as was now the case in London, prisoners were not removed to Newgate until the Thursday immediately preceding the sessions. The numbers now from Middlesex committed on the final examination, were, as to the London commitments, in a proportion of seven to one.—Before he concluded, he wished to advert to one circumstance, which he sincerely hoped would attract the attention of the committee. He alluded to the casualties that occur at sea in convict ships, where, from the season at which these people are embarked, for instance, in the midst of winter, then suddenly exposed to the violent transition of heat under the line, and then to another change in getting further to the south, great mortality must prevail. It was, indeed, so great, that in 1814, out of 200 convicts embarked, 50 died before the vessel reached New South Wales. He should only say, that if any delay had occurred in carrying the wishes of the magistracy of London into effect, in regard to those prisons, it arose from circumstances over which they had no control. He then moved, that a committee be appointed, "to examine into the state of Newgate and the other prisons within the city of London and the borough of Southwark, and to report their observations, together with the minutes of evidence taken before them, to the house."

Mr. Bennet said, it was not his intention to offer any opposition to the motion, but as allusion had been made by his hon. friend, who was so strong an eulogist of the conduct of the magistracy of which he was himself a member, to a publication of his, he was anxious to make a few observations. It was true that the London prisons were rendered more grievous to the unhappy persons confined in them from want of room. Young and old were huddled together in indiscriminate and crowded masses, to the extent of making these prisons not schools of reform and instruction, but schools of crime and depravity. But want of room was not the only defect; there was also a want of clothing and of food. (Hear, hear.) He had himself seen in one of them an infant, without shirt, shoes, or stockings, and he found that the same miserable spectacle had been witnessed by the visiting committee. It was with no view to self-applause, that he was compelled to say, that he had himself given the necessary clothing to this unfortunate infant. (Hear, hear.) Want of food was also experienced by the prisoners. It was impossible to look at a collective body of the confined, without being able at once to discern those who had been long in custody, from those more recently committed. The squalor carceris was visible among the older prisoners. Scantiness of food was the cause; indeed, those who had been confined for any time appeared in a starving condition. There was one observation which he wished the house to bear in recollection. It was this—that whatever improvements the proposed committee might find on their inspection of the prisons, was to be attributed to the exposure made in that house. Since that moment, all was solicitude, occupation and haste on the part of the London magistracy to correct abuses. Dilapidations of long continuance were now repairing—the walls of the gaols were being white-washed—even the baker had been changed within the last four days. (Hear.) In their anxiety for sudden improvement, even Sunday was not held sacred. The house would, therefore, recollect, that if the prisons of London presented all these improvements to the committee, they would be seen in their court dress. (Hear, hear.) He should concur with the motion, in the hope that the prisons of London would no longer be discreditable to the wealth and character of that city, and that instead of being schools for the propagation of every species of crime, they would become schools for the moral reformation of the miserable, the vicious, and the neglected.

Sir Wm. Curtis considered that all the statements of the hon. member were exaggerated, or that, if the facts were true, they did not bear him out in the way he had put them. What did he want? Were not prisons places for punishment, not for comfort? He denied that the food was bad. He had often tasted the bread, and it was as good as any gentleman would use in his own family, or was used by his Majesty's troops. There was a sufficiency of meat. What! were not four pounds of meat a day sufficient for one person? (A laugh.) He meant four pounds a week. Did the hon. member want to have the prisons furnished with Turkey carpets? Men, it should be remembered, were sent to prison for their crimes. The windows of the new prison were broken wantonly, and those who broke them were told that either they must mend them at their own expense or suffer. As to the white-washing, of which the hon. member had spoken, he knew nothing about it.

Mr. Bennet, in explanation said, that on Friday last he visited Newgate, and saw with his own eyes the preparations making for the inquiry. If the worthy baronet had done his duty, he would have seen them also, and not been ignorant of the fact of white-washing. He had also tasted the bread frequently, and found it heavy and sour. The reason given was, that it was baked on tin.

Mr. Warre observed, that as one of a former committee, he visited the Borough Compter, and found in it more bricklayers and carpenters than prisoners. The committee were, however, too alert for the magistrates, and were fully impressed with the motives for that sudden exertion of improvement. He then adverted to the case of a man named John Bundy, who died a short time back in Tothill-fields, and whose death the coroner's inquest, after mature deliberation, recorded as having arisen from the want of food and medical aid. The turnkey of the prison had on that occasion given most equivocal testimony, and ought not to be retained in his employment.

The motion was then agreed to, and the following gentlemen were appointed:—

Mr. Alderman Wood	The Lord Mayor of London
Lord Visct. Lascelles	Sir William Curtis
Mr. Finlay	Sir James Shaw
Mr. Dundas	Mr. Alderman Atkins
Sir George Clerk	Sir Tho. Acland
Mr. Milne	Mr. Bennet
Mr. Littleton	Mr. H. Sumner
Mr. Lowndes	Mr. Waldegrave
Mr. Tremayne	Mr. John Smith
Mr. F. Lewis	Mr. Holford
Mr. Dickinson

Power was given to the committee to send for persons, papers, and records: five to be the quorum, to adjourn from time to time, and from place to place, and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] Lord Milton presented a petition of inhabitants of York, against the practice of employing climbing boys in the sweeping of chimneys. He took the opportunity of suggesting, that he feared the bill of his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet) went too fast to its meritorious object, and might therefore endanger its success. There were many chimnies in which it was impossible to employ machinery.

Mr. Bennet said, nine out of ten of these chimnies were in the houses of opulent persons, who could well afford to have them altered. They were the very flues in which all the danger was experienced, and were generally seven inches square. (Hear.) Was he chargeable with haste in endeavouring to save human life, by preventing children from being put to this most atrocious torture? (Hear.)

Lord Milton in explanation said, that he did not by any means object to the bill per se, but he objected to it as in some measure calculated to frustrate the purpose for which it was framed.

Mr. Lyttelton was sure that every body who knew his noble friend would give him credit for the greatest humanity.—He differed from him, however, totally on this subject, and thought that every means should be adopted to make the bill so effective, that in no case henceforth should it be possible to employ a single child in this dreadful business.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

A similar petition of inhabitants of the city of Gloucester, and another of inhabitants of Darlington having been received, the house went into the further consideration of the chimney-sweeper's regulation bill, which was re-committed, and an amendment introduced, extending its provisions to Ireland.

GAME LAWS.] Mr. G. Bankes said, that in the motion which he was about to make, he expected the support not only of those members who were anxious to protect the game of the country, but also of those who were solicitous to diminish the number of offences connected with the unlawful destruction of game. Most of these offences would be got rid of, if the legislature could effectually prevent the buying and selling of game; for it seldom happened that poachers killed game for sustenance, or for the mere gratification of their own taste. As the law stood at present, all persons, qualified and unqualified, were forbidden to sell game. Unqualified persons were also virtually forbidden to purchase game, but there was no such restriction on qualified persons.—His wish was to put all persons on the same footing in this respect; and by the bill, for which he was about to move, to enact, that all persons, qualified or not, should be liable to the same penalties for buying game as those inflicted by the existing law on unqualified persons who purchased it. The hon. gentleman then moved, "that leave be given to bring in a bill for the further preventing of offences connected with the unlawful destruction and sale of game."

Mr. Curwen thought the proposition of the hon. gentleman quite inadequate to the attainment of the object in view. It would only go to make the game laws still more odious than they were. He was by no means one of those who thought this an unfit subject for legislation. On the contrary, he was fully impressed with the advantages of increasing the inducements to gentlemen to reside in the country, by protecting the game for their amusement. But while the present oppressive and unjust code of laws existed, it was in vain to think of putting an end to the crimes which they generated. At present the right of game was confined to landed proprietors. Now, it was well known, that in this country the proportion which commercial property bore to landed property, was as seven to one. He could see no objection to making game private property, up to a certain extent, and to doing away all qualifications not founded on property. Severe penalties were never productive of the effect intended by them. While the plundering of a farmer's field of turnips and such articles was felony by law, the practice was general, as the punishment was too severe to be inflicted; but as soon as it was reduced to a moderate fine, the practice entirely ceased. He strongly recommended the hon. gentleman not to content himself with so inefficient a proposition as that which he had just made, but to go to the root of the evil, and endeavour to reform the whole system of the game laws. As to making the purchase of game penal, the only consequence would be, that the smaller culprits would be punished, while those of more importance would escape. For instance, such an individual as the Lord Mayor of London must have game. He would not purchase it himself, but others would purchase it for him; and this would take place, whatever statutes the legislature might think proper to enact.

Mr. Warre was surprised that his hon. friend could imagine that in the present state, temper, and constitution of society, any legislative measure could effectually prevent the sale of game. Two years ago an hon. member brought in a bill on this subject, the enactments of which were so severe, that it was deemed expedient to repeal it last session. The hon. member who had just sat down, had given his hon. friend good counsel, although it would be no easy task to set about reforming the whole system of the game laws. On this subject he had that morning met with a passage in Mr. Justice Blackstone, which he would read to the house. It was as follows:—"Though the forest laws are now mitigated, and by degrees grown entirely obsolete, yet from this root has sprung a bastard slip, known by the name of the game law, now arrived to, and wantoning in, its highest vigour: both founded upon the same unreasonable notions of permanent property in wild creatures, and both productive of the same tyranny to the commons; but with this difference, that the forest laws established only one mighty hunter throughout the land; the game laws have raised a little Nimrod in every manor."

Mr. G. Bankes explained, and professed himself wholly incompetent to execute the task which the hon. member for Carlisle wished him to undertake. All he desired was to make the game laws something better if he could. The omission which the proposed bill tended to supply, appeared to him to be a casual one, and easily to be remedied.

Sir C. Burrell thought the bill proposed by the hon. gentleman would be beneficial, by putting the rich and the poor on an equal footing. It had been most justly said by Mr. Fox, that, without a violation of the laws of property, he could not see how the game laws could be much altered at present.

The motion was then put, and the house divided.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.] Mr. M. A. Taylor, in pursuance of the notice which he gave yesterday, moved, "that a select committee be appointed to consider whether any and what steps may be necessary to be taken to give to the counties of Westmorland, Cumberland, Northumberland, and Durham, and the town and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the same advantages of assizes twice in each year, as are now possessed by all the other counties in England and Wales; and to report their opinion thereupon to the house."—The motion was agreed to, and the following gentlemen were named:—

Mr. M. A. Taylor	Mr. Ord
Lord Visct. Castlereagh	Mr. Courtenay
Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer	Lord Visct. Lowther
	Mr. Powlet
Mr. Attorney-General	Mr. Casberd
Mr. Solicitor-General	Mr. Brougham
Sir M. Ridley	Mr. Richard Wharton
Sir John Nicholl	Mr. W. Smith
Sir S. Romilly	Sir C. Monck
Mr. C. Wynn	Lord Ossulston
Mr. Cuthbert Ellison	Mr. Curwen

Power was given to them to send for persons, papers, and records: five to be the quorum, and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house.

ELECTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. Wynn moved the further consideration of the report of this bill, for the purpose of submitting one or two verbal amendments.

Mr. Lamb suggested the propriety of omitting such parts of the bill as appeared to be of a questionable nature, till the next parliament.

Sir W. Burroughs strongly objected to that clause which required that 400 votes should be polled on the first two days, and as many on the third day, or that the election should close. He was convinced that the effect of such a provision would be, to disfranchise a great number of non-resident voters, as well as to cause a very considerable additional expense to the candidates.

Mr. Wilberforce supported the clause.

Lord Milton also maintained the expediency of the clause, and observed, that all persons who were connected with county elections, were much indebted to his hon. friend for diminishing the expense of contested elections.

Mr. Marryatt opposed the clause.

Mr. J. Smith thought, that the clause was calculated to give too much power to the returning officer.

Mr. W. Wynn said, that certainly the returning officer might object and stop the proceedings in some degree, but the undisposed votes would be going on. (Hear, hear.) He thought that a man would hardly succeed in his election who could not bring up 400 members in the first two days. If this clause were rejected, all the towns and cities in the kingdom would be exposed to very great evils. A person who had only the means of bringing up seven votes a-day, might declare, "I will keep the poll open the whole 15 days." As the law stood at present, this might be done. In Devonshire, the poll had been kept open by a person who had only 19 votes, and it was merely by accident that he had been hindered from continuing the poll. In Bristol, the same thing had happened from a person who could only bring nine or ten votes. In Berkshire, one who could only bring 500 votes had kept the poll open the whole 15 days. He hoped it would not be held, that because this was the sixth session of parliament, the evil ought to be suffered to exist till another, especially at a moment when the poll might be kept open merely for the purpose of disturbances. (Hear, hear.) These observations had struck him as important, and he hoped the bill would not be objected to.

Mr. Lushington thought that the wording of some of the clauses was too general.

Mr. Brougham hoped that every thing exceptionable would be done away with, that the bill might not be frustrated in its progress, as it had been last year. He had then wished it to be printed after the commitment, and the blanks filled up. There was one clause preventing freemen from taking up their freedom that they might vote, to which he had objected, and this he was happy to see was omitted. With respect to the clause relative to the 400 voters, it was a question whether a smaller number of voters or a greater number of days might not be allowed. At the same time he thought it might be a question, whether the word 'tender' instead of 'poll,' and a clause, allowing the election to go on while the returning officer was fulfilling his duties, might not be necessary. But he did not think that it ought to remain as it stood; at any rate, some alteration should be made relative to the word 'poll.' He could not exactly agree with the propriety of throwing the expenses upon the shoulders of the constituents from those of the candidates. It might seem designed to favour themselves at the present period; for though the members of that house were not the only persons concerned, yet they formed the bulk of those interested. With respect to qualification, he thought the year and a day's possession was the best title, unless, indeed, the house should think it necessary to have a complete and absolute register; and the only time when such a plan was attempted, petitions were presented against it from all parts of the kingdom.

Mr. Speaker hoped that the house would permit him to inform them how the question stood. With respect to the alteration of any words that had been agreed to in the committee, that could not then be made; but as to any other alteration that might be proposed, the house was open to agree to or dissent from it.

Sir W. Burroughs wished the discussion to be postponed.

Dr. Phillimore was surprised that the house should be gravely asked to postpone the discussion, when the bill had been already so well considered. It did not appear to him that it could have undergone a more complete discussion.

Sir W. Burroughs thought it impossible that they could, in their present state, do justice to the bill, and therefore he should move that the house be counted.

Mr. W. Wynn thought it would be a more regular proceeding to let the bill be re-committed to-morrow, than that the report should be re-considered. He should, therefore, propose that; and he hoped the house would have no objection to allow the bill to be read a third time the next day. He thought it very important that there should be as much consideration given to the bill as possible, especially as it was so near the quarter-sessions. As to the number of voters, he had heard of 5000 having been brought up in one day; and indeed, if he had had his own way, he would have proposed a greater number; but as it was, he would rather that it should be under than above the mark.

The question that the bill should be recommitted to-morrow was then put and carried.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, Feb. 19.

Exchequer Bills Bill.] The house having resolved itself into a committee on the thirty millions Exchequer bills bill,

Earl Grosvenor stated, that he felt it his duty to say a few words before this bill went through the committee. He had hoped that their lordships would have heard something on the subject of economy in his Majesty's speech, but in that expectation the house and the country had been grievously disappointed. Notwithstanding this omission, it was a notorious fact that the finances of the country were in a most deplorable state; for the income, though a boast had been made of the improvement of the revenue, did not cover the expenditure by many millions. In this situation it was reasonable to have hoped that his Majesty's ministers, if they neglected to bring forward the subject on the meeting of parliament, would at least have said or done something at a very early part of the session, to encourage the expectation of their being disposed to resort to that system of reduction and economy which could alone avert the ruin that threatened the country. No indication of any such disposition had, however, been given; and now, after three years of peace, the country had still to endure a weight of unnecessary expenditure. He had before alluded to reductions which ought to be made, and was still of opinion that considerable savings might be effected in different branches of the public expenditure, and particularly in that of the army. If the army on the frontiers of France were recalled, a more economical arrangement with respect to the military force might be made. While in a state of peace with all mankind, was it not most absurd to persist in maintaining a great military establishment, an army of 100,000 men? Notwithstanding what had fallen from a noble earl (Stanhope) with regard to the state of France, on the first day of the session, he could not agree with him as to the danger of withdrawing the army of occupation. He could not partake entirely in the view of that noble earl, and was rather inclined to believe that time had removed many of the objections which might have been urged against withdrawing the allied troops. He agreed with the noble earl in thinking, that the occupation of the throne of France by the Bourbon family was most favourable to the interests of Europe, and he was convinced also, to the interests of France, provided they adhered to constitutional principles. This, he was persuaded, was felt in that country; and though there might be different parties there, and though he carried his opinion as to the supporting the present French government, as far as he believed that opinion ought to be carried, yet he could see no necessity why any part of the military force of this country should be maintained on the French frontiers. Whether Buonaparte was popular in France to the extent which had been stated, he could not pretend to determine; but however popular that person might be, he trusted that this country would not be so unjust and impolitic as to completely mix itself in the domestic affairs of another. To a certain degree he was ready to admit that interference might be a duty, but with domestic parties we had really nothing to do. Feeling and lamenting as he did the state of the finances of the country, he could not help expressing his surprise at finding a measure like the present in progress through their lordships' house. That there should be 30,000,000*l.* of Exchequer bills afloat, in addition to the other circulating paper, was a very melancholy consideration. The serious importance of the measure would be appreciated when their lordships considered that the issue now proposed equalled any that had ever been made in this country during the late long and expensive war in which it had been engaged. It must be evident that this increased circulation of paper tended more and more to depreciate the regular coin of the state, and to render more difficult, if not entirely prevent, the removal of that restriction on the payments of the Bank which all their lordships so seriously deplored. Impressed with these opinions, he could not suffer this important measure to go through the committee without calling their lordships' attention to it.

The Earl of Liverpool did not wish to enter into any discussion on the questions respecting the army of occupation and the house of Bourbon, which the noble earl had started. With regard to the subject of finance, the noble earl had gone so far as to state that the income of the country was many millions below the expenditure. He should only say, that when the accounts, from which alone a just opinion respecting the finances of the country could be formed, were fairly before the house, he should be prepared to meet the noble earl on the question. Then would be the proper time for any discussion which the noble earl might think proper to bring forward: but he would then find that the opinion he now entertained was most erroneous. The noble earl had complained of the superabundance of Exchequer bills; but if he inquired into the real state of the case, he would find that there was upon the whole a reduction, and that the interest was very little more than 2 per cent. Another complaint of the noble earl was, that nothing had been done in the way of economy and reduction. On this subject, too, he was perfectly ready to meet the noble earl, when the proper time for discussion arrived. But the noble earl could not fail to know from the journals of the other house of parliament, that the peace establishment of the country underwent the serious consideration of a committee in the course of the last session; and that measures were then taken for reducing the different departments of the public service to the lowest scale on which they could with propriety be placed. The noble earl, it appeared, thought these establishments still too great: that might be a subject of inquiry when the question came regularly before their lordships; but they had nothing to do with it at present. The noble earl had said that a saving might arise by withdrawing from the frontiers of France that part of the army of occupation which belonged to this country; but on what foundation did he rest that opinion? Could he shew that the recal of our army would be any saving whatever to the country? The view which the noble earl appeared to have formed of the expense of that army was totally erroneous: and however desirable saving might be, he must look for some other sources of economy than the reduction of a force by which no expense was incurred. With regard to the revenue, he assured the noble earl that it covered the expenditure.

Earl Grosvenor expressed himself not satisfied with what had been done in the way of reduction, in consequence of the institution of a committee by the other house of parliament; and was of opinion, notwithstanding what had been said by the noble earl, that a considerable expense was incurred by this country in maintaining the army on the frontiers of France.

(The Earl of Liverpool said across the table, not a shilling.)

The Earl of Lauderdale was surprised to hear what had fallen from the noble earl on the subject of the finances. Did he mean to say, that the revenue of this country was capable of covering the charges on the consolidated fund, and the whole of the present expenditure?

The Earl of Liverpool wished to be understood to say, that the whole revenue of the country, in which he included the sinking-fund (hear, hear), was more than sufficient to cover the charges on the national debt, and all the other expenses of the government.

The Earl of Lauderdale wished merely to remind the noble earl that the sinking-fund amounted to nearly fifteen millions. Was this, then, to be understood as the noble earl's proposition—that after deducting 15,000,000*l.*, this country possessed a revenue capable of covering the present expenditure, and paying the interest of the debt?

The Earl of Liverpool said, he never intended to state any such thing. The noble earl could not suppose that he meant to assert that the country had an excess of revenue amounting to 15,000,000*l.*

Lord King.—Then what the noble secretary of state says, merely amounts to this—that we have only a nominal sinking fund; that there is nothing real in its operation, and that it does not discharge one shilling of the national debt.

The Earl of Liverpool considered the noble lord to be quite mistaken in the statement he had made. The noble lord conceived that the sinking fund was only nominal. He might say so, according to his view of the subject.—(Hear, hear.) He might say, that in his view there was not a sinking fund, nor a shilling of debt discharged, unless in so far as the fund formed an excess over and above the revenue. This idea of the noble lord he, however, conceived to be erroneous, and was fully of opinion that we had a real and efficient sinking fund, notwithstanding he had included it in the revenue.

The bill then went through the committee.

MALT, &c. DUTIES BILL.] This bill passed through a committee.

ORDERS FOR PAPERS.] Earl Grosvenor said, that he had some time ago moved that an account of places granted in reversion be laid before the house, but the account had not yet been produced. He thought their lordships had reason to complain of this procrastination, and he hoped that the noble secretary of state would take measures to cause the account to be produced without further delay.

The Earl of Liverpool did not conceive that he could be considered responsible for the production of the account alluded to by the noble earl, more than any other member of their lordships' house. When the house proceeds by an address to the Prince Regent for papers, occasion may arise for making inquiries of ministers respecting their production, which it will then be their duty to facilitate; but when the house proceeds by order, unless the department which ought to produce the papers be the Treasury, it cannot be expected that the head of that office should be able either to forward them, or to account for the delay. It was competent to the noble earl, or any of their lordships, to inquire into the cause of delay in the production of papers; but in the present case he could not regard himself as in any way answerable for the account which had been ordered on the motion of the noble earl.

Earl Grosvenor thought, that an order of the house having been made for the paper in question, under very singular circumstances, no delay would have taken place respecting it. He still thought that it was the duty of the executive government to enforce the prompt production of a paper ordered by their lordships.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that it was proper for the house to enforce its orders; but he had again to repeat, that unless the paper required was in the possession of the Treasury, there could be no obligation on him to produce it.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, that when the house ordered papers which were not in the possession of the higher departments of his Majesty's government, it was to be expected that the superior departments would see that the inferior performed their duty, by producing them. If there should appear to be any undue delay in obeying the order of the house, the regular course was to pass a resolution that the papers be produced forthwith. If there should still be farther delay, it would be their lordships' duty to appoint a committee to inquire into the cause.

The Earl of Liverpool reminded their lordships of the distinction between papers asked for by an address, and those ordered to be produced by a vote of the house. When an order was made by the house, it was necessary to discover the proper department on which it should be served, and that the individual who made the motion, assisted by the officers of the house, could always very easily do.

Earl Grosvenor observed, that he had meant to move an address when he brought forward the motion—(The Earl of Liverpool said across the table, that the account was not a proper object for an address): but the order was made, and it was proper that there should be some means of enforcing obedience to the orders of their lordships' house.

The Lord Chancellor thought, that if inquiry had been made among the officers of the house, the means of enforcing the order might have been discovered. An account of the same kind had formerly been laid before their lordships, and, by examining it, the department from which it came might be traced.

Lord Holland saw no excuse for the delay. Their lordships had an undoubted right to the papers they had ordered, and he should therefore move that they be produced forthwith.

The Earl of Liverpool acknowledged the right of the noble baron to call for the vote he proposed, but thought it would be better, before a step was taken which might cast reflection where none was due, that means should be taken to ascertain whether the order had been properly served. Here he would remark, that if the noble earl had proceeded in the way he supposed, a motion for producing the papers forthwith would not have been regular, because, in the case of an address, the house would wait for explanation as to the cause of the delay. In the case of voting an order, however, the house acted on its own authority, and therefore ought never to ask for papers by address, the production of which it could enforce.

Lord Holland said, it was not necessary that their lordships should inquire what might have been the cause of the delay, before they passed a resolution for the papers being produced forthwith. He was, however, willing to withdraw his motion, trusting that in a few days the paper would be laid on their lordships' table.—The motion was withdrawn.

Grievances under the Suspension Act.] Lord Holland wished to call their lordships' attention to two petitions, which he had received in order to be presented. The subject of them was somewhat similar to that which his noble friend had presented the other day, and on which he was now about to make a motion. They had been put into his hands not two hours before he came down to the house, and though he had not had time to read them very minutely, he could say that their titles were correctly worded, and that they were couched in language which he considered decorous and respectful. They both complained of the execution of the act for the suspension of the habeas corpus—a complaint to which it was fitting the house should attentively listen. The first came from a person of the name of Knight, and stated several circumstances of cruelty which were worthy of inquiry, and described a variety of sufferings which the petitioner had undergone in consequence of his being arrested, fettered, imprisoned, and finally compelled to enter into recognizances. He knew nothing of Mr. Knight; and in presenting this or any other petition, he wished it to be understood, that he neither vouched for the truth of the statements it contained, or the character of the individual from whom it came. It was his duty to bring the complaint under the notice of the house. The second petition was from a man of the name of Mitchell, and he also stated that he had suffered severely in consequence of being unjustly imprisoned and held to bail. As he had before observed, he could not vouch for the truth of the allegations in these petitions, but he thought it no way surprising, that persons who had suffered unjustly should sometimes state their case with a degree of aggravation, nor could he regard that as a reason for not inquiring into the facts. It was fit the petitions should be laid on their lordships' table, whether the injury complained of was attributed to ministers, or to persons of inferior authority. He had made these remarks, because he knew from experience that when complaints were made of the violation of the laws and constitution, it was often endeavoured to identify the individual who brought forward such complaints with the cause of the persons into whose statements it was proposed to inquire. He was standing up for the laws of the country, and not for the character of the petitioners, or the accuracy of their statements. He moved that the first petition be read.

The petition of John Knight, of Manchester, was then read by the clerk. It was in the same terms as the petition from the same individual presented to the House of Commons on the 6th instant. (See page 166.) Ordered to lie on the table.

The noble lord then presented a petition of Joseph Mitchell, of Liverpool, which was to the same effect as that presented to the House of Commons on the 13th instant. (See page 371.) It was ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Holland said, he had been assured that the allegations in the last petition could be confirmed in many points by persons whose evidence would be entitled to credit before any tribunal.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, he had presented a petition a few days since from an individual, complaining of having been unjustly imprisoned; and he had thought it so much a matter of course to refer such a complaint to the secret committee, that he was about to make the motion immediately, not conceiving there could be any objection to it. It was at the request of his Majesty's ministers that he postponed his motion till this day. With regard to the petition he had presented, it contained allegations which certainly deserved inquiry. As to their truth, it was impossible for him to answer. Had it been his intention to move for a specific inquiry, it might be necessary for him in that case to pledge himself to the facts contained in the petition, but such was not his object. They had appointed a secret committee; and they were told by his Majesty's ministers, for the contents of the green bag were known only to a few, that the whole of the conduct of government would be laid before that committee—that the whole exposition of the internal state of the country subsequent to the passing of the act would be submitted to their inspection. The investigation, such as it was, had already commenced; and the only question was with respect to the reference of those petitions to this committee;—it was simply, whether they would go into inquiry upon the evidence of ministers themselves, or whether they would prosecute it in the only way that could lead to any useful results? (Hear, hear.) His Majesty's ministers had told him that they were to review their conduct—he would say; let them do so. It was not for him to assert that their conduct would be found reprehensible; on the contrary, he hoped that it would be justified by inquiry. But of this he was sure, that if the government were in earnest when they challenged investigation, if they were truly anxious to maintain a clear character in the opinion of the country, they must go to the committee, not with evidence prepared by themselves, to be estimated by a tribunal nominated and packed by themselves, but with their evidence compared and confronted with such other evidence as might be collected from sources independent of their influence, and even adverse to their justification. It had transpired, and was now generally known to the public, that there was not a single name on the committee, which was not contained in the lists drawn up by ministers. If ministers were innocent, should they not rejoice at the opportunity of vindicating their proceedings, by disproving the facts alleged against them? If they were guilty, where was the hope that they would bring from their own offices the proofs of their offence? Was it not more natural to suppose that they would overlook the serious charges, if not intentionally, through neglect or mistake, and call upon the house to concur in their justification by making them participators in their ignorance? Do what they would, it was impossible for parliament to take any thing out of the green bag but what ministers had put into it. (Hear.)—Was this no reason for the exercise of caution, and even jealousy, on the part of the house? If they left it to the discretion of those gentlemen to prepare not only their own case, but the whole of the evidence by which that case was to be tried, they might trust to Heaven for justice, but they might depend upon it that such facts would only find their way into the committee as were most favourable to parties on their defence. He would ask them to look back a little on their own proceedings; but a few days had elapsed, when it was found that the first green bag would not be sufficient for the justification of ministers: another was consequently produced. Was it not possible at least, arguing from this instance, that a third green bag might be necessary; might not additional evidence be still required, if they wished that truth should be the result of their investigation? Much of the importance of the inquiry depended on the object which the ministers had in view. An inquiry had been made on the first day of the session, to ascertain what that object was. No one could give information. They were all ignorant who the members of the committee were to be, and therefore ignorant of the ultimate proceedings which they might recommend in their report. But the delusion was now seen through. The committee were appointed by ministers, and the object in view was —let them contradict him if they could—a bill of indemnity. The investigation was not a mere matter of curiosity, but was to be the foundation of one of the strongest measures that parliament could adopt—that of shutting the doors of justice against persons who were supposed to be innocent. If such was the course intended to be adopted with regard to these unfortunate persons, it should be openly and manfully avowed. (Hear.) They should be told distinctly, that there was no redress for them in the ordinary tribunals of the country—that the anxiety of parliament was directed to protect ministers; but that all justice was to be denied to the accused, even to the extent of refusing with scorn to hear the explanation which they were solicitous to afford. Such was the issue which they were to determine that night. If they refused to refer the petitions to the committee, they would go the length of stating, that the committee appointed to bring in a bill of indemnity for the protection of ministers, was bound to try those ministers upon their own evidence, to hear every thing that could make in their favour, but to shut their ears against every thing that might possibly go against them. (Hear, hear.) It was upon that ground he contended for referring the present petition, and all petitions of a similar nature, which were conveyed in respectful language, to the committee. It was not necessary that the house should form distinct opinions upon each, it was not possible that it could do so, but it was unquestionably it its power to send them to the committee, there to be dealt with according as they might deserve. He was strongly impressed with the importance of the question; indeed if there was any one question more important than another, it appeared to him to be this: whether in all proceedings between the ministers and the people, the people should or should not be fairly heard? (Hear, hear.) How could they hope that the people would look to parliament for redress, when, after complaining that they had been misled by the agents of government, parliament refuse to inquire into the fact? Much stress had been laid upon individual character; but was it fair to make use of the character of any minister, however benevolent, to induce that house to prejudge the case of a poor petitioner who called upon them for redress? (Hear.) Was it right to answer his complaints by stating, the ministers tell us you are wrong, and they are all men of excellent character; consequently you are wrong, and we will not listen to your evidence? Was it the fact, that ministers stood so high in the estimation of the public; or was there not a feeling without doors, that it was possible a case might be made out against them, notwithstanding the purity of their fame, very different in its complexion and degree from what was likely to be extracted from their own green bag? (Hear.) The report of the committee of last year, admitted that some portion of the disturbances was to be attributed to the conduct of the agents employed by government; and many persons believed, at this moment, that the greater part, if not the whole, of the insurrectionary spirit, was fomented by the industry of spies and informers. The distresses of the times had thrown numbers out of employment. Distress produced discontent, and the flames of discontent were easily blown into rebellion by those who had an interest in the disorders of the country. Were they not bound to inquire even with regard to those unfortunate persons who had suffered the sentence of the law, whether they had acted on a system concerted among themselves, or whether they were encouraged and betrayed by informers? The friends of ministers contended, that their vigorous exertions preserved the peace of the country. Their opponents were of opinion, that their mistaken and ill-directed interference disturbed it. Here they were directly at issue, inquiry alone could decide it. There was this leading point to be considered in the outset—what sort of inquiry should they go into? (Hear.) Would they examine the internal situation of the country? His Majesty's ministers said yes—if so, could they refuse to hear the petitions illustrative of that situation? Would they review the conduct of ministers through the whole of the late transactions?—The ministers said yes—if so, could they refuse to hear the charges made against them, and submit to the degrading taint of unanswered accusation? The petitioners demanded trial, and were refused; they now demanded inquiry, would it be decent to refuse them?—The ministers were on their trial, not in open court before God and their country, but in their own dark chamber, before their own secret committee. Was not that very circumstance enough to excite suspicion? (Hear.)—That house was not to consider the feelings of ministers, but the general feeling of the country. There was no man who must not admit that there was much mystery in the whole of those proceedings. Inquiry was therefore necessary, as well to protect their own character, as to do justice to the people, who always had, and always would, look to parliament for protection, as long as parliament manifested a disposition to extend it. If any question were brought before the house, in which ministers had no concern; if any bill of a private nature was introduced, and petitions were presented against its enactment, such petitions would be referred to the committee on the bill as a matter of course. He thought it would have been so in the present instance; for the importance of the occasion, so far from justifying a deviation, called more forcibly for an adherence to the rule, but he found that he was mistaken in his expectations from ministers. When he was last in town, he intended to have made a similar motion, to which he did not contemplate that any objection would be made. Finding that it would be resisted, he had taken time to consider, and he hoped that the house would not shrink from the discharge of its duty. His lordship concluded with moving, that the petition be referred to the committee of secrecy.

Lord Sidmouth, after observing that the noble lord had not gone into the merits of the petition, but had confined himself to the broad ground, that all petitions, of whatever description, ought to be referred to the committee, admitted, that they might be suffered to lie on the table, but that to ask more than that, was to say, that petitions, of whatever description (so as not absolutely disrespectful), whether frivolous, false, malicious, or libellous, were all to be considered, and that the attention of their lordships must be employed in investigating the statements they contained, however false or improbable: that was a proposition to which he could not accede. But the noble lord more especially wished them to be referred to the secret committee. He defied the noble lord to shew a single instance in which such a proposal had been adopted: the very nature of a secret committee was in direct opposition to it. If any case of real hardship existed, it was more proper that such a case should be referred to the consideration of a select committee. He hoped the noble lord had read the petitions in question. If he or their lordships would read those petitions, he could assure them with confidence, that unless they contained much more information than that which had been read, it was not only not fit for their lordships to take that cognizance of them which the noble lord had asked, but not fit to consider them at all. Drummond, for instance, had undertaken in his petition to prove the decorum and propriety of the meeting of the 10th of March, before Manchester. Of the nature of that meeting their lordships had read information in all the papers, and had also derived it, however the noble lord might ridicule them, from the documents laid before the last committee. The petitioner stated, that he was on that day boisterously apprehended by drunken soldiers without any cause whatever: the truth was, that the magistrates having notice that the people were then about to proceed in a body to Manchester, and that their intentions (as was borne out by the facts) were to proceed to acts of violence, applied for thirteen warrants to apprehend those who were most active. The warrants were sent down, and many of them executed before the day of meeting; but some of the remaining leaders, regardless of the fate of their companions, proceeded to assemble on the 10th. The magistrates of Manchester acted wisely; they knew that, notwithstanding the check that had been given, a large meeting would take place, and they applied for a military force. Drummond was one of the parties against whom a warrant was issued. The people met to the amount of 12,000, were preparing for their march to London, with the intention of carrying confusion in their train, and addressing the Prince in person, and the petitioner was arrested while haranguing them in the most vehement terms; but not till the riot act had been read by Mr. Holland Watson, the magistrate. That the soldiers had assisted the civil power was unquestionable; but that they had done so in an improper manner, he (Lord Sidmouth) should utterly deny. The character of Sir John Byng was deservedly high: and from him, who had been on the spot, assurances had been received of the regular conduct of the soldiery. This was corroborated by the magistrates of the district, who, whatever fears they might be under of violence that might ensue to their persons or property, were not so lost to all regard for the constitution as to approve of misconduct in the soldiery. The magistrates had given a satisfactory account, that no insult or outrage had taken place. The whole grievance complained of by Drummond amounted only to the fact of his having been committed. He was examined on the 15th of March before the Attorney and Solicitor-general, and expressly told not to say any thing that might criminate himself. When under examination, he made no complaint whatever of having been ill-treated. His manner was not sullen; he spoke freely, and in such a manner, that it was impossible not to regret that a person of his appearance should have fallen into such courses. But there was not one word of complaint as to the mode of his apprehension. He would now ask their lordships whether, because the noble lord had advanced a general law that all petitions should be referred to their consideration, they would not determine whether that one should not be rejected, and whether it contained any thing on the face of it which merited their attention. His Majesty's ministers disclaimed an indemnity for rigorous treatment, if they had been guilty of any. (Hear, hear, hear.) If there was any ground for a bill of indemnity, it was because the sources from whence they had derived their information ought to remain concealed. But he disclaimed any protection for rigour, if any could be proved against him. Let those who were aggrieved complain to the laws of their country, and he was sure that redress would not be withheld. A noble lord had presented two other petitions, and though he (Lord Sidmouth) had not time to follow all their allegations, yet they contained the grossest perversions; and if he had an opportunity of consulting his own documents, or re-perusing the petitions themselves, he could easily shew that they were unfit objects for their lordships' attention. With respect to Knight, he knew from the magistrates (it had been industriously circulated that even the visiting magistrates had been excluded from Reading-gaol, which was not the case) that every accommodation had been afforded to that person. He should make no other observation on Mitchell's petition, than that it charged Oliver with being the cause of his apprehension: but the warrant for that apprehension had been signed before government knew any thing of Oliver, and before he took his journey. He was not apprehended by a warrant from the secretary of state's office, but by the local magistrates, who had long known his character. The noble lord had said much of spies and informers; on that ground he (Lord Sidmouth) was ready to meet him, because the conduct of government would bear the brunt of any inquiry on that subject. When it was stated that that individual (Oliver) was the chief cause of all the disturbances, the noble lord must have lost all recollection that the main features of them were developed in February; that the design then was to burn Manchester, before government had even heard the name of Oliver. He could not therefore avoid concluding that there was not the least ground for the noble lord's motion.

Earl Grosvenor said, that if he were to speak of the measures now in progress in a manner suited to the view in which he was led to regard them, he feared he should not be considered as cool enough for such a discussion: if, on the contrary, he spoke with apathy and indifference, he felt he should not be acting up to his own ideas of his duty, or in a manner agreeable to his feelings. He expressed his own conviction that there was an universal failure of proof to support the reports upon which the extraordinary powers intrusted to ministers were grounded. Notwithstanding this universal failure of proof of disaffection and treason, excepting in the case of Derby alone, he was still willing to admit that there was none more fit to be intrusted with the execution of such a disagreeable duty as the noble viscount (Lord Sidmouth), whose character was such as would impel him, wherever it was possible, to act in the manner most likely to consult the feelings of the individuals concerned. As to the petitions in question, he contended, that supposing there was not a word of truth in the various allegations they contained, yet that still they were called upon to allow these petitions to be referred to the committee, although it was not composed as he could wish. The noble viscount had either misunderstood or misrepresented a noble lord who had already spoken, and who was supposed to maintain that petitions of all kinds should be referred to the committee. The noble lord had proposed to send only petitions essentially connected with the appointment of the committee. But the noble viscount denied that any such petitions should be admitted. According to this language, nothing was to be received by the committee but what the noble viscount deemed fit to submit to them. But he contended that, according to the noble viscount's own shewing, the petition in question should be referred. There was no part of it which, prima facie, might not be true. According to the petitioner's statement, he was seized while addressing a large and numerous concourse of persons, who were assembled for the purpose of petitioning parliament against the suspension of the habeas corpus: but the noble viscount would have it that he (the petitioner) spoke with a degree of vehemence which was dangerous. The noble viscount could not deny that they had a right to petition against the suspension of the habeas corpus, but he did not like it. The object of such a meeting could not be regarded as treasonable; for, if treasonable, why were they not prosecuted and brought to trial? The petition stated, that while the meeting were so employed, they were suddenly surrounded by a large party of military. He could not say whether it could be denied that they were so surrounded; but he had certainly heard a great deal of the dexterity of the military manœuvres practised upon that occasion. The petitioner was taken before Mr. Sylvester; and, upon representing the hardships he had suffered, with regard to the quality of the food which had been allowed him, this gentleman ordered that he should have better food. He was afterwards committed to the charge of Nadin, who chained him, and hurried him away to another place. With respect to this Nadin, he understood there were serious charges brought against him in another place, as having given countenance and encouragement to the horrible system of blood-money; and there appeared no reason to doubt that by this man the petitioner was very cruelly treated. It was alleged that these people meant treason; but if so, why were they not brought to trial? It was said that they intended to proceed to London, to petition the Prince Regent: such a project was absurd enough, he would grant, but not treasonable. If it was alleged that their object was treason, let all the circumstances be brought to proof before the committee, that the committee might know who were right and who were wrong. It was not proper that any part of the country should rest under such a heavy charge, without investigation. After the feeling that was manifested on the death of the Princess Charlotte—a feeling that did not arise from an attachment to the mere trappings of royalty, but from a rational and well-founded admiration of one who was a glory to her sex, and whose life was connected with constitutional considerations of the highest importance—after the regret so generally felt upon that melancholy occasion, he little expected to hear the country maligned by the charge of treason. As the charge, however, was made, inquiry was indispensable.—The petitioner (Drummond) was oppressed with chains; yet it was not of this, or of the loss to his purse that he complained, but that he had had no trial. The expense, likewise, of attending to answer his recognizance was a grievance which could not be denied. The recognizances were highly improper, and subjected the petitioner to much expense and great inconvenience. In short, he contended that there was prima facie evidence of every one of the allegations being true. It had been said, if the grievances alleged were so great, how happened it that no more than those few petitions were presented; he believed this arose entirely from the opinion which had gone abroad from the whole course of proceedings, and especially from the appointment of this committee, that it would prove a hopeless case. The noble viscount talked of responsibility, and when, on a former occasion, the evidence was demanded that rendered such a responsibility necessary, they were told to suspend their opinion till the proper time. But what were they now to think of this heavy responsibility? He believed that the consequence of the bill of indemnity would be to shelter them from every responsibility; and it was doubtful whether, by its operation, even gaolers and magistrates, who had acted improperly, would not be protected from punishment. Imprisonment even for a few days was a hardship, but confinement in a damp room for nine months was no light punishment. As nothing had fallen from the noble viscount which tended to alter his opinion on this subject, he should say "content" to the motion.

Lord King said, that after the able speech of the noble earl who had just sat down, it was unnecessary for him to trouble their lordships at any length. The noble viscount (Lord Sidmouth) had regarded the motion for referring these petitions to the committee as a sweeping proposition; but to appoint a committee of their own nomination, to judge of their own acts, and that upon evidence produced by themselves, in order to guide them to a bill of indemnity, was indeed, a sweeping proposition, an unheard of proposition on the part of his Majesty's ministers. When any complained of being seriously aggrieved, as in the present case, was it right that they should refuse to listen to their complaints on such frivolous pretences? The question was not whether these men were improperly detained or not, but whether the suspension empowered ministers to commit without evidence upon oath. He believed that, if these petitions were referred to the committee, it would appear that great injustice had been done: but his Majesty's ministers would allow nothing to be referred to the consideration of the committee but what they themselves had prepared; they were to furnish the evidence, they were to sit as judges, and to return a verdict, as the jury, in their own cause. (Hear, hear.)

Earl Bathurst contended, that it was contrary to all usage and precedent to force fresh information upon a secret committee. The committee had power to send for fresh information if they felt it necessary to do so, but it was quite unprecedented that the house should force any fresh information upon their attention. The committee was secret, and was appointed for a special purpose. Was it, then, for their lordships to know what sources of information were laid before it, or to force any particular topics upon their investigation? As to the report, their lordships would judge of it when it should be laid before them; and if they should not be satisfied with it, they would pass no bill of indemnity. The noble lord had said, that the report of a committee so constituted, and supplied with such partial information, could be no ground for a bill of indemnity. If not, no harm was done; then would be the time to say so, and to object to an indemnity. Uniform practice was against the motion, but uniform practice might be departed from on good grounds. Where, then, were the grounds for departing from it in this instance? On every former occasion of this kind there had been petitions like those in question, but they were never referred to a committee. Why should they now be referred? The noble lords had said, that they knew nothing of the individuals who signed them, and nothing of the allegations contained in them. Was that a reason for referring them to the committee? If they had said that they knew the individuals, that they had examined into the allegations, and that they had found that the petitioners had been illegally arrested and harshly treated, that would not be a reason for referring the petitions; but in the present circumstances, the reference appeared to him to be singularly objectionable. There were two subjects of complaint in the petitions—1st, illegal and injurious arrest; 2dly, cruel and harsh treatment during the detention of the petitioners. With respect to the second ground of complaint, the indemnity would not reach it, it would not protect from any action which the law allowed on that ground. There would be no clause in the bill of indemnity to prevent an appeal to the courts of law, if any person thought himself aggrieved by cruel and harsh treatment, while detained under the suspension act. As to the charge of illegal and injurious arrest, what would the noble lords propose to be done? Were the committee to examine whether the petitioners were guilty or not, of treason? That seemed to be the object of the motion. If it was, how were the committee to proceed? They must call the persons accused before them, examine all the evidence on which they were committed, and all the evidence to substantiate their guilt: in a word, they must take the whole trial of those individuals. Suppose they should be acquitted of treason, was the report of the committee therefore false, or was the committal of the petitioners wrong? But, suppose they should find them guilty, what course were they, in that case, to follow? Were they to dismiss them, or to send them to be tried again, after all the evidence had been extorted from them, and after the judgment of that house was given against them? (Hear, hear.) If the practice of the house were not against the motion, if the practice were the reverse, he should say that this motion ought not to be received.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he would not enter at length into the merits of the question, as he was a member of the secret committee; but he rose to reply to the statement of the noble earl who had just sat down, as to the practice of the house and of secret committees. It was not the practice that a secret committee should send to the house for papers, but to confine themselves to the consideration of such papers as were laid before them. That part, therefore, of the noble lord's speech did not apply to the point under discussion. If the committee were to see and investigate those petitions, the present motion seemed to be the only mode of giving them that power.

The Earl of Liverpool admitted that the noble lord was correct in stating, that it was not the practice of a secret committee to send to the house for papers; but they could apply to the ministers of the crown for any papers they wanted; and if they did not obtain them, it was perfectly competent for them to report to the house that they had not had sufficient grounds for coming to any final judgment. Till the report came before the house, it was improper for any noble lord who was not a member of the committee to say that any papers were necessary. When the report should be made, they could judge of it. If it should be satisfactory, the petitions would be admitted to be unnecessary for the committee. If it should be unsatisfactory, and express the impossibility of coming to a conclusion without further information, then this motion might be urged. But till the house were aware of the report, it was impossible to say whether any or what proceeding should be adopted respecting it. Allusion had been made to the manner in which this committee was appointed; it had been asserted that it was appointed in a manner never heard of before. He would appeal to the house whether it was not appointed in the manner invariably adopted on similar occasions. It was always the duty of any noble lord who proposed a committee, to name the individuals who should form that committee. What benefit had that mode over a ballot? In both cases the mover proposed the individuals. What then was the difference, except that the ballot prevented invidious discussions as to particular names, which ought always to be avoided. Noble lords from both sides of the house were appointed members of the committee. When the subject was introduced last year, and on every occasion, he felt anxious to submit the information on which ministers acted to persons of all political opinions. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.) The committee was not formed on any narrow or party views. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.) He certainly would not choose to submit his conduct to the judgment of the noble lords he saw opposite to him (hear, hear, and a laugh). The report of the committee would speak for itself; he had no doubt that it would be a fair and just conclusion, deduced from ample materials of investigation. The members of the committee were as conscientious, and as much interested in the welfare of the country, as the noble lords opposite could be, and was it fair, then, to suppose that they would not do their duty? As to the contents of the petitions, the first ground of complaint was wanton and cruel imprisonment—(Lord Holland spoke across the table, to correct the noble lord: it was illegal imprisonment that formed the ground of complaint)—the first complaint was, then, illegal imprisonment; the second was, cruel and harsh treatment. With respect to the latter he should only say, with his noble friend, that the bill of indemnity would contain no clause to screen ministers, magistrates, gaolers, or any other description of persons against the consequences of any cruel or harsh treatment. This point, therefore, was not at issue. As to the other complaint, of illegal imprisonment, which was at issue, he would ask, whether it must not be the complaint of all who were confined under the suspension of the habeas corpus act? The ground of complaint was the very power conferred by the suspension. (Hear, hear, from Lord Sidmouth.) The noble earl (Grosvenor) had given his vote seven or eight times for the suspension of the habeas corpus. He might say it was upon grounds different from those of the last suspension: but the grounds were not now in question. Whenever, then, the noble earl had voted for the suspension of the habeas corpus, he voted for the power of taking up persons and confining them without trial. (Hear, hear, from Lord Sidmouth.) Whether it was necessary to grant such a power was another question. That question had been already discussed, and might be again discussed by the house; but it had nothing to do with the motion now before them.

Earl Grosvenor explained. He had not entered into the subject of the detention of the petitioners upon suspicion, as a ground of complaint, but in order to repel the insinuations of the noble viscount (Sidmouth) that the statements were unfounded. With this view he had stated that Drummond had, in fact, been arrested, brought before Lord Sidmouth, and dragged from gaol to gaol, as set forth in the petition. As to his former votes on this subject, he should only say, that the grounds of suspension were then different in all respects from the present.

Lord Holland, considering the motion as intimately connected with the whole system of government, considering it as intimately connected with the question now at issue between the government and the people, felt it his duty to offer a few observations upon it. But he would first answer the attacks of the noble lords opposite, and especially the very curious observation of the noble lord who had last spoken, respecting his noble friend's conduct on a former occasion. He hoped it would be indelibly engraven on the minds of their lordships, and he implored them to consider what was the consequence of once voting for the suspension of this sacred bulwark of our liberties—if they were once betrayed by the representations and delusions of ministers to assent to such a measure, they were held to be incapable ever after of deliberating on the subject. The noble earl (Bathurst) had misrepresented the object of the suspension: he did not charge him with having purposely misrepresented; notwithstanding his political hostility to him, he admitted that he was the last man in the house to misrepresent; but he had misrepresented in the present case. It never had been stated, till now, that the suspension of the habeas corpus granted the power of arresting and keeping in confinement, without any intention of bringing to trial at all. He had too often, unfortunately for the country, seen the habeas corpus suspended, although he was not an old man; but never had he heard it asserted before, that men could be arrested with no intention to bring them to trial. On the contrary, it was always asked by the other side of the house, and particularly, he recollected, by the noble lord on the woolsack—"where was the great injury of the suspension? where the danger? Was any man to be committed but upon oath, and on their own responsibility to bring him to trial?" (Hear, hear, hear.) The ground of suspension urged on all occasions was, that it was necessary to postpone the trial beyond the period allowed by law, because it was dangerous to betray the evidence which might enable other traitors to escape. He had the best authority for stating, that a government dependent on one man was misery to all. This it was found to be during the last year. After a year of such misery, ministers came forward and said, they had obtained liberty to do all that has been done: they came forward to say that they had been authorized to commit illegally, and to treat their prisoners cruelly. What else could have been expected? After having, on false pretences, obtained an act of suspension, they came forward now and called upon the house to indemnify them for all they had done even beyond that act. The first noble viscount who had spoken on the other side had said, that the noble lord who brought this motion before the house had acted judiciously in confining himself to the motion, and refraining from going into the contents of the petitions. He knew that the noble viscount hated parodies, although one of his colleagues was very accomplished in that species of composition. For his own part, he was a very bad hand at a parody, yet he was almost tempted to try a parody upon this part of the noble viscount's speech. The noble viscount had certainly acted most judiciously in refraining from touching any one of the arguments of the noble mover, and in confining himself to points quite foreign to the question. He had charged his noble friend with having made a sweeping proposition to refer those petitions to a committee. His noble friend had not done so; he had distinctly said, that the appointment of a committee to inquire into the truth of the allegations of the petitioners might be made a question; but a committee being actually sitting, substantially and notoriously to report upon the conduct of ministers towards those very petitioners, he had moved to refer those petitions to them as a matter of course. The motion had been met, and he would admit with some authority, as to the point of form. But every word that was said, as to form, was an aggravation of the conduct of ministers in this case. He had not been in the house when the committee was appointed; but he understood it had then been stated, that the object of the committee was to examine papers upon the state of the country, and the manner in which ministers had acted. But, if they had acted fairly and honestly, they should have stated what limit and object were to be prescribed to the committee. They should have said, that the object was twofold—1st, to inquire into the state of the country; and 2dly, to judge of the criminality or innocence of ministers, and then they should have pointed out the proper form in which the inquiry was to be conducted. "We bring down a green bag," they should have said, "and we refer it to a committee, which committee we select ourselves, and we lay before them what papers we judge proper. We adopt this form, because we think it improper that the committee should obtain any evidence against our former assertions, or against our conduct under the suspension." The noble lord (Liverpool)—he had almost said, his noble friend, although he certainly had no intention of saying so—had declared he should not like those lords opposite to him for his judges. But he should have no objection to him (Lord Liverpool) for his judge. If he were innocent, he could have no reason for objecting to him. If he were guilty, he could have no objection, provided he had the choice of the evidence, the arrangement of that evidence, and above all, the preponderating voice among the rest of the judges. He did not speak invidiously of the committee, he spoke only of the proceedings of ministers; but he would always maintain that the persons to be tried ought not to be members of the committee that was to try them. (Hear, hear.) He would also maintain that no confidence could be placed on a report, however conscientiously framed, when the information was strictly and jealously ex-parte. As to the uniform practice of the house, he did not recollect that such an inquiry as ministers now instituted had ever been proposed in such circumstances. The danger was now over; its existence could therefore be fairly proved, if it ever existed. Last year the noble lord had introduced a green bag in a very mysterious manner; in consequence of this green bag there was a secret committee, a report, and a suspension of the habeas corpus. The report stated suspicions of a variety of meetings through the country, but chiefly of the central meetings in the metropolis. A petition was presented by his noble relation offering to prove this suspicion totally unfounded. It was moved, that the petition be taken into consideration. The reply was, that this was improper in itself; besides, that there was not time to inquire into the truth of all such representations; the purpose of the house would be defeated if they went into an investigation when every individual thought proper. It was objected, that the evidence laid before the committee was ex-parte. It was answered, that it must be so, and that the committee acted like a grand jury, who found true bills upon ex-parte evidence. Did ministers now, then, come forward, and really tell the house, that the excellent old maxim Audi alteram partem would not be admitted? After they had had two reports of secret committees; after many were arrested for high treason; after some had been condemned, many acquitted, and the most discharged without trial, were they to be told that they should have no further evidence of the necessity of the suspension? The ministers must now say, "leave the law to its course, we are able to justify our conduct;" or, "we have been misled, expunge from your records the reports on which we acted," or, "you granted the powers under which we acted from confidence in the characters of ministers; grant us now an indemnity on the same principle. You suspended the constitution from prospective confidence in us; indemnify us from retrospective confidence." If they had manfully come forward with this last proposition, he should have opposed it, as he had done last year; but he must have thought much more highly of their fairness and magnanimity. The last year he regarded as a year of great misfortune. It was a year of delusion, practised in the most execrable manner; of power unnecessarily obtained and unwarrantably exercised; of distress and suffering, without justice and without redress. Yet it would have been manly to call for indemnity on the bare ground of character. One other honourable mode of proceeding was left for them; they might have come forward and said—"the storm is now over, the danger is past, the alarm has ceased, calmly judge therefore our conduct, examine all the evidence that can assist your judgment; let us hear all that can be said against our proceedings; open the doors to all complaints, petitions, and representations; we acted honestly upon the best information we could obtain; judge ye now our conduct." But the noble lord had chosen to recommend neither course; their proceedings were perfectly different, and embraced no mode of satisfying the minds of the people. His noble friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) had properly said that, whether justly or not, the country had loudly expressed an opinion, that injustice had been exercised; that government had exceeded its powers; and that every thing which they had done in consequence of the suspension act was not rightly done. There was a prevalent suspicion, amounting with some to a positive belief, that the noble lord at the head of the home department had not acted constitutionally; that he had exercised powers beyond the law; that in his circulars to magistrates, directing how to perform their duty, in preventing their visitation of prisoners, in recommending the suspension of the great bulwark of rights, and in employing spies and informers, he conducted himself in a manner subversive of our best privileges, and hostile to the public interests. The noble viscount (Sidmouth) had replied to the observations on the latter subject, that it was idle to suppose that all the mischiefs which had occurred in the disturbed districts could be attributed to spies. He (Lord Holland) would not go the length of saying that all this mischief had arisen from the employment of such persons; but he had no hesitation in declaring his conviction that much of it was to be referred to that origin (Hear, hear); and if he were allowed, he would produce sufficient evidence in support of his opinion. He was not accustomed to make rash pledges, or to advance exaggerated statements; but he could assure the house, that if a proper opportunity were offered, he had no doubt he could make out a better case against Oliver than ministers had been able to make out last year against the country. (Hear, hear, hear.) He was not in the habit of asserting facts on ex-parte testimony; he was not in the habit of coming to a decision on any question till he heard what could be advanced on both sides; and he would not therefore say that all the statements which he could produce should be implicitly relied on; but he would say that, till he saw the contents of the green bag, the evidence in his possession against Oliver appeared conclusive. (Hear, hear.) This evidence did not proceed entirely from persons who were interested or prejudiced—it was not altogether from what had been termed a polluted source—it was furnished by respectable individuals who had watched his operations, or who had inquired into the truth of accounts supplied by others. The noble viscount (Lord Sidmouth) had thought he had sufficiently disproved the allegations of Mitchell's petition, by denying that he had been apprehended on the testimony of Oliver: but so far as he (Lord Holland) remembered, the petitioner did not state that he was. One thing, however, was certain, and could not be denied, as it was supported on irresistible proof—that Oliver had been detected acting in most of the disturbed districts. Witnesses could be brought to state, that he had been engaged in exciting the people of Nottingham, of Derbyshire, and of Yorkshire, to violence and insurrection, by the most inflammatory language, and the most encouraging assurances of assistance. He (Lord Holland) did not assert that such evidence was true, but he gave it as his opinion that it laid sufficient grounds for inquiry and investigation. He would go further and say, that the employment of spies (he did not allude to the receiving of intelligence from informers) was always unjustifiable, except in cases of the greatest and most imminent hazard to the state. Nothing but a paramount necessity that set all ordinary rules at defiance, and threatened dangers to social order, that could neither be met nor averted by acting on common principles, or exercising all the means which human foresight and vigilance could suggest, would justify a resort to such revolting, hazardous, and abominable agency. The persons so employed must always be the refuse of society; and unless those who employed them were able to judge of their testimony, and to examine coolly the facts they supplied, they must always produce mischief. He might appeal to all history, and the opinions of all wise historians and politicians, in support of this doctrine. He would not, however, refer to the authority of some authors who were often quoted on the subject; he would not produce the severe invective and bold description of Tacitus, when speaking of this class of persons, because it might be said, that he was a misanthropist, and coloured his picture with features taken from the arbitrary despotism under which he lived; he would not quote Lord Falkland, because he might be called a fastidious and speculative statesman; but he would refer to an author against whom none of these objections could be brought, the penetration, sagacity, and elegance of whose work was acknowledged by all, and who, whatever else might be said against him, could not be accused of having any unfavourable leaning towards popular claims, or any hostile feeling against existing governments. In speaking of the measures pursued by Burleigh and Walsingham, in 1584, Mr. Hume's beautiful history contained the following passage:—"Spies were hired to observe the actions and discourses of suspected persons; informers were countenanced; and though the sagacity of these two great ministers helped them to distinguish the true from the false intelligence, many calumnies were no doubt hearkened to, and all the subjects, particularly the Catholics, kept in the utmost anxiety and disquietude." When such great ministers as these were liable to be imposed upon, was it not to be suspected that the employment of similar agents by those who might not exercise the same caution and vigilance, would lead to the greatest oppression and abuses, especially when such instruments were relieved from the fear of detection or punishment? The fear of a public trial was the only check that could be imposed on the misconduct of spies. If protected from trial or exposure, there was no limit to their audacity, no control over their actions, no means of meeting or confounding their misrepresentations. They might give any information they pleased, they might invent the most palpable falsehoods, they might calumniate the most innocent and orderly individuals. If the danger from this detestable race was great, when they were sent among the better-informed classes of society, how much was it multiplied when they were employed among the lower orders, who were liable to every delusion which they might attempt to practise, and unable to detect their real characters? If a spy should be sent among their lordships, he would have no power to do injury, because they would neither be likely to be deceived by his impressions, or misled by his violence: but it need scarcely be stated, though it could not be fully conceived, how mischievous a character of this kind must have been among the labourers and manufacturers of the distressed districts last year. He found the people almost mad with projects of reform, discontented from want of employment, and almost furious from want of food. It was not his business to sooth their discontents, to represent the real state of their feelings, or to transmit intelligence of their real situation; he was sent to detect their dangerous projects, to discover their treasonable and seditious plots. To please his employers, therefore, and to magnify his own importance, he had a motive to impel them to the excesses, which it was the object to denounce. "I shall get nothing," says he, "by encouraging them to petition peaceably for parliamentary reform; I shall get nothing by urging a people crying for bread to bear their sufferings with patience, or to rely with confidence on the legislature for all the relief it can grant. I must excite them to violence, I must inflame their discontents into rebellion, before I execute my mission, or deserve my reward." There was, therefore, a probability, that when such agents as these were employed among a people most tempted to violence by distress, their influence was most pernicious and dangerous, in increasing discontent into disaffection and acts of violence. These things laid grounds for inquiry and investigation; but these were not the only things. The petitions on the table, and the inquiry proposed to be laid before the committee, referred to tampering with witnesses, to the taking of illegal recognizances, and to discharges without trial, by which suspicion was still fixed on the petitioners. But it was said, that the forms of the house precluded inquiry; and this was the only answer that was given to petitioners when they complained of the grievances which they had suffered, and the hardships to which they had been subjected. He was glad to hear it said, that the bill of indemnity which would be proposed would still allow recourse to be had to a court of justice for a redress of individual grievances, if any abuse of authority had been exercised; but he distrusted such pledges, when he remembered the effects and consequences of other bills of indemnity; when he recollected that, in 1801, the last bill of this kind precluded all inquiry. The noble earl opposite (Lord Bathurst) had produced an ingenious argument against referring the petitions to the secret committee. He had said that on such a reference the committee would be converted into a court of law to decide on the guilt or innocence of the petitioners, to convict or acquit them of treason; but he (Lord Holland) could not see how this would be the effect, as it was not the object of the motion. The motion referred the petitioners' case to the committee, not to pronounce whether they were guilty or not guilty, but whether the government, in its mode of apprehending and treating them, had exceeded its powers. It was an old maxim in law, in which if he were wrong, he would be set right by the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, that no truth could be proved till it was contested, and he thought the election of the committee was such as promised nothing without the present reference. He had never in his life been in the habit of predicting any thing in public. He remembered no instance in which he ventured to predict the result of a political measure, but one, when, in the case of the suspension of cash-payments at the Bank, he foretold that they would never be resumed. He would now, however, predict, and take his character of a prophet on the issue, that the result of this partial inquiry, by this ministerial committee, would be the recommendation of a bill of indemnity (hear, hear,) which, in other words, would be this—that ministers, after having procured a recommendation from a secret committee, to grant them extraordinary powers to preserve the law, would obtain a similar recommendation, by the same means, to protect them against the breaches of it. (Hear, hear, hear.)

After his lordship had concluded, no other peer offering to address the house, the question was put from the woolsack, and the motion negatived without a division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, Feb. 19.

WINDOW AND HEARTH TAX (IRELAND.) "Returns were ordered of the net amount of the window and hearth tax in Ireland, for the years ending the 5th of January 1816, 1817, and 1818, respectively.

"Of the amount of the insolvencies allowed by the commissioners of excise on the window and hearth tax in the city of Dublin, for the same years.

"Of the number of taxable articles for which notices of discontinuance and of increase have been served on the several collectors of excise in Ireland, for the year ending 5th of January 1819."

PUBLIC REVENUE.] Abstracts were presented "of the net produce of the revenue of Great Britain, in the years ended 5th of January 1817, and 5th of January 1818; distinguishing the quarters, and also the total produce of the customs and excise.

"Of the net produce of the revenue of Great Britain, in the years ending 5th of January 1817, and 5th of January 1818; distinguishing the quarters, and also the total produce of the consolidated fund, the annual duties, and the war taxes.

"Of the net produce of the revenue of Ireland, as paid into the Exchequer, in the years ended 5th of January 1817, and 5th of January 1818; distinguishing the quarters."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

IRISH TREASURY BILLS.] An account was presented (pursuant to an order of the 17th instant) "of all Irish treasury bills outstanding and unprovided for on the 13th of February 1818; in British currency." (See the Appendix.)

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS' REGULATION BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

DROITS OF THE CROWN.] On the motion of Mr. Teed, a list was ordered "of all ships and cargoes captured by private ships of war, and condemned as droits to the crown, since the 1st of January 1794, the net proceeds of each, and the proportion paid to the captors; distinguishing the flag, date of capture, and the date of the warrant granting such proportion."

BRITISH CLAIMS ON FRANCE.] On the motion of Sir C. Burrell, an account was ordered "of the number of claims for compensation which have been made upon the French government, classing the same into funded, territorial, and commercial, together with the number of each, which have been liquidated since the British commissioners for that purpose have been appointed; also, an account of the salaries enjoyed by the said commissioners respectively, and from what period they have received the same."

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented a petition of inhabitants of Liverpool, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It set forth, "that the petitioners beg most earnestly, but respectfully, to state to the house their full conviction and belief, that the people of the United Kingdom of England and Ireland are not fairly and duly represented, as by the constitution of these realms they ought to be, and to this source, and to this alone, do they ascribe the present enormous weight of taxation, the gross misapplication of the public money in the support of undeserving pensioners and sinecurists, and all the dreadful miseries and privations which have of late years afflicted the people of this country; and they beg leave further to state their conviction, that unless a speedy reform of the house takes place, the spirit and industry of the working population will become enervated, if not totally destroyed: that the country itself will lose its national character and become the desolate habitation of a disgraced and degenerate posterity; the petitioners refrain from entering largely on the subject, but they earnestly beg and intreat that the house will in their wisdom grant them that speedy relief which the urgency and necessity of the case requires."

The hon. baronet then presented fourteen petitions of inhabitants of Bath, praying for reform of parliament. Ordered to lie on the table.

COTTON FACTORIES.] Sir Robert Peel observed, that in calling the attention of the house to the subject of which he had given notice, he felt assured that the more it was considered, the greater would appear the magnitude of its importance. About fifteen years ago, he had brought in a bill for the regulation of the employment of apprentices in cotton-factories, having himself at that time about one thousand of them. At that time, these factories were established only in those parts of the country where the advantage of a water-mill could be enjoyed; but at present they were to be found in many large towns. No less a number than 20,000 children were employed in the cotton manufacture in Manchester alone, and treble that number in the whole of England together. It might be necessary for him to state, that these children were employed at the same time and in the same rooms with adult persons, and that many of a very tender age were dragged from their beds long before sun-rise, and confined to their labour for the space of fifteen hours. The lamentable effects and contagious diseases which such a practice must produce, had induced him to submit some measure for regulating it to the consideration of the house. Of one plan, which had been suggested by several humane persons, that of substituting two sets of young labourers for adults, in this branch of industry, he decidedly disapproved, from a conviction that it would do more harm than good, and that the only effectual cure for the evil would be, to prevent entirely the employment of children till they should arrive at a certain age. Although the individuals in whose service these young children were engaged could not perceive from day to day the gradual decline of their health, it must appear manifest to a stranger on seeing them, that they could never attain that mature growth and bodily vigour which were requisite for the general purposes of life. The state would find it difficult to draw recruits either for its armies or navy from such a source. He was desirous of bringing in the bill that night, and of fixing the second reading on some day when the subject might be fully investigated and discussed. He now moved, therefore, for leave to bring in a bill "to amend and extend an act, made in the forty-second year of his present Majesty, for the preservation of the Health and Morals of Apprentices and others employed in Cotton and other Mills, and Cotton and other Factories."

Lord Lascelles said, he felt considerable difficulty on the present subject, which was of the highest importance to the manufacturing districts. All evils were not fit subjects for legislative interference; for instance, he highly applauded the bill of an hon. friend of his, respecting chimney-sweepers. But, in the present case, it should be recollected, that the individuals who were the objects of the hon. baronet's proposition were free labourers. This excited his jealousy; for, were the principle of interference with free labourers once admitted, it was difficult to say how far it might be carried. If there existed any thing radically vicious in the system, it ought to be inquired into. In fact, a parliamentary inquiry had taken place by a committee in 1816, and he could not help expressing his surprise, if the evils described by the hon. baronet, existed, that no legislative measure had sooner been proposed. When the house were about to legislate on a large scale they ought at least not to do so on ex-parte evidence privately obtained, but on evidence openly taken before a committee of the house or otherwise. If the evils stated in this ex-parte evidence really existed, it might be extremely desirous that something should be done to remedy them; still however the house ought to entertain a great jealousy on this subject. At all events the subject ought to be canvassed and examined in the most open manner.

Mr. W. Smith contended that the bill which the hon. baronet wished to introduce to the house did not originate in the ex-parte evidence alluded to by the noble lord, the member for Yorkshire—there stood on the report of the committee of 1816, full and sufficient grounds for the measure proposed by the hon. baronet.

Mr. Philips said, that if he conceived that the establishment with which he was connected, though he was only what was called a sleeping partner in it, scattered disease and death in the manner which had been described, he should take shame to himself if he did not immediately attempt to remedy the evil. The fact was, however, that that establishment had been conducted in such a manner that it was an important benefit to the poor, and an example to other factories. It had been established twenty-seven years, and during that period, no contagious disease had been known in it. Out of a thousand persons employed, the whole sum paid to them in poor-rates did not exceed 5*l*. per annum—a fortieth part of the sum which the factory contributed to the poor. If such was the fact, could any man say that the employment was unhealthy? There was no manufactory in the country from which, if the same means were taken which had been resorted to in this case, numerous petitions and complaints might not be obtained. About four or five persons had been very active in looking out for complaints; they had despatched their emissaries secretly about the country, and circulated papers among the people in the different factories for their signature. On a former occasion, the hon. baronet had said, that the petitioners, in order to have the number of hours reduced, would willingly submit to a reduction of wages; but the petitioners did not say one word about reduction of wages; and if they said they would consent to such reduction, he would not believe them. The habits of these people led them to combine together; and it required great delicacy on the part of their employers to prevent much mischief being done in that way. Small factories were often ill ventilated, and from that circumstance the health of a person might suffer more in six hours in one of those factories, than in fifteen hours in a factory which was well ventilated, and properly constructed in other respects. But how could this evil be cured by any bill? The small factories generally went to ruin, and that was the cure for the evil. From the returns made to the house, out of 31,117, the number of persons employed, 1717, or 5½ per cent., were of the age of 10 and under; 13,203 from 10 to 18, and 16,197 of the age of 18 and upwards. Out of 27,827 persons, there were 1830 only who could not read. Out of 25,000, the number of persons returned as sick was 163, very little more than 5-8ths per cent.

Mr. Wilberforce thought it would be better to reserve giving opinions on this subject till the bill was before the house. If different systems of management prevailed in the conduct of different factories, that was a sufficient reason for inducing the house to require further information. His hope and belief was, that a fair inquiry would prove that the interests of the manufactures and those of humanity were not at variance.

Mr. Finlay said, that except in one instance, in the county of Lancaster, there was no proof of the existence of any evils which could justify legislative interference. That very establishment, however, was under the regulation of an act of parliament, none but apprentices being employed in it, and it only proved, therefore, that no law could prevent an immoral man from doing cruel and oppressive things. But even in that factory it was proved, that though children were employed fourteen hours, they were notwithstanding in very good health. He warned the house against entertaining any measure which went, like the present, to interfere with a manufacture of such vital importance. It was the most important ever established in this country; indeed, he believed it employed more people than all the other manufactures of the country taken together. The exports exceeded twenty millions a year; and they were not equal to the home consumption; the whole amount of the manufactures was little short of forty millions a year. In the linen and woollen manufactures, the hours were as long as in the cotton—in the woollen even longer. The opinions of the gentlemen of the faculty were altogether conjectural—none of them had ever been in a cotton manufactory. He gave warning that he would oppose the bill in every stage.

Mr. Peel wished to observe, that the bill now proposed to be brought in, was introduced in 1815—it was then withdrawn, as it was contended that there was not sufficient evidence on the subject before the house. In 1816, a committee sat for the purpose of investigation—a bill was not introduced last year from the indisposition of the mover; but that was no reason why one should not be introduced now. It was no argument against such a bill, that some factories were well regulated; if some factories were well regulated at present, that was a reason for the house to adopt the regulations on which those factories were conducted. With respect to the instance of misconduct in Lancashire, which had been alluded to, it was proved that children were employed there fifteen hours a day, and, after any stoppage, from five in the morning till ten in the evening—seventeen hours, and this often for three weeks at a time. On the Sunday they were employed from six in the morning till twelve, in cleaning the machinery. The medical men examined by the committee were some of them related to manufacturers, and well acquainted with factories. It was on evidence, that children had been employed at an age as early as five, and some were employed under the age of seven. Could any person say, that a child of seven years of age ought to be employed fourteen hours? Was it necessary to have the evidence of medical men to prove that to employ a child of seven years of age was unfavourable to health? At the same time he allowed that the subject was not without difficulty. A sort of personal reflection had been thrown out on a former occasion against an individual with whom he was nearly connected. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Philips) had observed, that the individual in question had not introduced the bill till after he had acquired his wealth, and abandoned the trade. So far the hon. gentleman was perfectly correct in his facts. The hon. gentleman had stated, that the magistrates had complained of the manner in which the establishment with which the individual in question was concerned, was conducted; but he had stated this without qualification as to the time of such complaints. This referred to a period so far back as 1784, and again in 1796; and it was in consequence of these complaints that the bill of 1802 was introduced. A great change had taken place in the manner of conducting the manufactory since that period. Before the application of steam, it was necessary to select situations where falls of water could be had; these situations were frequently mountainous, and the population thin, and children were obtained as apprentices from large towns—but now these manufactories were in populous neighbourhoods. The individual in question finding that in his own establishment abuses had taken place, and were kept from his knowledge by the overseer, and learning that the same abuses took place in other manufactories, gave a proof of his sincere wish to remedy the evil by bringing in the bill of 1802.

Mr. Curwen and Sir James Graham professed themselves hostile to the principle of the bill.

Sir J. Jackson and Mr. B. Shaw said a few words in its support.

Leave was then given to introduce the bill, which was afterwards brought in and read a first time.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Lord Archibald Hamilton presented a petition of William Robertson, of Meikle Gevan; also of William Murray, in Calton of Glasgow: also of David Smith, in Calton of Glasgow, complaining of their arrest and treatment in prison, under the habeas corpus suspension act, and praying for redress.

Mr. Finlay said, that the petitioners could have suffered no privations under the habeas corpus suspension act; for no persons had been taken up under that act, in Scotland.—With respect to the unwholesomeness of their place of confinement, and of inhumanity on the part of the sheriff, he had inquired into the subject, and there was no foundation for the complaint. In short, there was not one word of truth in their statement from beginning to end.

Lord A. Hamilton thought it very natural for the petitioners to imagine that they were detained under the suspension act, nor could he conceive, why, if they were properly confined, they had been discharged without being brought to trial. (Hear, hear.)

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

ELECTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. Wynn moved that this bill be recommitted.

Colonel Allan opposed the motion, on the ground that the bill tended very materially to abridge the rights and franchises of the free voters in many places. He thought it necessary to take every opportunity of opposing its progress.

On the suggestion of several members, the hon. member withdrew his objection; it being understood that the third reading should not take place till Monday se'nnight.

Sir W. Guise then proposed the following clause, which was brought up and read a first and second time.

"And whereas great irregularities have frequently arisen, and bribery has been often grossly practised, by the appointment of large bodies of persons, on behalf of opposing candidates, to act as constables at contested elections; be it therefore further enacted, that from and after the passing of this act it shall be lawful for the returning officer or officers, at every contested election for any county, city, town, borough, port or place, and he and they is and are hereby required, previously to the commencement or during the course of the poll, to nominate and appoint such and so many persons as he or they shall think necessary, to act as constables for the preservation of the peace and good order during such election; which said constables so to be appointed, shall be all duly sworn in before some justice or justices of the peace acting for such county, city, town, borough, port or place, and shall each of them be paid and allowed at the ordinary rate of constables per day in the execution of their duty, and no more, for his and their service during such election; which said sum so to be allowed to such constables shall be defrayed in like manner as the expense of erecting booths, and the allowance to poll clerks is hereinbefore directed to be paid; and no person or persons other than the persons so to be nominated and appointed by such returning officer or officers as aforesaid, shall be appointed or sworn in, or shall presume to act as constables during the polling at any contested election whatsoever."

Mr. C. Wynn brought up the following clauses, which were read and agreed to.

"And whereas there are several cities, towns corporate and places, within this kingdom, which do not contribute to the payment of any county rate; and doubts may arise whether such cities, towns corporate and places, can be legally rated and assessed towards the payment of the expenses hereinbefore mentioned; be it enacted, that in all such cases the said expenses shall be raised, levied, collected and paid, within such cities, towns corporate and places, by a separate rate and assessment, to be made by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the several parishes and precincts within such cities, towns corporate and places, or by such and the like ways, methods and means, as the rates for the relief of the poor are, can or may be assessed, raised, levied and collected, in such cities, towns corporate and places."

"And whereas it may happen that the sums of money to be raised in the said cities, towns corporate and places, or some or one of them, to answer and pay such expenses as aforesaid, may be so small that it may not be convenient to make an equal separate rate and assessment for the same, upon the said parishes and precincts within such cities, towns corporate and places; be it enacted, that in such last-mentioned case, and when and as often as the same shall happen, the before-mentioned expenses shall and may, by order of the justices in sessions assembled, be paid out of the monies from time to time raised for the relief of the poor in the said several cities, towns corporate and places, and the persons from time to time having the management of the said monies raised for the relief of the poor, in the same cities, towns corporate and places respectively, are hereby authorized and required to pay the said sums of money so ordered to be paid by the said justices, out of the said last-mentioned monies, when and as often as the same shall be so ordered; provided always, that should there be more parishes than one in the same district, the payments are to be made and levied in such rates and proportions as the respective parishes pay to the poor rate."

The house then resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

GAMBLING SUPPRESSION BILL.] Mr. Ogle moved the order of the day for the second reading of the bill "for the suppression of gaming, and for regulating houses kept for the purposes of play." After reciting that the laws now in force are not sufficient to prevent the evil effects of gaming; and that it is necessary to make an additional enactment to meet the circumstances of the case; the bill enacted, that from and after the any person keeping a house, room or apartment, for the purpose of affording accommodation to play at any game whatsoever, shall take out a licence annually for the same: provided always, that no licence shall be granted unless the person applying for the same shall obtain a certificate as to his character, of householders of the parish in which he proposes to keep any such house, room or apartment, for the purposes aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, that any person keeping any such house, room or apartment, not having obtained a licence for the same, shall pay a penalty, by information, of pounds per day, that he shall keep such house, room or apartment, for the purposes aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, that any person keeping such house, room or apartment, for the purposes aforesaid, shall not, by himself or his servants, advance any money for the purposes of play, under penalty, by information, of shillings for every pound so advanced.

And be it further enacted, that no keeper of any tavern, coffee house or hotel, shall furnish accommodation for the purposes aforesaid, unless he obtains a licence for the same, subject to all the regulations aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, that no action at law shall be maintained for any money won at any game, or by any bet or wager whatsoever.

And be it further enacted, that all monies levied under this act shall be applied to the maintenance of the police in the district wherein levied.

Mr. Bankes, conceiving that the bill would not tend to suppress the vice of gaming, moved that it be read a second time on that day six months.

Sir F. Flood said, that so far from putting down gaming, this bill went to encourage it. This was evident from the title of the bill, for it professed to have for its object " to regulate houses kept for the purposes of play:" and regulation was not suppression. He thought nothing could be more injurious to property, reputation, and life, than the vice of gaming. It had brought many individuals to ruin, had produced great private misery, and deprived the country of many persons who might otherwise have been useful and valuable members of society. Upon these considerations, it ought to be suppressed; but this was a bill which professed to regulate, and not to suppress. He should, therefore, vote for the amendment.

Mr. Lockhart said, that a common gaming-house is already at common law a nuisance, and may be indicted as such. This bill was not calculated to effect the purposes for which the hon. member had introduced it.

Mr. Ogle did not think that this bill would interfere with the common law of the land. But if the hon. member (Mr. Bankes) thought that the bill would not be useful in its present form, he should wish to withdraw it.

Mr. Bankes said, that if the hon. gentleman withdrew his bill, and thought proper to prosecute the subject, he might bring in another bill at a future time, under a different title. The question now before the house was, that this bill be read a second time on this day six months.

The question was repeated from the chair, and carried without a division.

TITHE LAWS AMENDMENT.] Mr. Curwen rose, and spoke as follows:—" Mr. Speaker,—Previous to entering on the subject which it is now my duty to submit to the house, I wish to explain and apologize for having embarked in business of such difficulty, and which would have come so much better from many other members. I have been led into the undertaking from the powerful assistance afforded me by one of the ablest and most constitutional lawyers of the day, my much esteemed friend Baron Wood. I trust this will be considered as a full justification for what might otherwise appear presumptuous, and entitle me to the attention of the house. The measure is doubtless one of great importance, as it affects property and influences the moral conduct of a large body of the community.—In order to disarm prejudice, and to give the most extended information as to the objects of the bill, I introduced it in the last session, when it was printed and dispersed all over the country. The avowed intention of the bill was to give to the tithe-owner the same security that is enjoyed in every other species of property. It was to prevent that extended and extending spirit of litigation on the subject of tithes, so injurious to the best interests of the church. By the papers before the house, it appears that 123 tithe causes have been decided in the last seven years, and that an equal or greater number are pending. When it is considered that each of these causes may have continued for these six or seven years, producing such feuds and animosities as to occasion the church to be totally deserted—need we seek for a stronger reason to account for the increase of dissenters from the church? If I had no other argument to urge on the score of individual hardship, this alone is sufficient to call on the legislature to amend the laws. The church, if it regards its sacred functions, is above all others interested in promoting the measure I am about to propose. From the moderation and liberality which generally distinguish the great body of the church, I am satisfied they would disclaim the advantages arising from the present practice and law relative to tithes—they will be ready to disclaim the possessing of facilities for the invasion of the properties of others. God forbid any attempt should be sanctioned for a moment that aimed at invalidating the sacredness of vested rights of any body. I need not disclaim it for myself, much less on the part of that able judge to whom I am so much indebted. The jealousy of the house with regard to all measures which respect private property, is highly honourable to it. It must be ignorance of this feeling that could induce any one to be so rash as to propound a measure where the strictest regard to all parties and rights was not attended to. I contend for nothing which has not the sanction of the highest law authorities, of ancient as well as modern times. I need scarcely observe to the house, that, primâ facie, all lands are subject to the payment of tithes. The grounds of exception are moduses, exemptions, prescriptions, compositions, or discharges. Moduses suppose a commencement prior to Richard the First. Forty years' uninterrupted payment pre-supposes a title impeachable in two ways: first, by shewing its commencement to have been subsequent to Richard the First; which may be done by proving it to be rank, from the sum exceeding what was the value at that period. Exemptions, prescriptions, compositions, and discharges, cannot be proved by immemorial possession, but from the production of the original deed or contract by which they were created. Exemptions could be legally granted till the 13th of Elizabeth. Previous to my proceeding to discuss these different branches, it may be expedient to advert to the law as it stood at the commencement of this reign. The property of the crown and the church were not barred by any length of possession. The arbitrary, oppressive proceedings of the crown occasioned the legislature to pass the nullum tempus act. This arose out of the memorable contest between Sir James Lowther and the Duke of Portland; from the embezzlement or destruction of a deed enrolled in one of the public offices. The flagrant injustice of that case carried conviction of the necessity of preventing such occurrences in future. Why it did not extend to the church, I am unable to offer any reasonable conjecture. The nullum tempus confines the claims of the crown to sixty years; after which period no claims on the part of the subject can be urged. By this act the legislature has fully acknowledged the principle; my wish is to apply it to tithes. The courts of law have decided in latter periods strongly in favour of possession. In strict legal pleadings in the courts of law, it was necessary that the deeds should be lodged in the court, that the opposing party might have access to them. Forty-eight years ago, Lord Kenyon in the case of Read v. Brookman, ruled, that instead of the profert it might be alleged, that the deed was destroyed by time or accident, and that time would prove the right. Lord Kenyon observed, "this is founded on necessity, since no human prudence can render deeds existing for ever." I ask of the house to apply this principle to the case of the tithe-owner. It will be incumbent on those who oppose the truth and justice of the learned judge's observation, to shew how the case of tithes differs from others; and in what way these rights can be preserved, if the law is suffered to remain as it be. I feel strongly borne out for the principle I am contending for, by the proceedings of the Court of King's Bench in later times—proceedings never questioned: on the contrary, approved by all sound lawyers, as indispensably requisite for the ends of justice. It is for the general security of all property that the right of possession should be strengthened, and to attribute to it the best beginning. I shall now endeavour to shew what are the defects of the law as it relates to tithes, and what are the remedies I would propose for their amendment. The ancient mode of proceeding by the clergy for the recovery of tithes, was in their own ecclesiastical courts; in case any matter of fact occurred, the Court of King's Bench stayed the proceedings till a jury had decided upon it. Disputes having arisen between the ecclesiastical and law courts on the right of the latter to interfere, the same came to be solemnly argued before King James the First, who decided, with the unanimous approbation of all the judges of the land, that the ancient law of the kingdom should be abided by; Magna Charta having provided, "that no man should be deprived of freedom or free custom but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land." The decision in favor of the trial by jury on all questions of fact, seems to have been acquiesced in by the clergy for upwards of fifty years; when by a fiction of law, unworthy of that sacred body, they contrived by professing themselves to be debtors to the crown, (on account of payment of tenths) to commence their proceedings in the Court of Exchequer. Thus things proceeded till the case of Gardner v. Pole, 1706, when Chief Baron Wood, and other Barons, held 12*d*. per acre for hay, a rank modus. This decision was appealed against and reversed in the House of Lords, who held the modus a good one. In the case of Sanson v. Shaw, in the Common Pleas, 1748, it was contended, that 10*d*. for meadow or pasture was rank. Serjeant Belfield said on that occasion, he was so old as to remember almost the very beginning of the name of rank modus; that Lord C. B. Wood was the first who introduced it; that he was a great patron of the clergy, and carried their rights a great way. Lord C. J. Willes says, "I am afraid truly there have been many cases determined on rankness; the fewer the better: and I am glad they are not in print, for then they might mislead more than they have already:" and he observes, "that the consequence of these determinations is to deprive the landholders of what they have fairly purchased and paid for." Mr. Justice Barnet says, "My brother Belfield has given us the history of the beginning of the doctrine of rank moduses, in Lord Chief Baron Wood's time, and I have had another case given me by a learned judge, which shews the end of it; see the case of Gifford v. Webb, in the Exchequer." Unfortunately this did not prove to be true. The defence set up for courts of equity deciding on matters of fact, is the ignorance and prejudice of juries, who cannot be supposed to be conversant in the value of money in the time of Richard the First. To rebut this I plead Magna Charta, and in support of it I have an authority of modern date, that will weigh with the house, and, above all, with the hon. and learned gentleman the member for Oxford—I mean that of the present Lord Chancellor; who in the case of O'Conner v. Cook, gives the true constitutional answer: "I cannot hold the language that has been held as to sending this to the prejudices of a jury. A jury is the constitutional tribunal of the country, and I am not at liberty to suppose that it will be guided by prejudice." Now, Sir, of the integrity and ability of those who preside in our courts of justice, no one entertains a higher opinion than I do; but with every possible deference I would ask, is it possible for them to establish any one rule of decision that can suit all cases? Does not the quality of land as well as locality, produce a great and material difference? A shilling an acre for meadow might be a rank modus in one case, and quite the reverse in another. Does not this form a very material fact for a jury to inquire into?—There is in the practice of the courts of equity respecting tithe causes, a decision, the fairness and justice of which I cannot comprehend. In all cases where the rector prays an issue, the court grants it and sends the case, whatever may be its opinion, to be tried by a jury. Though the court was satisfied of the validity of a modus, a jury is to pronounce upon it. Why the defendant should not equally be entitled to have a trial by jury, is perfectly incomprehensible to me, and I own, savours strongly, as I view it, of rank injustice. The next point to which I would call the attention of the house, is to compositions real, which are compositions made between parson, patron, and ordinary, which might legally have been done till the restraining act of the 13th of Eliz. ch. 10; many such no doubt were made. In a lapse of 240 years since these agreements were restricted, many deeds must have been destroyed or lost. At the period of the reformation, 31st of Henry the Eighth, 1539, nearly one-third of the whole property of tithes passed into the hands of the crown, and were sold and disposed of. From this moment a new character was given to tithes. They became to all intents and purposes a temporal possession, and were parcelled out and sold to individuals. Many who were purchasers of their own or others' tithes never had the original deed of conveyance in their possession. Is not the law as it now stands monstrous in ruling that possession is no proof of title, no presumption of an original grant? The deed and the deed only shall be received as proof of any title. This is a monstrous doctrine. What does Lord Ellesmere, Lord-Chancellor, with the principal judges, say? For tempus est edax rerum; and records, and letters-patent and other writings are either consumed, or are lost, or are embezzled; and God forbid that ancient grants and deeds should be drawn in question, although that cannot be shewn, which at first was necessary to the perfection of the thing. Lord Hobart, in Slade v. Drape, says, "it is a strange anomaly to be thus differing from all other cases of law, for whereas prescription and antiquity of time justifies all other titles, and supposeth the best beginning the law can give them, in this case it works clean contrary, and this in favorem ecclesiæ, lest laymen should despoil the church." Now admitting this to be the right of the church, and necessary for its protection, however contrary to justice and common sense, on what principle or pretext has the lay impropriator any claim to it? His property in tithes is quite of a different nature, it is not fixed and unalienable. The church has not a complete freehold in its property. The lay impropriator has every power attached to any other species of property. There seems therefore no reason whatever for placing tithes so held on the same footing as those in the hands of the church. In the case of Bury v. Evans, 1735, the court will not presume any grant or purchase of tithes, not even in a case of lay impropriator. Many judges have at different times expressed dissatisfaction at this doctrine. The late Lord Chief-Baron of the Exchequer, in a case Lord Petre v. Blencow, 1799, expressed himself thus:—"These determinations are perhaps to be lamented; I should have liked better to have found in regard to tithes, the same principle of decision which regulates the title to any other fee. If non-payment for any length of time forms no presumption of a grant of tithes; then the length of enjoyment, which in all other cases is the best possible title, seems only to weaken the claim of exemption from tithes, as the difficulty of tracing the origin is increased." Lord Loughborough, in the case of Rose v. Collond, in Chancery, 1800, also expressed his dissatisfaction; and the present Lord Chancellor, in the case of Berney v. Harvey, in 1809, says, "I do not think that I ought now to disturb this doctrine, which has prevailed so long, whatever I might have originally thought of it." In the case of Fenshaw v. Han, in the Exchequer, 1743, Baron Clerk expressed himself on this point as follows: "I know no case that deserves more consideration than this; for though the authorities against such a prescription, (meaning a prescription in non decimando,) are very great, yet the objections to them grow weaker every day. Before the Reformation all tithes were ecclesiastical, and a layman could have them by discharge only, by the grant of parson, patron, and ordinary. Since that time there are many other ways both of having tithes and being discharged from them. Since tithes have been in the hands of lay impropriators, many persons have purchased discharges for their particular lands; yet if these grants are lost in the common fate of things, those persons must lose the benefit of their purchases, and that must often happen though they be enrolled, or any other way taken to preserve them. Very few records relating to the church are now extant, and it would be very hard that time, which strengthens all other rights, should weaken this." I should hope, Sir, so strong a case has been made out for the interference of the legislature, that it will, in the instances of uninterrupted possession of tithes purchased of the lay impropriator, or even against the church, establish it as a good and sufficient title. Against the lay impropriator there cannot be a shadow of argument to justify the withholding it. To this I can scarcely anticipate an objection. From and after the act of Eliz. 1570, agreements were made for conveyances, exchanges, and compositions, sanctioned by decrees of Chancery. All inclosures of wastes, drainages, &c. were carried into effect by this mode, and held valid till the decision by Lord Northington, 1765, in the case of the Attorney-general and Blow v. Chomley, when they were declared invalid. In the space of 196 years, many such agreements were made and carried into effect between rectors and spiritual persons and land-owners, in exchange of lands for other lands, and pecuniary payments upon inclosures and drainages sanctioned by Chancery. These are now liable to be set aside, and in fact many have been so. I instanced last session the case of Dr. Peplow Ward, rector of Cottenham. I am sorry to find the reverend gentleman, whom I believe to be a highly respectable character, was hurt by the statement. Had I found on inquiry into the particulars of the case, that there had been any thing incorrect, I should have felt it as necessary for myself, as in justice to him, to have retracted it. The privilege of parliament, though it protects the members of this house in the freedom of speech, imposes the most scrupulous attention as to the facts they state, as also to their relevancy. I feel myself, therefore, called upon to re-state the case. In 1596, composition was made by articles of agreement, and confirmed by a decree in Chancery, by which lands had been allotted to the rector and his successors for ever, in lieu of tithes of the before-mentioned land, with a view to the drainage and improvement of it. The defendants, who were 32 in number, filed a cross bill, founded on the composition deed, praying that P. Ward, D.D. might be declared not entitled to the tithes he claimed, and if entitled, he might account to them for the profits of the inclosures and inclosed grounds which he held in lieu of tithes, and that he might be decreed to vacate the possession. The court, bound by former decisions, held the composition void, and decreed an account of tithes to the rector and costs. As the composition deed was not stated in the answer, (and if it had, the court might have left him to his remedy, in which he must have recovered as the law stands at present,) the cross bill was dismissed, because the complainants in it could make no title to the land allotted in lieu of tithes. Can a case of more palpable injustice be adduced? The original compact was mutually beneficial. Upwards of a hundred years had passed without any attempt to impeach it. The contract could not be broken without the greatest injustice to the parties, for they could not shew their title to recover back what had been given to the church in lieu of tithes. It is probable when the suit was instituted, the reverend doctor was not aware that the compensation must rest also on his land, and that he had not the power of restoring it beyond the term of his own life; the land must descend to his successors. A case of a similar nature was at issue between the rector of Notting in Lancashire and persons with whom exchanges of certain portions of glebe had been made highly advantageous to the church. Though above 250 years had elapsed, the probability is, the land would have been recovered, and the compensation held that had been given in lieu of it. A remedy without loss of time should be provided against the possibility of such palpable acts of injustice and wrong. It might indeed be stigmatised by a much stronger and harsher epithet. I should propose in all such cases where agreements were set aside, the compensation should be held for the benefit of the poor till the legal owners could be found. To stop such proceedings is for the credit and character of the church. The numerous contentions for tithes of late years have been a serious injury to the church, and afford its enemies a great handle for obloquy and abuse. The last regulation in the bill I should wish to propose, would be to give power to a jury to apportion lands covered by moduses, when the bounds were from changes lost or destroyed. These are the objects it is my wish to provide for. Whilst provision is made to assimilate the law of tithes to that of every other property, injustice will be prevented, and litigation most materially checked. I disclaim all interference with any rights of the church, or asking any thing more than the legislature has thought just and right to establish in the case of the crown—that possession should work for and not against the holders of tithes. The greatest law authorities in all times, have regretted the decisions of the courts of law, and wished they had been otherwise. It seems, therefore, most expedient and wise, that they should be made consistent to the general rules of law. What is unjust to-day, will be more so to-morrow, and continue daily and yearly progressively to become more and more oppressive. I shall conclude, therefore, with moving, that leave be given to bring in a bill for the amendment of the law in respect to tithes."

Sir W. Scott rose, and observed, that during the last session of parliament, some petitions against the tithe laws were presented to the house from the county of Devon. If those petitions had attracted more notice, he was disposed to believe that no grave proceedings would have been instituted upon them. They appeared to be written in the same hand, and were signed by persons of the lowest description in the distant parts of that county. From the uniform tenor of their language, they appeared to have emanated from some Anti-Tithe Board. They declared tithes to be not only injurious to agricultural prosperity, and incompatible with our civil institutions and insular situation, but as preventing the due influence of the principles of the Christian religion. (Hear.) There were also two or three petitions from the county of Essex, and some from the county of Somerset, nearly to the same effect. How the house could attempt to legislate on the question of tithes with a view to an insular situation, he could not conceive. There were, it was true, other petitions on the same subject from Ireland. He was not sufficiently acquainted with the local circumstances, to be enabled to give any particular opinion on them. Some petitioners objected that the clergy had too large a share of property. Respecting this motion, he must say, that it was a most delicate and difficult subject, and the house ought to proceed with scrupulous caution in the examination of a bill which might alter the relations of landed property, and the provision for the church. He did not rise to oppose the introduction of the bill, but he would oppose all haste in such a measure. He particularly and seriously requested the house to exercise great deliberation, before they consented to invade or overturn a system consecrated by centuries, and which had been erected by the ablest, most learned, and virtuous of our lawyers and statesmen. (Hear.) The legislative coparcenary once enjoyed by the clergy, jointly with the houses of parliament, had long been at an end. The power of legislating for themselves had gradually been resigned by that body, or else wrested from their hands by parliament, and he trusted that the house would make a just and generous use of their power in determining fairly upon the interests of a body thus thrown upon it for protection. (Hear.)

Sir Samuel Romilly said, that the bill proposed by his hon. friend, so far from seeking to put an end to tithes, sought to strengthen the system throughout, by adopting more equitable and rational principles. The motion had no relation whatever to the petitions which the right hon. and learned gentleman had adverted to. He might as well have attributed the introduction of the bill to the diffusion of the principles of the Spenceans, or of the Hampden club. The house were told to take very particular care and caution with respect to touching the security of property; but the object of the bill was only to put an end to the inconvenience and anomaly of the present principle of tithe law. In the case of the Crown, an undisputed possession of sixty years put an end to its claims; whilst a tenfold latitude was given to claims on the part of the Church. In fact, to give a title to a modus, which barred all inquiry on the part of the clergy or impropriator, it must be shewn to have had its existence prior to the time of Richard I., a period of 600 years. He stated this, in order to remove the impression which he felt was likely to be made by the grave and solemn warning given by the learned judge of the admiralty, to abstain from intermeddling with rights so sacred and generally recognized as those of the property of the clergy. It was too absurd a proposition to be gravely entertained in that house, that any thing in the tithe system militated against the interests of Christian morality, except in the angry feelings which not unfrequently were the consequence of feuds and contentions between pastors and their flocks, upon the subjects of litigation respecting tithe cases. By the present system, the older a man's claim to a right of modus or composition, the weaker it was—contrary to the general and well known principle of law in all other cases. Two centuries and a half had expired since the disabling statute of Elizabeth, which followed about thirty years after the dissolution of the monasteries by her father. Lay impropriators still continued capable of alienating, until the decision in the case of the corporation of Berwick disturbed the foundations of the law as it had previously stood; of which decision he could only say, he knew not whether most to reprobate its folly or its dangerous consequences, as its direct tendency was to protect lay impropriators, as if they had been ecclesiastics. There were some parts of the bill, as he understood it, of which he did not altogether approve; but its object generally would tend to prevent injurious effects even in respect to the influence of Christianity, by preventing quarrels and animosities.

Mr. Lockhart conceived there could be no reasonable objection to legislate upon this subject, which had so often been the subject of legislation before. Lay impropriators and parishioners were as justly entitled to protection as to their rights, as the clergy themselves. It was the duty of the house to uphold all rights and properties, and the bill went merely to make regulations on a subject of property, to which other species of property was liable. In his opinion, it was a most beneficial measure, as it would tend to diminish that litigation which had always been most injurious to the interests of the church.

Mr. Peel defended the learned judge, his right hon. friend, from the imputation of opposing the discussion of this question. All that his right hon. friend contended for, in which he (Mr. Peel) perfectly acquiesced, was, that the house ought not to accede to a proposition, subverting the usage of so many centuries, without due consideration. It would not be difficult to shew, that, however they might in appearance be founded on equality, the application of the same principle of prescription to tithes as to other property would be unjust. In his opinion, the adoption of the measure would be calculated to increase, rather than to diminish litigation, unless the clergy were fully disposed to acquiesce in it.

Mr. Smyth said, he would not oppose the introduction of the bill, but he apprehended that it would be attended with injurious consequences. He thought there were some difficulties on the subject, which it might be impossible to overcome: but he would reserve his objections for a future opportunity.

Lord Castlereagh was of opinion, that on a subject of so much importance, the legislature ought to proceed with the utmost caution. This was the opinion of his right hon. friend, who had by no means expressed any wish to bar a discussion of the question. The property of the church was as ancient and as well-founded as property of any other description, and any step which seemed to have a tendency to invade it, ought to be taken with the greatest deliberation.

Mr. Brougham said, he had listened to the right hon. gentleman opposite with all the attention which the profound respect that he entertained for him claimed, and he must say, that he thought with his hon. and learned friend near him, that although the right hon. gentleman did not oppose the bringing in of the bill, he intended it to go forth to the country that it was a bill trenching on the property of the church, and should be therefore viewed with peculiar suspicion. The state of the law relative to tithes was avowedly defective. Suppose the following case: the parishioners, at some remote period of time, make a composition with the incumbent of the parish, in lieu of tithes; to effect which they agree to give up a certain portion of their land, to hold the rest tithe free, or grant the then parson a sum of money in lieu of tithe. Ages subsequently, the clergyman of the parish finding that of common right he is entitled to tithe, puts the party or parties upon proof of their right, by commencing a suit against the parishioner or parishioners, who find themselves unable to produce that instrument, upon the faith of whose existence they and their ancestors have successfully challenged this exemption for centuries; and which old piece of parchment they must produce legible and entire. Such was the determination of that celebrated and well-known case at Oxford. But the worst of all is, that after the suit is determined against those contending for the composition, and they agree to pay tithe, they naturally enough demand back again the land or the money which was paid for the exemption by their ancestors; when the church turns round upon the demandant, and says, "No, no, you cannot have back your land or money; how can you prove the fact of its having been given for this consideration?" The natural consequence of this maxim, "nullum tempus occurrit ecclesiæ," is, that the parishioner is compelled to pay the tithe, and cannot get back his land or money. (Hear.) Under these circumstances, no man would contend that the law required no revision or correction, and he, for one, should vote that leave be given to bring in the bill.

Mr. Curwen shortly replied, disclaiming all wish for precipitation, and remonstrating against the comparison made by the right hon. gentleman of the bill to certain petitions, to which it had no resemblance; a comparison, (he said) calculated to create the most unfounded prejudices against the measure.

The question was then put from the chair, and the bill was ordered to be brought in by Mr. Curwen, Sir Samuel Romilly, and Mr. Brougham.

Friday, Feb. 20.

SECRET COMMITTEE.] About one o'clock Lord Sidmouth came down to the house: the counsel, who were at the bar on an appeal case, being ordered to withdraw, his lordship laid on the table, by command of the Prince Regent, a green bag, containing further papers relative to the state of the country. On the motion of the noble viscount, this bag (which was larger than either of the two previously brought down) was ordered to be referred to the secret committee.

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL.] The thirty millions exchequer bills bill, was read a third time, and passed.

MALT, &c. DUTIES BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

ORDERS FOR PAPERS.] The Lord Chancellor, in reference to the account respecting places in reversion, which had been alluded to yesterday by a noble earl not now in his place (Earl Grosvenor), said, that on searching the journals, the manner in which the former order had been executed, which had produced an account of places in reversion, appeared. Here his lordship read from the journals, an entry, stating, that in March, 1808, an account of all offices had been ordered, and that a return had been made. A subsequent order had been made in May of the same year, which also produced a return. It appeared from these returns that the orders had been served on the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who was at that time Lord Hawkesbury: and that on receiving the order, the Secretary of State had required all inferior departments and offices to make returns. In this way the account appeared to have been made up.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 20.

CIVIL LIST.] An account was presented (by command) shewing how the sums of 200,000*l.* and 300,000*l.* making together 500,000*l.* voted in the last session of parliament, to enable his Majesty to provide for such expenses of a civil nature as do not form a part of the ordinary charges of the civil list, have been applied, to the 3d of February, 1818.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

CORN.] An account was presented, (pursuant to an order of the 17th instant) of the average price of wheat, barley, and oats.—Ordered to lie on the table.—(See the Appendix.)

SALT DUTIES.] Mr. Canning presented a petition of the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of Liverpool, for the repeal of the duties on salt.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It set forth, "that the petitioners have been informed that the consideration of the duties on salt will speedily be brought before the house, and they humbly conceive that the agriculture, manufactories, fisheries, trade, commerce, and prosperity of the United Kingdom would be greatly benefited if these duties were repealed; and praying that the existing duties upon salt may be repealed accordingly."

LEATHER TAX.] Mr. Lygon presented a petition of tanners and leather factors of Worcester, against the leather tax. A similar petition was received of tanners and leather dealers of Reading.

Mr. Brougham presented a petition of tanners and leather factors of Winchelsea.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It set forth, "that the double tax upon leather has proved injurious to the leather trade of this kingdom, by greatly preventing the manufacturing of continental and South American hides, and by operating in a very considerable degree as a prohibition to the tanning of one-fourth part of English hides, has very much reduced the value of tan yards and other fixed capitals of the tanners, has ruined many engaged in the tanning trade, has advanced the price of the coarser sort of shoes and other leather articles so much, as greatly to lessen their consumption by the labouring classes of society, and has thrown many thousands of artificers out of employment; that the tax was originally carried by a majority of eight members only, and is not productive as a measure of finance; that the revenue from leather, which was never doubled by the double tax, has annually diminished ever since the first year it was imposed, as appears by the official accounts laid before parliament, which shew the revenue in the year ending the 5th of January, 1814, to have amounted to 708,891*l.* 12*s.* 3½*d.* and in the year ending 5th January, 1817, to have amounted to only 565,343*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* and it is presumed when the official accounts of the produce of the tax, and of the import duties upon raw hides of the last year are laid before parliament, they will shew still further the necessity of repealing the additional duty; that the leather trade has been thus decreasing, while the revenue from the other manufactures has improved and indicated their prosperity, and when, from the facility of procuring South American hides by our more intimate connection with that country, a great increase of our leather manufactures (notwithstanding the consumption of the late war) might reasonably have been expected; the petitioners therefore most humbly pray, that the house will again take the nature and operation of this tax into their serious consideration, which, as a revenue, is insignificant, compared with the many evils it brings upon the country, and that the house will remove a burthen destructive to one of the oldest and most important staple manufactures of the country, as it respects the landed, agricultural, commercial, as well as manufacturing interests of Great Britain."

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS' REGULATION BILL.] A petition was presented of master chimney sweepers, and householders of London and Westminster, against this bill.—Ordered to lie on the table.

A petition was received of inhabitants of Sunderland, in favour of the bill.

On the motion of Mr. Bennet, the bill was then read a third time, and passed.

ELECTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of this bill, when, after some conversation between General Thornton, Mr. Wynn, and Sir William Burroughs, the amendments of the committee were agreed to, on an understanding that the main discussion would take place on the third reading.

Mr. John Smith brought up a clause, to provide, that in case of questions arising as to the right of a voter, the polling should not be delayed or obstructed, but that the returning officer should adjourn to another booth, to examine the vote.—The clause was read a first and second time, and ordered to stand part of the bill.

Sir W. Burroughs thought it necessary to guard by a specific provision, against any abuse which might arise from the clause enforcing a poll of 400 persons on the second day. An apparent majority, in defiance of the great body of electors, might thus be obtained. The object of the clause which he proposed was, in place of a poll of 400 voters, to adopt votes tendered to that amount.

On the question for bringing up the clause, Mr. Wynn said, he thought that the hon. member was not entirely aware of what had been the state of the law on this subject, and the nature of the alterations made in it. It had been possible for the returning officer to put off the decision on votes till after the termination of the poll. This opened a door to wrong practices. There was no necessity for changes in some places, as in London, where 8,000 were polled in seven days, and at Norwich 3,000 had been polled in a day, and in Westminster from 15 to 17,000 had been polled within the proper time. A bonâ fide candidate would not be prevented from keeping up a poll. He would not enter into the question as to the practices of voting in Ireland. In England he considered, constitutionally, that the voters came up and tendered their votes. He had heard certainly of a fatal occasion in Wexford, in Ireland, where there was a question about striking off the votes of persons who had come up to vote without the consent of their landlords. (Hear, hear.) In England he considered that the voters brought up the candidates.

Lord Palmerston saw some force in what fell from the hon. baronet; but the objections started to it were to him satisfactory. The apprehension was that a fraud might be committed by a returning officer on a candidate, by going on to make objections, so as to prevent the due reception of votes. He thought some arrangement might be made, which might tend to obviate objections as to the danger of fictitious votes. Might not the returning officer be empowered to consider the votes objected to each day, and to determine at a given hour on the day succeeding; and if a number of good votes, exceeding 400, were found, that then the poll should continue?

The clause was put and negatived without a division.

Mr. Lamb observed, that his objections to the principal provisions of the bill remained in full force, and he trusted that they would receive mature consideration before it finally passed into a law.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time on Monday the 2d of March, and to be printed as amended.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 23.

EXCHEQUER BILLS BILL—MALT, &c. DUTIES BILL.] The royal assent was given by commission to these bills. The commissioners were, the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Winchester, and the Earl of Shaftesbury.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION ACT.] Lord Holland presented a petition of the lord mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, praying for an immediate, impartial and rigid inquiry into the conduct of ministers, in the exercise of the powers entrusted to them under the suspension of the habeas corpus act.—Ordered to lie upon the table.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.] The Duke of Montrose brought up the report of the secret committee, appointed to examine into the matter of the several papers, sealed up, presented to the house by command of the Prince Regent.—It was read by the reading clerk, at the table, as follows:—

"By the lords committees appointed a secret committee to examine into the matter of the papers presented to this house, in a sealed bag, by the command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and to report to the house as they shall see cause: And to whom were referred additional papers (sealed up,) also presented to the house by the command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent:

Ordered to report,

That the committee have proceeded to examine the papers so referred to them.

In execution of this duty they have proceeded, in the first place, to consider such of the said papers as contained information as to the state of those parts of England in which the circumstances detailed in the two reports of the former committees appear to have arisen.

In the last of those reports, presented to the house on the 12th of June last, it was represented that the period of a general rising, of which the intention and object were stated in the reports, appeared to have been fixed for as early a day as possible after the discussion of an expected motion for reform in parliament; that Nottingham appeared to have been intended as the head-quarters, upon which a part of the insurgents were to march in the first instance; and that they expected to be joined there, and on their march towards London, by other bodies, with such arms as they might have already provided, or might procure by force from private houses, or from the different depôts or barracks, of which the attack was proposed. That concurrent information, from many quarters, confirmed the expectation of a general rising about the time above mentioned, but that it was subsequently postponed to the 9th or 10th of June, for which various reasons had been assigned. The report added, that the latest intelligence from those quarters had made it highly probable that the same causes which had to that time thwarted the execution of those desperate designs, viz. the vigilance of the government, the great activity and intelligence of the magistrates, the ready assistance afforded under their orders by the regular troops and yeomanry, the prompt and efficient arrangements of the officers intrusted with that service, the knowledge which had from time to time been obtained of the plans of the disaffected, and the consequent arrest and confinement of the leading agitators, would occasion a still further postponement of their atrocious plans.

It now appears that in the night of the 9th of June last, a rising took place in Derbyshire, headed by a person who went for that purpose from Nottingham, and was therefore called "the Nottingham Captain." The insurgents were not formidable for their numbers, but they were actuated by an atrocious spirit. Several of them had fire-arms; others had pikes previously prepared for the purpose; and as they advanced towards Nottingham they plundered several houses of arms, and in one instance a murder was committed. They compelled some persons to join them, and endeavoured to compel others by threats of violence, and particularly by the terror of the murder which had been committed; and they proposed to reach Nottingham early in the morning of the 10th of June, and to surprise the military in their barracks; hoping thus to become masters of the town, and to be joined by considerable numbers there, and by a party which they expected would be assembled in Nottingham forest, and which actually did assemble at that place, as after stated. The disposition to plunder, the resistanee they met with, and other circumstances, so delayed their march, that they had not arrived near their place of destination at a late hour in the morning; and the country being alarmed, a military force was assembled to oppose them.

The language used by many persons engaged in this enterprise, and particularly by their leaders, leaves no room to doubt that their objects were the overthrow of the established government and laws; extravagant as those objects were, when compared with the inadequate means which they possessed. In the course of their march, many of their body felt alarmed at the atrocious projects in which they had engaged, which had actually led to a cruel and deliberate murder; they found that their confederates had not arrived to their support, as they had been led to expect; and in the villages through which they passed, a strong indisposition being manifested towards their cause and projects, some of them threw away their pikes and retired, before the military force appeared; and on the first show of that force the rest dispersed, their leaders attempting in vain to rally them: many were taken prisoners, and many guns and pikes were seized.

This insurrection, of small importance in itself, is a subject of material consideration, as it was manifestly in consequence of measures detailed in the two reports above mentioned, and appears to have been a part of the general rising proposed to take effect on the 9th or 10th of June, as stated in the last of those reports.

At the assizes at Derby, in the month of July following, the grand jury found bills of indictment for high treason against forty-six of the persons charged with having been engaged in this insurrection; and several of those persons having been taken, were arraigned upon the indictment before a special commission issued for that purpose, which sat at Derby in the month of October following. Four of the principal offenders were separately tried and convicted; three of them were executed; and the capital punishment of the fourth was remitted, on condition of transportation. The conviction of these four induced nineteen of the other persons indicted, whose conduct had been deemed in the next degree most criminal, to withdraw their pleas of Not Guilty, and to plead Guilty to the indictment, in hopes of thus avoiding a capital punishment; and the sentence of death on these persons, was afterwards remitted, on different conditions. Against all the other persons indicted, who were in custody, the law officers of the crown declined producing any evidence, and they were accordingly acquitted. The rest of the persons included in the indictment, had fled from justice, and have not yet been taken.

The fact of this actual insurrection first proved to the satisfaction of a most respectable grand jury of the county of Derby, who found the bill of indictment, and afterwards proved in open court, to the satisfaction of the several juries, sworn on the four several trials of the persons convicted; proved also, by the acknowledgment of the same guilt by those who withdrew their pleas of Not Guilty, and pleaded Guilty to the same indictment, and thus submitted themselves to the mercy of the crown, appear to the committee to have established, beyond the possibility of a doubt, the credit due to the information mentioned in the last report, respecting the plans of more extended insurrection, which had previously been concerted, and respecting the postponement of these plans to the 9th or 10th of June.

But this insurrection in Derbyshire was not the only circumstance occurring since the period described in the last of the two reports before mentioned, which demonstrates the correctness of the information on which the committee who made that report proceeded, in representing such a general rising to have been intended, and to have been postponed; and that Nottingham was the head-quarters upon which a part of the insurgents were to march in the first instance; and that they were expected to be joined there by insurgents from different quarters.

Early in the same night on which the Derbyshire insurgents began their operations, the town of Nottingham was in a state of considerable agitation. It appears from the evidence given upon the trials at Derby, that during the march of the Derbyshire insurgents towards Nottingham, one of their leaders, afterwards convicted of high treason, was sent forwards on horseback, to obtain intelligence. On his return to the main body of the Derbyshire insurgents, it was pretended that the state of Nottingham was favourable to their designs; the actual state of Nottingham and its neighbourhood, appears from the evidence given on the trials at Derby. In the night of the 9th of June, some persons, stated to be in number about one hundred, had assembled on the race course in Nottingham forest, where the Derbyshire insurgents, according to their original plan, were to have arrived at an early hour on the morning of the 10th, and expected to be joined by such a party. This party was seen about twelve at night; they were drawn up in a line, two deep, and a part of them were armed with pikes or poles. They remained assembled on the race ground until past two o'clock in the morning, about which time they dispersed. Some appearances of disturbance in the town of Nottingham early in the night of the 9th, induced the magistrates to send for a military force from the barracks; and order being quickly restored, the military returned to their barracks, and were not again called out, until the morning of the 10th, when they were required to assist in dispersing the Derbyshire insurgents, who were then on their march.

Connected with these disturbances in Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, a disposition to similar conduct was manifested in a part of the West Riding of Yorkshire. On the 6th of June a meeting of delegates was assembled at a place called Thornhill Lees, near Huddersfield; and at this meeting it was understood, that the time to be fixed for a general rising would be announced. The persons assembled at that meeting were surprised by the magistrates, assisted by a military force, and some were taken into custody. This arrest deranged the plans of the disaffected; and the greater part of the districts in that part of Yorkshire, in which a general rising had been proposed, remained quiet. But in the neighbourhood of Huddersfield, in the night of the 8th of June, a considerable body assembled, some with fire-arms, and others with scythes fixed on poles, and proceeded to various outrages, plundering houses for arms, and firing on the head constable of Huddersfield, and upon a person of the yeomanry cavalry, who went out of the town to learn their objects. Indictments were preferred both for the felonies and the burglaries at the assizes at York in the month of July. The facts of the outrages there committed appear to have been established by the finding of the bills by the grand jury; but sufficient evidence was not produced on the trial to bring the crimes home to any individuals.

From the evidence given at the trials at Derby, it appeared that the Derbyshire insurgents had expected a considerable reinforcement from this part of Yorkshire, believing that a general rising would take place at the time to be fixed for that purpose; and it appears likewise, that in Yorkshire, as well as in all the other districts where these designs were carrying on, great reliance has uniformly been placed upon the hope of powerful support and co-operation from London, however erroneous such an expectation may have been, with respect to the extent to which it was supposed to have existed.

The committee have the satisfaction of delivering it as their decided opinion, that not only in the country in general, but in those districts where the designs of the disaffected were most actively and unremittingly pursued, the great body of the people have remained untainted, even during the periods of the greatest internal difficulty and distress.

The arrests and trials which have taken place, and the development of the designs of the leaders of the disaffected, together with the continued activity and vigilance of the magistrates and of the government, must have had the salutary effect of checking the progress of disaffection, where it existed; and the improved state of the country, and the increased employment now afforded to the labouring classes, have contributed to render those who were most open to seduction, less disposed to embrace the desperate measures which the pressure of distress might have led them to hazard.

Some of the persons engaged in these projects, particularly in London, are still active, and appear determined to persevere, though with decreasing numbers and resources. It appears, therefore, to the committee, that the continued vigilance of government, and of the magistrates in the several districts which have been most disturbed, will be necessary.

Having thus taken a view of the state of the country in the disturbed districts, from the period described in the report made to the house towards the close of the last session of parliament, the committee have proceeded to examine such of the papers referred to them, as relate to the arrests of several persons under warrants issued by one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, and the detention of several of the persons so arrested under the authority of two acts passed in the last session of parliament, to empower his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty shall suspect are conspiring against his person and government.

With respect to those, against whom bills of indictment were found by different grand juries, and those who have been brought to trial or have fled from justice, the committee conceive that it is unnecessary for them to make any particular statement. Warrants were issued by the secretary of state against ten persons, who have not been taken. Forty-four persons appear to have been arrested under warrants of the secretary of state, on suspicion of high treason, who have not been brought to trial; of these, seven were discharged on examination, without any subsequent warrant of detention. Against thirty-seven, warrants of detention, on suspicion of high treason, were issued by the secretary of state; but one, who was finally committed, was soon after released; another was soon discharged on account of illness; and a third died in prison. The grounds upon which those warrants were issued, have been severally examined by the committee; on that examination it has appeared to the committee, that all these arrests and detentions have been fully justified, by the various circumstances under which they have taken place; and in no case does any warrant of detention appear to have been issued, except in consequence of information upon oath.

It appears to the committee, that all the persons who were so arrested and detained, and who were not prosecuted, have been at different times discharged, as the state of the country, and the circumstances attending the several trials which had taken place, were judged to permit.

The committee understand that, up to a certain period, expectations were entertained of being able to bring to trial a large proportion of the persons so arrested and detained; but that these expectations have from time to time been unavoidably relinquished.

On the whole therefore, it has appeared to the committee, that the government, in the execution of the powers vested in it, by the two acts before mentioned, has acted with due discretion and moderation; and as far as appears to the committee, the magistrates in the several disturbed districts have, by their activity and vigilance, contributed materially to the preservation of the public peace."

On the motion of the Duke of Montrose, the report was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Earl Grosvenor observed, that this report afforded no new information to the house. It was little more than a transcript of what had been stated by the former committees, and what had passed on the trials at Derby. There was nothing like any proof that the state of the country required such measures as had been adopted on the recommendation of ministers. He was not now disposed to enter into a consideration of the report, but he must express his regret that the habeas corpus act had been suspended on such slender evidence. Their lordships had now a view of all the mighty danger through which they had passed; but to enable the house to judge of the conduct of ministers, it would be necessary that other evidence should be laid on the table.

The Earl of Lauderdale thought, as so much of this report referred to those of last session, it would be proper for their lordships to have those reports before them. He therefore moved that the two reports presented to the house by the secret committees of last session be printed. Ordered.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] The Earl of Carnarvon presented a petition of merchants, manufacturers, and others, inhabitants of the towns of Manchester, Salford, and the neighbourhood, in the same terms as the petition presented by Mr. Philips to the House of Commons on the 9th instant. (See page 194.) Ordered to lie on the table.

The noble earl then presented a petition of William Ogden, similar to that presented by Mr. Bennet to the House of Commons on the 13th instant. (See page 382.)

He next presented a petition of James Sellers, late a prisoner in Reading gaol. It stated, that the petitioner had not committed any unconstitutional act, and that he was ready to meet any charge that might be brought against him. That on the 4th of December 1817, he was discharged on his own recognizance, and was now in a most wretched state; the little which he and his wife procured to subsist upon being from the nearly exhausted bounty of a few friends. That he had followed the business of a cutler in Manchester, on his own account, for twelve years last past; but, in consequence of being arrested under the suspension act, he had lost both his tools and his business. He therefore prayed their lordships to take his case into consideration.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SLAVE TRADE.] Lord Holland adverted to an address of the house to the throne, praying that the colonial assemblies in the West Indies might be urged to adopt such measures as might be most effectual for preventing any traffic in slaves, and wished to be informed, whether ministers meant to bring the subject under consideration, by presenting the acts of the colonial legislatures relating to this subject? He did not ask this in any hostility to ministers, who, he had no doubt, had done all in their power to urge the colonial assemblies to adopt the requisite measures; nor did he doubt the disposition of the latter. He knew, indeed, that in Jamaica measures to the effect desired had been adopted under the auspices of the noble duke, (the Duke of Manchester) who presided there as governor, and whose conduct in that station was equally honourable to the government here and advantageous to the interests of the island.

Earl Bathurst said, that the whole of the colonial acts upon this subject had not been received; and ministers had thought it most advisable not to bring the matter under consideration till they had all come to hand.

BILL OF INDEMNITY.] The Earl of Liverpool, in moving that the house do adjourn, stated, that, on Wednesday, a noble friend of his would move for leave to bring in a bill founded on the report just presented to the house, and that the second reading would be moved on Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, Feb. 23.

On a message to attend the Lords Commissioners, the House went; and being returned, Mr. Speaker reported the Royal assent to the Exchequer Bills Bill, and the Malt, &c. Duties Bill.

LEATHER TAX.] A petition was presented of tanners, curriers, and others, of Berwick upon Tweed; also, of the city of Chester, against this tax.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Curwen presented a petition of tanners and leather factors of the towns of Cockermouth, Whitehaven, Egremont, Workington, Maryport, and Keswick, against the tax.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

It set forth the same allegations and prayer as the petition of the tanners and leather factors of the ancient town of Winchelsea, and its vicinity, which was presented to the house upon Friday last.

Mr. Bennet presented a petition of the tanners, curriers, and others, of Shrewsbury, against the tax.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

It set forth the same allegations and prayer as the petition of the tanners and leather factors of the ancient town of Winchelsea, and its vicinity, which was presented to the house upon Friday last.

TITHES LAW AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. Curwen brought in his bill "for the Amendment of the Law in respect to Tithes." Read a first time, and ordered to be printed.—It was as follows:

Whereas all pleas and the cognizance of all pleas of prescriptions, customs, and manners of tithing, from time immemorial, have been matters merely triable and determinable by the common law; and in all such cases, the courts of common law have prohibited the ecclesiastical courts from trying and determining such pleas, and have put them in a course of trial by jury; and also real compositions and exemptions and discharges from tithes, being of the same nature, are properly triable and determinable in like manner:

And whereas suits in equity are instituted for account of tithes, in which such prescriptions, customs and manners of tithing, compositions real, and exemptions and discharges, incidentally come in question, and sometimes bills are filed for establishing them:

And whereas by the course and practice of courts of equity, a rector, upon his prayer, is always allowed to have an issue, to try by jury any prescription, custom or manner of tithing, composition real, or exemption or discharge, upon praying the same; when, on the contrary, the person or persons defending under such prescription, custom, manner of tithing, composition real, or exemption or discharge, is not allowed to have such issue, but by the special grace and favour of the court:

And whereas it would be more consistent with the true principles of the constitution, as well as with the rules of impartial justice, if both parties had the same right or privilege of trial by jury in such cases, and more especially as in such cases there are, and ever must be, many local circumstances and considerations necessary to be inquired into, which the judges cannot judicially take notice or have knowledge of, which cannot be satisfactorily investigated by written depositions, and also causes would thereby be much expedited in many cases;

Be it therefore enacted, That from henceforth it shall and may be lawful to and for any one or more plaintiff or plaintiffs, defendant or defendants, in any suit in equity in which any prescription, custom, manner of tithing, composition real, or exemption or discharge, shall come in question, to pray an issue or issues to try the same, and the court is hereby authorized and required to grant the same; provided that such prayer shall be made at the time of hearing such cause, and before the hearing thereof, and an affidavit that such prayer is not made for the purpose of delay, duly sworn, be produced to the court; and provided that in the opinion of the court, such prescription, custom, manner of tithing, composition real, exemption or discharge, if proved in fact, would be good in law, otherwise the court shall and may proceed to a hearing and decree in the cause as heretofore, without directing any issue, unless the court in its discretion shall think fit so to do; and where issues are so prayed and granted, and the plaintiff or plaintiffs therein shall not proceed to try the same within the time allowed by the court for that purpose, then the court may proceed as if no such issues had been prayed and granted.

And whereas divers compositions real have been made by the parson, with the consent and confirmation of the patron and ordinary, before the thirteenth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the deeds or instruments of which cannot be produced, having been destroyed or lost by time and accident, nor can any evidence be produced to shew that such deeds and instruments had been executed, otherwise than as may be presumed from long usage and enjoyment: And whereas it is of dangerous consequence to the subjects, if, by the loss of deeds or instruments which cannot be for ever preserved, they should lose their rights; Be it therefore enacted, that from henceforth it shall and may be lawful for any defendant or defendants in a suit for tithes, either in law or equity, whose defence arises upon a real composition, to plead or allege generally that a composition real was duly made before the thirteenth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the deeds or instruments of which, by time and accident, have been lost or destroyed, setting forth what the composition is; and such defendant or defendants shall not be required to state or produce such deeds or instruments, or give any evidence to shew such deeds or instruments were executed; but it shall be tried and determined in the same manner, and by the same rules of evidence and presumption, as are applicable to immemorial modusses, save as to the circumstances of time by which one differs from the other; and upon bills to establish compositions real, the same course shall be observed.

And whereas divers manors, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, which heretofore belonged to and were parcel of the possessions of the monasteries, abbies, priories, and other religious houses, heretofore dissolved or suppressed, relinquished or given up, in the reign of King Henry the Eighth, and which came to the crown upon such dissolutions, suppressions, relinquishments or givings up, and were by the crown sold and granted away, are, under and by virtue of the statutes in that behalf, entitled to be held by the owners and occupiers thereof, discharged and acquitted of the payment of tithes, as freely and in as large and ample manner as the abbots, priors, and other religious persons or bodies had held, occupied, possessed, used, retained or enjoyed the same, at the days of such their dissolutions, suppressions, relinquishments, or givings up: And whereas by the loss and destruction of deeds and muniments, which have happened in the long lapse of time since the said dissolutions, suppressions, relinquishments, and givings up of such monasteries, abbies, priories, and religious houses, it is in all cases very difficult, and in many impossible to deduce a regular title to such discharges and exemptions from payment of tithes, or to shew that such manors, lands, tenements or hereditaments, claimed to be so discharged and acquitted, were part of the possessions of such monasteries, abbies, priories or religious houses, at the respective times of their dissolutions, suppressions, relinquishments, or givings up, and the difficulty is still likely to increase in further progress of time; in consequence whereof such discharges and exemptions are likely to be lost, and the clergy to acquire tithes, which never at any period belonged to the church, unless a remedy be provided against the same; Be it therefore enacted, that upon every claim or defence, in any court of law or equity, of any such discharge or exemption from payment of tithes, if it be made appear to the court or jury, in proof, that such discharges or exemptions so claimed, have, as far back as living memory can go, been enjoyed, and been reputed to be lawfully enjoyed, and there is no sufficient proof in the judgment of such court or jury, to invalidate the same, it shall be deemed sufficient proof of such discharges or exemptions, although no deeds or muniments be produced to prove the same, or to shew that the manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in respect of which such discharges or exemptions are claimed, were parcel of such possessions at the respective times in that behalf aforesaid.

And whereas divers rectories had been appropriated and belonged to monasteries, abbies, priories, and other religious houses, at the respective times of their dissolution, suppression, relinquishment and giving up, and which at those times came to the crown, and were alienated by the crown, and are now in the hands of laymen deriving title from the crown, called lay impropriators: and whereas by the laws and statutes of this realm, such lay rectors or impropriate rectors always, since the said impropriate rectories came into lay hands, have had the same power of alienation, disposition and conveyance of such rectories, or any part thereof, or any tithes or emoluments belonging to the same, as over any other lands, tenements or hereditaments: And whereas many persons, owners of lands, tenements or hereditaments, have, in order to free such lands, tenements or hereditaments from the payment of tithes, purchased of such lay rectors, and had granted and conveyed to them, the tithes or discharges from tithes of their own lands, tenements or hereditaments, but by time and accident the deeds, conveyances and assurances by which such tithes or discharges were so granted or conveyed, are destroyed or lost, by which they are disabled from making a title to such tithes, in consequence whereof many owners and occupiers are in great danger, and will be more so in progress of time, of losing the tithes or discharges which they or those under whom they claim have lawfully purchased; For remedy whereof, Be it enacted, that from henceforth where any right or title to tithes or discharges from payment of tithes shall be claimed or set up against any lay impropriator or impropriators, it shall be sufficient to allege in general, that by grant heretofore duly made, which by time and accident is lost or destroyed and cannot be produced, such tithes or discharges were duly granted to some former owner or owners of such lands, tenements or hereditaments; and if it shall be made appear to the court or jury, in proof, that such tithes or discharges have, as far back as living memory goes, been held, retained or enjoyed, and there is no sufficient proof, in the judgment of such court or jury, to invalidate the same, the court or jury shall presume that such tithes or discharges have been theretofore duly granted, by some owner or owners of the impropriate rectory of some owner or owners of the lands, tenements and hereditaments, in respect of which such tithes or discharges are claimed, although no deeds or instruments of such grant or discharge be produced or proved to have been executed.

And whereas, between the thirteenth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth and the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, divers conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements, have been made, for effecting inclosures and drainages and other purposes, whereby lands and tenements, as well as pecuniary payments and other compensations, have been allotted, conveyed, exchanged and assigned, to rectors, vicars and other ecclesiastical bodies and persons, and their successors for ever, in lieu of lands, tithes, common rights, and other rights, divers arrangements and regulations have been made with respect thereto, upon the faith and credit of which, and upon supposition that they were binding, not only against the parties to them, but against the successors of such parsons, vicars, ecclesiastical bodies and persons, divers inclosures and drainages of commons, common fields, waste lands, fens and marshes, and divers exchanges have taken place and been effected, to the great benefit and advantage of the kingdom in general, as well as to the rectors, vicars, and other ecclesiastical bodies and persons entering into such conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements, at the time of entering into them, and to their successors for very long times afterwards; but by a decision in the court of chancery, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-five, and other subsequent decisions, such conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements, have been held to be invalid, and in consequence thereof, divers rectors, vicars, and ecclesiastical bodies and persons, notwithstanding such conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements, so carried into effect, have, by filing bills in equity and otherwise, succeeded in recovering tithes in kind, and lands and tenements, and avoiding such conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements, and have also retained and kept lands and tenements allotted, conveyed or exchanged in lieu of tithes, and other lands and tenements, as from length of time, the owners thereof cannot be discovered; which proceedings create great confusion in landed property, and are highly unconscionable and unjust; For remedy whereof, Be it enacted, that all such conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements, so as aforesaid made prior to the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, which have been carried into effect and execution, shall be deemed and taken to be valid and binding, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, unless it can be proved to the court or jury before whom such conveyances, exchanges, compositions or agreements are brought into question, that they were originally fraudulently obtained, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that if any such conveyances, exchanges, compositions or agreements shall be set aside on the grounds aforesaid, not only the pecuniary payments and compositions in lieu of tithes shall cease, but any lands, tenements or hereditaments, assigned, conveyed or allotted in lieu thereof, or received in exchange as aforesaid, shall be restored to the true owner or owners thereof, if such owner or owners can be discovered, and shall prefer his, her or their petition in a court of equity, for the restoration of such lands, tenements or hereditaments, within after such conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements shall be so set aside as aforesaid; and until such petition be preferred, and notice thereof duly served, such lands, tenements and hereditaments shall be and become vested in the overseer or overseers of the poor for the time being, of the parish, township or place wherein such lands, tenements and hereditaments are situate, for the use and benefit of the poor of such parish, township or place, and the rents, issues and profits thereof from time to time shall be applied and disposed of accordingly, by such overseer or overseers; and if no such petition be preferred, and notice thereof duly served within as aforesaid, then such lands, tenements and hereditaments shall be for ever vested in such overseer or overseers for the time being, for the use and benefit of the poor as aforesaid; and no overseer or overseers shall be answerable to any owner or owners, of any mesne rents, issues or profits of such lands or tenements received by him, her or them for the use of the poor, prior to the service of notice of such petition being preferred as aforesaid.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the court, upon a summary petition, either by the overseer or overseers of the poor, or any person or persons claiming the said lands, tenements and hereditaments, to order such lands, tenements and hereditaments to be given up to such overseer or overseers, or persons claiming and proving to such court their title to the same respectively, as the case may require; and in case any difficulty should occur in ascertaining the boundaries or situations of such lands, tenements or hereditaments, the court shall issue commissions for ascertaining and setting out the same, or assigning an equivalent in lieu thereof in other lands, tenements and hereditaments, belonging to the rectory, parsonage, vicarage, or other ecclesiastical benefice, or ecclesiastical bodies or persons, to which or whom such before-mentioned lands, tenements or hereditaments had been assigned, allotted, conveyed or exchanged.

Provided always, and be it enacted, that no rector, parson, vicar or ecclesiastical body or person, when such conveyances, exchanges, compositions and agreements shall be set aside as aforesaid, shall recover or be entitled to an account or compensation for tithes in kind, or rents, issues and profits of lands, but from the time of his having given up the lands, tenements, hereditaments and pecuniary payments and compensation, allotted, conveyed, exchanged or assigned in lieu of such tithes or lands.

And whereas it frequently happens, by the different inclosures, alterations and arrangement of land which have taken and must take place, that the precise limits or boundaries of lands covered by pecuniary or other moduses or compositions cannot be precisely ascertained, whereby such moduses and compositions are in danger of being lost; for remedy whereof, be it enacted, that where pecuniary or other moduses or compositions are found to exist, and it shall be doubtful what lands are covered thereby, the court before which they shall come in question, shall not on that account determine such moduses or compositions to be void, but shall issue commissions to ascertain the lands covered thereby, or set out other lands of the same owner sufficient to secure the same; and in all cases where there are pecuniary payments by way of modus or composition, the rector, parson, vicar or other person entitled to the same, shall have remedy for the same, by distress and sale, upon the lands charged with such moduses or compositions or any part thereof, as in cases of rent reserved upon demises or leases of land.

Provided always, and be it enacted, that where issues shall be prayed or directed by the court, for the trial of any moduses, compositions or exemptions, which are informally pleaded or set forth in any bill or answer, the court shall not be obliged to direct issues in the same terms as laid in the bill or answer, but may direct them in legal forms, and according to the true sense, meaning and intention of the party or parties pleading the same, and as will best answer the purposes of justice: and in order to prevent parties from praying frivolous and vexatious issues, the parties praying the same and failing therein, shall be liable to pay costs at law, as to such part or parts as he or they shall fail in, if the judge before whom the same shall be tried, shall certify that they were frivolous and vexatious.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION ACT.] Mr. Sheriff Desanges appeared at the bar, and presented a petition of the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, for an inquiry into the conduct of ministers, with regard to the execution of this act.—Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

It set forth, "that the petitioners, holding in veneration the sacred principles of freedom upon which the British constitution is founded, have witnessed with the deepest concern the frequent and dangerous innovations which, upon unfounded alarms and pretences, have of late years been made thereon, more particularly by the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and other restrictions upon the liberty of the subject, during the last session of parliament; the petitioners remind the house that the habeas corpus act was passed at a period remarkable above all others for plots and alarms, that it conferred no new right, but was intended as a barrier for the liberty of the subject in consequence of the frequent arbitrary and illegal arrests and imprisonments, upon charges of sedition and treason, by the corrupt and tyrannical ministers of those days; they submit to the house, that if this great bulwark of personal security is to be suspended whenever the people labour under heavy grievances, and the misconduct of ministers has impelled them to lay their complaints before parliament, or at the foot of the throne, instead of inquiring into and redressing them, this boasted right is become a dead letter, its whole efficacy is lost, and it had better at once be struck out of the statute book than be suffered to remain only as a sad and mortifying memorial of what Englishmen formerly enjoyed; that the petitioners did, in the last session of parliament, implore the house not to assent to any proposition for depriving the people of that essential part of the constitution, the habeas corpus act, no precedent whatever existing of such a measure having been resorted to at a period of profound peace; they deprecated the precipitancy with which measures of such vital interest were hurried through parliament; they complained then, and they complain now, that they were founded upon the reports of secret committees, upon which were some of the ministers of the crown, and upon ex-parte evidence alone, selected by those ministers, without even further investigation after those reports had been contradicted in some of their most material parts, and had been offered to be disproved at the bar of the house: that, since the passing of the said act, the petitioners have viewed with indignation and horror the vindictive cruelty with which ministers have exercised the powers intrusted to them; numerous individuals have been torn from their wives and families, dragged into distant prisons, where they have been immured, heavily ironed, for months together, and afterwards released without being brought to trial, or even knowing the charges against them, although repeatedly demanding to be brought before the legal tribunals of the country; the petitioners cannot sufficiently express their abhorrence at the employment of infamous and abandoned wretches in the capacity of spies and informers, the hired agents of government, who it appears have been traversing the country, and, wherever distress and misery had engendered discontent and irritation, these inhuman wretches have, by the basest artifices and falsehoods, endeavoured to excite simple and deluded men into acts of outrage and treason, and in the instances where convictions have taken place, the petitioners feel convinced, from what has transpired, that the unhappy and deluded individuals were the victims of these abandoned agents; that, notwithstanding the solemnity with which the magnitude and atrocity of the treasons in Scotland were said to exist, the petitioners can find no record of any conviction for the crimes alleged, although the most disgraceful tampering with a witness appears to have taken place in order to procure such conviction; that in the metropolis, after the greatest prejudice had been excited by ministers against an individual, and after vindictively persisting in putting him on his trial the third time, not content with the previous acquittal of two successive juries, during which trials attempts were made to deprive him of the only means of defence by which he could establish his innocence, ministers experienced equal disgrace and discomfiture; and the petitioners cannot refrain from expressing to the house their conviction that those prosecutions were not undertaken for the protection of religion, but for political objects, and that had the publications been in favour of ministers, or in ridicule of their opponents, they would not have excited the attention of the government, unless, as in other cases, to reward the authors; that, while these acts of severity and oppression have been pursued with unrelenting rigour, although the sufferings of the people have been unexampled, and the numbers of their petitions without precedent, their grievances have neither been redressed nor their complaints inquired into; and the petitioners believe that the groundless alarms excited by ministers were solely for the purpose of stifling complaints and protecting abuses; the petitioners have looked with anxiety to the recent proceedings of the house; the commons house of parliament has been represented by the best authorities as the great inquest of the kingdom, to search into all the oppressions and injustices of the king's ministers; it is long since the petitioners have seen this important and necessary function exercised, but they entertained the most sanguine hopes that the house, after the unexampled difficulties and privations the people had endured, aggravated as they have been by the arbitrary and oppressive acts of the ministers, would at length have instituted the most serious and rigid inquiry into the multiplied oppressions and injustices of the king's ministers; the petitioners cannot conceal from the house that they look with no confidence to any report that the committees of secrecy now sitting may make, the said committees appearing to be composed for the greater part of placemen, and those very ministers whose conduct is the subject of investigation; that a committee thus formed is at variance with every established principle of civil or criminal jurisprudence, and cannot satisfy the justice and expectation of the country; the petitioners therefore humbly pray the house to institute an immediate, impartial, and rigid inquiry into the conduct of ministers, under the late suspension of the habeas corpus act, and that the whole proceedings connected therewith may be referred to such committee as shall be composed of such members only of the house as hold neither places or pensions under the crown: and they further pray, that the house will not render the vaunted responsibility of ministers a mere name, by passing a bill of indemnity, and preclude those who have been the victims of oppression and persecution from the means of appeal to the laws of the country."

Grievances under the Suspension Act.] Mr. Bennet presented the following petition of George Bradbury, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed. "That the petitioner was always a distinguished loyal man, and he never learnt that petitioning the house was contrary to strict loyalty; the petitioner begs of the house to remark, that, for the exercising this lawful privilege, a warrant was granted against him by lord Sidmouth, and he was persecuted from his home and business for six weeks, and then arrested, heavily ironed, and conveyed to London like a murderer; the petitioner knew it could be proved that the character of reform had attempted to be changed into rebellion by police plots: on the petitioner's first examination before lord Sidmouth, he desired his lordship to send his warrants for two men of the names of Lomax and Waddington from Lancashire, and he pointed out fifteen evidences in the country who could prove their wicked attempts, and desired his lordship to send for these to prove Lomax and Waddington's guilt, that they might be constrained to inform who employed them; his lordship excused himself by saying he knew the characters of Lomax and Waddington, these men had been employed to plot the burning of Manchester, and had got a number of men arrested on that charge to hang them: the petitioner begs to assure the house, that after his discharge in May, he was applied to by Oliver and his agents to assist in leading three thousand men armed from Manchester to Chatsworth, in Derbyshire, the seat of the duke of Devonshire, to assist in a rebellion of the counties of Derby, Nottingham, and York; the petitioner rejected these attempts with disdain, and he warned the reformers to have nothing to do with these wicked men, and he desired the magistrates to stop them; the petitioner begs of the house to remark, that he afterwards offered himself as witness for the men who were hanged at Derby, to prove that Oliver had attempted to get Manchester to join them, but the petitioner could not be admitted; and he begs to assure the house, that he has suffered loss of character, ruin of business, and much personal injury; and he begs the house to shew reform unnecessary, by loading with reprobation, rather than indemnifying, those who have created so much misery, which will prove the house to study the interests of the people, its constituents."

LONDON PRISONS.] On the motion of Sir W. Curtis, a statement was ordered "of the monies paid by the chamberlain of the city of London, on account of the several gaols of the said city, distinguishing each gaol, for two years, ending at Christmas 1817."—The statement was afterwards presented, and ordered to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

SURGERY REGULATION BILL.] The second reading of this bill being deferred till Monday, the 9th of March, Mr. Boswell moved for an account "of the amount of fees now payable by each individual on his being admitted a member of the royal college of surgeons of London, specifying the period when the said amount was fixed by the college; and also what alterations (if any) have been made in the amount of the said fees, since the institution of the college.

"A similar account from the royal college of surgeons of Edinburgh.

"A similar account from the royal college of surgeons of Dublin."—Ordered.

POOR LAWS.] Sir C. Mordaunt presented a petition of the guardians and overseers of the poor in Birmingham.—Referred to the committee on the poor laws, and ordered to be printed. It set forth "that the petitioners are impressed with the alarming increase of poor rates in the said town, the burthen of which is become exceedingly oppressive; and is aggravated by the very unequal and partial manner in which, under the existing laws, the rate is collected; that during the last session of parliament the petitioners made an unsuccessful application to obtain an act for rating the owners of small tenements in the town of Birmingham to the poor rates, in default of payment by the occupiers, and that this application was made on the following amongst other grounds: there are 18,082 houses in Birmingham, of these only 3,893 contribute to the maintenance of the poor, leaving 14,189 houses that do not contribute to the poor rates; the assessed annual rental of the whole parish is 210,170*l.*, the assessed annual rental of property paying poor rates is 114,665*l.*, the assessed annual rental paying no poor rates i 95,505*l.*; that since the failure of the above application the petitioners have made great exertions, which were aided by those of the magistrates, to compel the occupiers of small houses to pay poor rates, but the difficulties have proved insurmountable; the numerous tenements and houses thus escaping contribution being of small value, rented for short periods, and the occupiers who alone can be rated under the existing law either quitting their residence before the rate can be collected, or being too poor to admit of the rate being levied; the petitioners would represent to the house, that this unequal distribution of the parish burthen, which the legislature intended should fall upon every house in proportion to its annual rent, partially taxes one portion of the community, thereby exonerating another portion from a due share of the burthen; that it thus materially increases the amount of rate charged upon the payers of levies, and in its operation is most injurious to the trade, prosperity, and vital interests of the town of Birmingham; that the petitioners are convinced by careful investigation, that no benefit is derived by the poor occupiers from this exemption from paying rates, as the owners of these small houses secure a rent which is increased in the proportion of the amount of the rate which is due but impossible to collect, and the deficiencies arising from this cause are of course levied upon and paid by the occupiers of larger houses; that the pressure of the poor rates upon the town of Birmingham has been considerably increased since Easter last, owing to many of the payers of levies removing into adjoining parishes to avoid the excessive burthen, and to the consequent inability of others to pay the increased rates; and without an alteration of the law, so as to enable the petitioners to collect the rate from the owners of small houses, instead of the poor occupiers, they see no prospect of relief from this increasing grievance; and praying the house to enact that the owners of small houses be rated to the poor rates, in default of payment by the occupiers, confining the operation of such law to manufacturing and commercial districts or otherwise, as in their wisdom may seem most expedient; and they further pray to be heard at the bar of the house either by themselves or counsel."

BRITISH MUSEUM.] Mr. Bankes presented a petition of the trustees of the British Museum, for leave to present a petition for further aid. The Prince Regent's recommendation being signified, leave was given, and the petition presented accordingly.—It prayed, that the house would enable the trustees to purchase the valuable library of the late learned and reverend Dr. Charles Burney, at the public charge, for the purpose of adding it to the Collection now existing in the Museum.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was strongly disposed to promote the object of the petition; but, as the matter required consideration, he thought that a select committee should be appointed, to inquire into the value of the library.

The petition was accordingly referred to a committee, to examine the matter thereof, and to report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the house.—The members named on the committee were,—

Mr. Bankes	Mr. Frederick Douglas
Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer	Mr. F. Lewis
	Mr. Canning
Mr. Long	Mr. D. Gilbert
Sir William Scott	Sir James Macintosh
Mr. Lushington	Lord Binning
Mr. Brougham	Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald
Mr. Fazakerley	Mr. Charles Grant, jun.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. Davies Gilbert presented a report of the select committee appointed to inquire into the income and expenditure of the country.—It related to the army estimates, and was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition of inhabitants of Nottingham. —Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It set forth "that the petitioners have long seen with deep regret the lavish expenditure of the public money on useless placemen, pensioners, and sinecurists, and also on a large standing army in time of profound peace, while the mechanic, artisan, and labourer, are pining for want, their wages not being adequate to the high price of every necessary of life; the petitioners have beheld with poignant sorrow the suspension of their dearest rights, and the consequent evils arising therefrom, namely, the incarceration of several innocent individuals, who, after being inhumanly treated for several months, are sent home to their half-starved families with the loss of trade, employment, and character, and from being confined in damp cells some of them have lost the most valuable blessing in life, namely, health; the petitioners could name a long list of grievances, but will not exhaust the patience of the house by the recital of them, being firmly persuaded that nothing short of a reform in the house, embracing an extension of the elective franchise to all householders, and annual parliaments, is calculated to remove the evils complained of; they therefore earnestly request the house will in its wisdom take such steps as are most likely to obtain the much-desired objects."

Sir F. Burdett presented two petitions of inhabitants of Warrington, praying for reform of parliament.—A petition on the same subject was then presented of inhabitants of Christ Church, Middlesex; also two petitions of inhabitants of Bethnal Green; also seven petitions of inhabitants of Middlesex; also three petitions of inhabitants of Westminster; also of inhabitants of Saint Margaret and Saint John.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Sir R. Peel, in moving the order of the day for the second reading of this bill, observed, that its principle was exactly the same as that of the bill which he introduced in 1815, and he hoped, for the sake of the unhappy children for whose protection it was intended, that he should succeed in his object. It had been said, that the bill interfered with free labour, but he was himself an advocate for free labour, and he could not tell how little children, who had neither a will nor a voice of their own, could be deemed free labourers. These children were under either parents or masters, who, of course, directed them in their conduct. He was happy to find that the parents had petitioned that house to take the children under its protection. The bill embraced such a large and beneficent object, and included the interests of so many poor people, that the plan could not possibly be carried into effect without an act of parliament. He hoped that the house, in the present instance, would allow the same course to be taken that had been followed three years ago. The bill might undergo a second reading, the blanks might be filled up, and plenty of time might be allowed, in order that it should be known all over the country, and no further proceedings might be adopted till after the holydays. (Hear.) He did not wish any man to be taken by surprise, but he hoped the house would allow no further time to be wasted than could be avoided, before the determination of a measure of such importance. The bill of 1815 had proposed, that children under ten years should not be admitted to the manufactories. He now proposed, that nine years should be the time, and that the powers of the act should end when children attained the age of sixteen; for, till that time, they could not be said to be free agents, or capable of judging for themselves. With these statements before them, he hoped the house would understand the real intention, and suffer the bill to pass the second reading, that those who were interested might be acquainted with its provisions. The time per day that the bill allowed was, eleven hours for labour, and an hour and a half for food. And on that part of the subject he should remark, that it was intended, if possible, to prevent a misfortune which had recently occurred. He alluded to the melancholy accident of fourteen children having been burnt in a cotton factory during the night. There had been a bad practice of causing the children to work when their masters were in bed (hear, hear), and he was ashamed to own, that he had himself been concerned where that proceeding had been suffered; but he hoped that the house would interfere, and prevent it for the future. It was his wish to have no night-work at all in the factories, and he had introduced a clause to that effect.—The hon. baronet concluded by moving, that the bill be now read a second time.

Lord Lascelles said, he did not rise to oppose the motion of the hon. baronet, because he had stated that the bill might lie over, and thus the whole country would be aware of what was going forward. In one part of the bill he agreed with the hon. baronet—in that part which limited the age of the children employed in the manufactories. If there were any abuse with regard to the age, it certainly called for the attention of the house. There was one thing which ought to be observed. In former times, a great part of the manufactories had been conducted upon streams of water; but, lately, the introduction of steam had removed many of them into remote parts of the country. Several manufactories, however, were still upon streams. Now, the bill was calculated to give a great superiority and advantage to those factories that were carried on by steam. They could, in fact, do as they liked; they could work eleven, or twelve, or whatever number of hours they chose. But it was not so with those upon streams. There were many of those that could not work, except when the water suited them (hear, hear), and if they were limited to the hours prescribed by the bill, they would be rendered useless, which was a very strong fact for the consideration of the house. The real grounds of the bill did not arise from the proceedings of the committee of 1816, but from other evidence. On this point he must say, that, whatever evidence was brought up in the pockets of persons from the country, when that evidence fell upon the characters of people not present, it was hard that they could not be heard in their own defence. That method of taking evidence was a kind of underhand mode of proceeding. (Hear, hear.) He by no means alluded to any part of the conduct of the hon. baronet; he was speaking of the impropriety of legislating on evidence of that nature. As the hon. baronet, however, had professed his intention of giving ample time for the consideration of the bill, he would not oppose it in the present stage.

Mr. Philips, after having commented on the proceedings which had been resorted to in order to get signatures to the petition which had lately been presented by the hon. baronet from the persons employed in the cotton factories, entered into some of the particulars of the evidence taken by the committee, which went to prove that persons were employed at an earlier age, and for longer hours, in weaving, than in the cotton factories. On what principle, he asked, could the house interfere with free labour in cotton factories, and not at the same time regulate the age at which children could be employed in weaving, and the number of hours which they should work? To prove the unhealthy nature of the employment in cotton factories, the matron of the fever ward of the Manchester infirmary had been examined, who stated, that the number of persons employed in such factories, and brought to the ward, was much greater than that of any other description of workmen. He was convinced when this evidence was delivered, that the statement was incorrect, and, having since referred to the books of the infirmary, he had found that the account was much overcharged. In July, 1817, the whole number of persons in the Manchester infirmary amounted to 370; of that number 55 only were from the cotton factories. Now, the number of persons in Manchester, engaged in the cotton factories, amounted to 24,000, while the population was between 90 and 100,000. There was, therefore, the most complete evidence of the superior health of the persons engaged in the cotton factories to that of the other inhabitants.—The hon. member then referred to a report from the poorhouse of Preston, from 1815 to 1816, to shew how little burthensome this class of manufactures was to the country. The whole number of persons in the workhouse exceeded 600; and of these, there was not one who had ever been employed in a cotton factory. With respect to the factory with which he was concerned, it had a sick fund of its own; but when the working people saw disease and misery around them, they, of their own accord, and without the least excitement from others, contributed 24*l.* from their fund to the Manchester infirmary, and 24*l.* to a fund for the poor of that town. In regard to the healthiness of the employment, he would state the opinions of two medical gentlemen at Manchester, of the first eminence, Dr. Home and Dr. Henry. The hon. gentleman then read a letter from Dr. Henry. In that letter Dr. Henry stated, that if any disease was more frequent than another in cotton factories, it was pulmonary consumption; persons between the ages of 15 and 45 employed in such factories, were more subject to consumption than persons in many other employments; but on the other hand, chronic rheumatism, a most severe disease, was much less common among persons engaged in cotton factories, than among dyers, bleachers, and weavers. He, Dr. Henry, thought, that the temperature of some of the rooms was higher than was consistent with health; but if the temperature could be reduced to 65 or 60, there was no reason why a well regulated factory should not be as healthy as an ordinary apartment. Dr. Home declared, that he had not the slightest doubt of the superior health of the persons engaged in cotton factories, compared with persons in other manufactories.—If the house regulated labour in cotton factories, did they think that other manufacturers would be quiet? In well conducted factories few or no children were taken under nine—an employer would not wish to have them at an earlier age. He wished gentlemen to pause before they interfered with such an important manufacture. They ought to know, that the yarn spun in this country was much more than sufficient for our domestic use. On this subject there was the greatest jealousy abroad; and in the last session petitions were presented for a duty on the exportation of cotton yarn. On the continent, the hours of working were fully as long and unlimited as in this country. The language of the continental manufacturers was, if your legislature will only limit the hours of labour, or lay a duty on the exportation of yarn, it is all we ask. If your legislature would limit your hours, while ours are left unlimited, and impose an export duty on yarn, a greater effect would be produced by these measures in our favour, than by all the measures which our own governments could take.—The hon. baronet was less acquainted now with Lancashire than he had been. This measure had produced a great sensation in that quarter, and he (Mr. Philips) warned the house to consider the consequences which might arise from entertaining it. Would not the spirit of Luddism extend throughout the whole country? That spirit was less active now, but was not extinct. For his own part, after all the consideration which he had been able to bestow on the subject, he was decidedly of opinion, that a proposal more injurious in all its consequences, both domestic and foreign, could not possibly have been made. Formerly, a very considerable portion of the work in these factories was conducted by children alone; but the case was now altered. The number of children engaged in working had been much reduced; and, with respect to night-work, Mr. Arkwright, whose authority could not fail to have great weight with the house, had declared, that it was very rarely practised. For these reasons, he felt it his duty to object to the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Davenport said, that he was a member of the committee who were appointed to inquire into this subject in the year 1816; and he thought, that the legislature ought not to interfere without the most serious deliberation. He did not wish to give any opinion on the question in its present state; but he trusted that the house would not proceed with any indiscreet haste. If the bill was founded on the report of the committee, it might be desirable to hear the opinions of the different members who had attended most closely to the investigation of this matter; if it was founded on the petition which had been recently presented, it might be proper to inquire into the truth of its allegations, with a view to ascertain whether the petitioners might not have asked for the adoption of a measure which would be more injurious than beneficial to their interests. (Hear.)

Mr. Peel thought, that the best course of proceeding would be, to suffer the bill to be read a second time, and then to go to a committee for the purpose of having the blanks filled up, and to leave the further discussion till after the recess. This would obviate the objection made by his hon. friend who had just sat down as to any indiscreet haste. The effect of the regulation must depend on the minimum of the age of the children that were employed in those factories, and the number of hours during which they were to work. In his view of the subject, it was very difficult to pronounce an opinion on the merits of the bill, till the blanks had been filled up. He hoped, however, that no opposition would be made to the second reading, upon the promise of the author of the bill, that, after the blanks were filled up, no further proceedings should be taken at present. As to the propriety of entertaining the subject, he must observe, that not only on account of the age of the persons employed, but also on account of the nature of the cotton factories, this could hardly be called free labour. A child must either withhold himself from all employment, or submit to the task of working during a certain number of hours. It was not for the house to determine what number of mills were well-conducted, but to legislate in such a manner as should regulate the course of proceeding in all such concerns. The noble lord (Lascelles) had said, that he did not think this bill proceeded on the report of the committee, but on some evidence that had been subsequently obtained from the country. If this were the fact, there was no difficulty in stating what the nature of that evidence was: he (Mr. Peel) then held it in his hand, and any gentleman might, if he wished, have a copy of it. It proceeded from persons of great respectability and experience, and who were capable of forming an accurate judgment of the consequences of labour on the health and constitution of children. The first of them, Mr. Simmons, senior surgeon of the Manchester dispensary, gave his opinion on the aggregate of cases which had been presented to him, and was convinced, that the hours of labour in the cotton factories were too great for human endurance—that he shuddered to think of their evil effects upon children, and he could not believe that the practice would have been continued, if the consequences had been known. The vicar of St. John's, Manchester, and another gentleman, who inspected the Sunday school which many of these children frequented, had also stated, that from their observations, the long hours of labour and confinement were certainly prejudicial to the health of the children. The hon. member (Mr. Philips) did not seem to attach much importance to the petition which had been presented from the parents of these children; but he (Mr. Peel) could not help thinking that this arose from the circumstance of the hon. member not being influenced by the same feelings which the petitioners entertained. They had expressed a wish that the legislature should interfere for the protection of their children; and stated, that they were obliged to allow them to work for an unlimited time, or submit to the misfortune of not having them employed at all. It was obvious, then, that the parents themselves had no discretion or control in the business, and that the legislature alone could regulate the management of these factories. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Finlay was decidedly of opinion that there was no occasion for the bill. It was brought forward on evidence which had never been seen, and which those who opposed the measure had no opportunity of rebutting. He had every reason to believe, however, that a great many of the facts would turn out to be incorrect. If the house suffered the bill to pass, they would do a great injury to the good works, which required no regulation at all, without being able to compel the bad works to adhere to those regulations upon which all the benefits of the bill must depend. He maintained, that the limitation of the hours of labour would be so prejudicial to the cotton manufactories, as to remove to foreign countries a very considerable portion of this branch of trade. He was no advocate for employing children of a very young age; but it had been his misfortune, for so he must consider it, to be a member of a committee who were appointed to visit the gaols of this city, and he saw in them children of ten and eleven years of age, who had been condemned for offences; whereas, if they had been employed in manufactories, they would have learnt the benefits of industry, would have been saved from the punishment of the law, and, at the same time, would have contributed to the support of their parents and families. He was persuaded that great prejudices existed on this subject. In the linen and woollen manufactories, the hours of employment were generally longer than in the cotton factories. The latter had been much improved since 1802, and the children employed in them were better clothed, lodged, and fed. He had no objection, however, to limit the employment of children to those who were above nine or even ten years of age.—The hon. member then read a statement made by an hon. member in a committee on a former occasion, tending to shew that legislative interference, in the manner proposed by the bill under consideration, would be rather prejudicial than otherwise; and in this opinion he fully concurred.

Mr. Curwen said, he approved of the object of the bill; but he would reserve his opinions, as he should afterwards have an opportunity of giving them more fully.

Sir F. Burdett observed, that the house did not want the opinions of physicians to tell them that the employment of persons of a tender age, for an unlimited number of hours, must be very prejudicial to their health. It had been found that those employed in night-work were more healthy in appearance than those employed in the day-time; because the former were indulged with certain intervals of recreation, while the long, severe, and uninterrupted application of the latter operated in the most prejudicial manner against their general health and happiness. He was gratified that some legislative interference was to take place on this subject.

The bill was then read a second time, and committed; considered in a committee, and reported. The report was ordered to be further considered on Monday the 6th of April, and the bill, as amended, to be printed. It was as follows:—

Whereas an act was made in the forty-second year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled, "An act for the preservation of the health and morals of apprentices and others, employed in cotton and other mills, and cotton and other factories:"

And whereas the said act has been found insufficient to answer the purposes thereby intended, and it is expedient that the same should be altered, extended, and amended;

Be it therefore enacted, that from and after the first day of September 1818, the said recited act and this act shall extend and be construed to extend to all cotton mills, manufactories or buildings, in which cotton yarn is made, and in which twenty or more persons shall be employed.

And be it further enacted, that no male or female shall be employed in any such mill, manufactory or building, until he or she shall have attained the age of nine years, to be ascertained by the register of baptism, or other satisfactory evidence.

And be it further enacted, that no person, being under the age of sixteen years, shall be employed in any such mill, manufactory or building, in which cotton yarn is made, for more than twelve hours and a half in any one day, including half an hour to be allowed for breakfast, and one hour for dinner; and to prevent working in the night, the aforesaid twelve hours and a half shall be sometime between the hours of five of the clock in the morning, and nine of the clock in the evening.

And be it further enacted, that every master or mistress of every such cotton mill, manufactory or building, shall, on or before the first day of September 1819, and on or before the first day of September in every following year, transmit to the clerk of the peace for the county, stewartry, riding, division or place, in which any such mill, manufactory or building, shall be situated, a return of the several particulars contained in the schedule hereunto annexed; all which returns the respective clerks of the peace are hereby directed and required to lay before the justices of the peace for the county, stewartry, riding, division or place, at their ensuing quarter sessions; and if any such master or mistress shall neglect to make any such return within the period aforesaid, or shall wilfully make any false or untrue return, every such master or mistress shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, nor less than ten pounds.

And be it further enacted, that so much of the said act as directs that the justices of the peace for every county, stewartry, riding, division or place, shall appoint two persons, one of whom shall be a justice of the peace, and the other shall be a clergyman of the established church of England or Scotland, to be visitors of cotton mills or factories, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

And be it further enacted, that the justices of the peace for every county, stewartry, riding, division or place, in which any such cotton mill, manufactory or building shall be situated, shall, at any of the quarter sessions of the peace to be holden after the first day of September for such county, stewartry, riding, division or place, upon receiving complaint of offences against this act, appoint the clerk of the peace, or his deputy, in England or Ireland, or his deputies in Scotland, or one or more persons duly qualified, and not interested in or in any way connected with any such cotton mills, manufactories or buildings, to visit and examine such cotton mills, manufactories or buildings, against which the complaint is made; and in case the subject-matter of such complaints shall, by the report of the said visitors, be verified, the said justices are hereby authorized to appoint such visitor or visitors, who shall then have full power and authority from time to time throughout the year then ensuing, to enter into and inspect any such mill, manufactory or building, and the persons employed therein, at any time of the day, or during the working thereof, as they shall think fit; and such visitor or visitors shall report at least once, in writing, to the quarter sessions of the peace, the state and condition of such cotton mill, manufactory or building, and the persons employed in them, and whether the same are or are not conducted and regulated according to the directions of the said recited act and this act; and such report shall be entered by the clerk of the peace of every such county, stewartry, riding, division or place, among the records of the session, in a book to be kept for that purpose: provided always, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the justices of the peace at such sessions, to order and direct a full and adequate compensation to be made to the said visitors, for their trouble and expenses, out of the rates of the county, stewartry, riding, division or place.

And be it further enacted, that if any person or persons shall oppose or molest any of the said visitors, in the execution of the powers entrusted to them by this act, every such person or persons shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, nor less than ten pounds.

And be it further enacted, that the master or mistress of every such cotton mill, manufactory or building, shall cause printed or written copies of the schedule hereunto annexed, to be hung up and affixed in one or more conspicuous places in such mill, manufactory or buildings, and shall cause the same to be constantly kept and renewed, so that they may at all times be legible and accessible to all persons visiting or employed therein.

And be it further enacted, that every master or mistress of any such cotton mill, manufactory or building, who shall wilfully act contrary to, or offend against any of the provisions of the said act, or this act, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, nor less than ten pounds, at the discretion of the justices before whom such offender shall be convicted; one half whereof shall be paid to the informer, and the other half to the overseers of the poor in England and Ireland, and to the ministers and elders in Scotland, of the parish or place where such offence shall be committed, to be by them applied in aid of the poor rate in England and Ireland, and for the benefit of the poor in Scotland, of such parish or place: provided always, that all informations for offences against the said act, or this act, shall be laid within three calendar months after the offence committed, and not afterwards: provided also, that all penalties inflicted by this act shall be levied recovered and applied in manner directed by the said recited act.

And be it further enacted, that so much of the said act as directs the time during which apprentices shall be employed in mills, manufactories or buildings, shall be and the same is hereby repealed, with respect to all persons who shall be apprenticed to the owner of any cotton mill or factory after the first day of September one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

Schedule to which this act refers.

I, A. B. do hereby certify, that I have inquired or caused inquiry to be made into the respective ages of the children employed by me in my mill, (manufactory or building,) and that no boy or girl has been so employed in any cotton mill or manufactory occupied by me during the preceding year, who was not, according to the best of my knowledge and belief, grounded on such inquiry, above nine years of age: nor has any person, being under the age of sixteen years, being employed more than eleven hours in any one day, exclusive of an hour and a half which were duly allowed for meals: I further certify, that the mill (or mills) in my possession, has been ventilated and white-washed, in conformity to an act made in the forty-second year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled, "an act for the preservation of the health and morals of apprentices, and others employed in cotton and other mills, and cotton and other factories."

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, Feb. 24.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] The Chimney Sweepers' Regulation Bill was brought up from the commons by Mr. Bennet and other members, read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

Lord Holland presented a petition of inhabitants of Bath, in favour of the bill, and praying that the same might pass into a law.

Tuesday, Feb. 24.

STEAM-BOATS.] Mr. Harvey moved for leave to bring in the bill which he presented last year, "for securing the safety of passengers in vessels worked by means of steam." (See Vol. I. p. 1781.) Leave being given, the bill was brought in and read a first time.

PEWS IN CHURCHES.] Lord Milton moved for an account "of all faculties for the enclosure and erection of pews in parochial and other churches and chapels, which have been granted in the ecclesiastical courts in the several dioceses of England and Wales since the year 1790."—Ordered.

FEES FOR PARDONS.] Mr. F. Douglas moved for "an account of all fees, taxes, and other dues, paid upon a pardon granted under the great seal; together with the names of the persons to whom, and the fund into which, such fees, taxes, and dues, are payable."—Ordered.

CUTLERS.] Lord Milton brought up the report on the petition of the Sheffield and Hallamshire cutlers.—Ordered to lie on the table.

ROPE MAKERS.] Mr. Curwen presented the following petition of rope-makers of Woolwich. "That the petitioners, feeling themselves most seriously aggrieved at the small superannuation of fifteen pounds per annum, and, if strongly recommended by their officers, they may obtain twenty pounds, after a servitude, perhaps, some of thirty years, and others considerably longer, after having devoted all their youthful days in his Majesty's service, most humbly beg leave to solicit the house to take their case into their most serious consideration; the petitioners, as the superannuation now stands, on being discharged after so long a period of service, worn out and exhausted therein, would be unable from advanced years to earn any thing for their support in addition to such superannuation, and would, in all probability, from being incapable to provide themselves with bread alone, be obliged to end their days as paupers in the parish-house (which above all things they would wish to avoid), and in such case the parish officers would make a claim of their superannuation money in aid, as they pretend, for their maintenance and support; the petitioners therefore most humbly solicit the house to take their distressed case into their most gracious consideration, and by granting them an addition to the present allowance of superannuation enable them in their old age to support themselves without being obliged to apply to the parish for assistance; and the petitioners must humbly beg leave to state to the house, that, with a view to obtain so desirable an object as that of increasing their support in old age (should the house be pleased to grant them such an increase), in order to make some small provision towards defraying such addition to their superannuation, they are desirous of contributing two pence per week out of their earnings, for the purpose of forming a fund in aid of such increase of their superannuation."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

LEATHER TAX.] General Gascoigne presented a petition of tanners of Liverpool. It set forth "that the petitioners again beg leave to call the attention of the house to the late additional tax upon leather, which they still continue to view as a most impolitic measure, being ruinous to themselves, and injurious to the agricultural and labouring classes of society; that the number of bankruptcies and assignments of those engaged in the trade has of late years been unprecedentedly great, but that the petitioners are nevertheless compelled to continue the business in which they have either been brought up or engaged for a series of years, as the conversion of their premises and capital to other pursuits would necessarily be attended with certain loss; that they were led to hope for some relief, from the general feeling manifested by the house, that their case was one of peculiar hardship, and from the recollection that the additional duty was carried by a very small majority; that the petitioners have had the mortification to see their trade declining, whilst most other branches of manufacture in the kingdom have been in a progressive state of improvement and extension; the petitioners therefore most earnestly, but respectfully, pray, that they will without delay take the nature and operation of this additional duty into consideration, and that they will, by an immediate repeal of the said additional tax, remove a burden which is so injurious to one of the oldest and most important staple manufactures of the kingdom."

On the motion that the petition do lie on the table, Mr. Benson adverted to the numerous petitions for the repeal of this tax which had been presented to the house, urged their consideration on the chancellor of the exchequer, and trusted, that when the right hon. gentleman brought forward his budget, he would make provision for the repeal of an impost, the existence of which was incompatible with that of the manufacture itself.—The petition was then ordered to be printed.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Mr. Bennet presented the following petition of Benjamin Whiteley, of Holmfirth, (York) "That the petitioner is by trade a drawer of cloth in Holmfirth, was going to Horbury on Friday the 6th of June last, and was surrounded by armed men on the road near Thornhill Lees, and taken to the house of correction at Wakefield, where he remained three weeks in a damp cell, and had liked to have died of hunger, not being able to eat the food they presented him, and from the damps of the cell, no person being allowed to come to or see him; in the mean time his friends attended from time to time with bail for his appearance, if any thing could be laid to his charge, but they were put off from time to time, until on the 27th day of June he was liberated on his paying five shillings; on the 4th day of July, Thomas Blythe and another person entered the house of the petitioner, and searched every drawer, closet, and cranny, and then told him he must go to London on a charge of high treason; expostulation was in vain, he was hurried to Cold Bath Fields prison, where he remained four days, and was then carried before Lord Sidmouth, who told him he must go to prison, and be close confined; he requested to know his crime, and accuser, for he was not conscious of having done a wrong thing; he answered, he might say what he pleased, but he must go to prison, and be close confined; he was then taken like a felon to Salisbury, where for nine days he suffered under every circumstance of distress from situation and ill usage, his health declined very fast, and he did not expect to live from night to morning; he was on the tenth day removed to Worcester, where he remained twenty weeks without being allowed to see a single friend, his wife, having travelled all that way, was denied, and obliged to return without even that gratification; at last, on the 5th of December he signed a recognizance, that although he knew himself not guilty of any crime he might not perish in a loathsome prison; the loss he has sustained in his business, health, and circumstances, cannot be repaired, nevertheless, any relief which may be granted will be seasonable, and received with thankfulness."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. Bennet then presented a petition of Richard Lee, of Holmfirth. The hon. member said, that he could not vouch for all the particulars; but he had taken pains to examine into them. The petitioner appeared to him to be a quiet, peaceable kind of man. He stated, that he was confined in York Castle for 20 weeks and two days, in irons, and that, for five days, he was confined in the same room, and slept in the same bed, with a man who was afterwards executed for murder: that he was, with another person, put into a room in which a man named Riley had killed himself. The room was stained with the blood of the suicide, and they were obliged to clean it. Gentlemen acquainted with the county of York might take the trouble of writing to inquire into the truth of this statement. He could not but observe, that, in the last session, when it was proposed to prevent the use of irons in the operation of the act, it was objected to on the ground that no such severity was to be exercised.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It set forth, "That the petitioner is by trade a clothier, and hath never committed any crimes against the laws of his country, being in every case a true subject of his Majesty King George; that, on the 13th day of June 1817, a number of men entered the petitioner's house, with one Matthew Bradley at their head, while the petitioner was at his work; and the said M. Bradley said, in a very insulting manner, to the petitioner, 'you must go along with us;' the petitioner replied, 'very well, but you will let me wash and clean myself first;' when the petitioner had so done, the said Matthew Bradley drew a pistol out of his pocket, and said he would blow the petitioner's brains out; they then took the petitioner to an inn near his own house, where he begged to speak to his wife respecting his affairs; but, when she came for that purpose, the said Bradley said, the petitioner must go immediately to Huddersfield, as they were ready and would not wait, and that she, meaning the petitioner's wife, might follow the petitioner to Huddersfield if they had any thing to say together; to which town they dragged the petitioner, guarded by a number of horse soldiers, and lodged him in a stinking dungeon without a bed or fire, although the petitioner was wet through; that when the petitioner's wife came afterwards to see the petitioner next day at Huddersfield, at great charge and hazard, in her situation, being then unwell with a complaint in her breast, which was afterwards cut for a cancer, she was not allowed to see the petitioner at all; that on the next morning, in this uncomfortable state of mind and body, ill at ease on account of his family, he was brought some refreshment, but he could not eat; and about noon he was taken before a magistrate, Mr. B. H. Allen, who said that the petitioner was charged with high treason, and must be hanged; whereupon the petitioner said, 'you make my case very black, it's time to get prepared, I think:' he replied, 'yes, it is;' about the hour of seven o'clock in the evening, the petitioner said, 'Is it not dinner time?' to this Mr. Thomas Atkinson, who was present, said, 'you shall have your dinner in my room, and sleep in it also;' the petitioner replied, that would be very acceptable, as he had no sleep the last night; but the said Atkinson then said, 'you must make a man of yourself, and tell me all you know;' to which the petitioner replied, as the truth was, 'I know nothing;' that the said B. H. Allen then called the said Atkinson aside, and said, as the petitioner could hear, 'we must towser Lee again:' so, about eight o'clock, the petitioner was remanded to the dungeon again, and about ten o'clock they came and began searching him, while he was fast asleep, owing to his fatigue and want of rest; but being awoke by the search, the petitioner asked, 'what are you about?' but no answer was given to him, and they returned to him a three-shilling piece they had taken from his pocket just as he awoke, and kept him in this offensive dungeon five successive nights, and would not permit his wife to speak to him during that time, nor was he allowed to see her for three weeks afterwards; that the petitioner was afterwards put into an empty room, where he remained six days without any bed or bedding, save only a handful of straw to lie upon, but no covering of any sort whatsoever but his own clothes that he had on; that on the 16th of July he was removed to York Castle like a felon and ironed, in which state he was kept during the whole of his confinement, being twenty weeks and two days, five days of which time he was obliged to live in the same place, and sleep in the same room and bed with a man charged and afterwards executed for murder, with no other allowance than that of the prison, namely, bread, and sixpence per week for nine weeks; that one Thomas Riely, confined in the same jail with the petitioner, on a similar charge of a suspicion of high treason, no doubt in a fit of derangement of mind, brought on by his confinement, cut his throat in the said prison, and, on the day following, the petitioner and another prisoner whom the petitioner understood to be a convicted felon, were removed into the very same cell in which the said Riely cut his throat, while the blood of the said Riely was still lying all over the floor in a hard and congealed state, and the petitioner and the said other prisoner were compelled to clean the same out with only a mop and broom, which, not being sufficient to remove the said blood, the petitioner was obliged to scrape and take it up with his hands; that by this treatment the petitioner's affairs and health are very much injured, and to remedy things as far as he was able, he signed on the 5th of December a paper called a recognizance, although unconscious of any offence; wherefore, the petitioner's circumstances being in a ruined state, and his health declining, he is led to pray for such relief as to the wisdom of the house shall seem meet; and that the house will cause inquiry to be made into the conduct of those by whom the petitioner has been so cruelly treated, and will not pass any bill of indemnity to screen them from answering at law for such unjust treatment of the petitioner."

WINDOW TAX (IRELAND).] Sir John Newport presented a petition of inhabitants of the city of Waterford, against the window-taxes, which were felt as a most grievous calamity.—Ordered to lie on the table.

He presented a similar petition of inhabitants of the city of Limerick.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CONVEYANCERS.] The following petition of John Martyn Bligh, of Stone, near Bodmin, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—"That it has come to the knowledge of the petitioner that certain attornies and solicitors are endeavouring, by petitions to the house, to procure an alteration in the laws respecting conveyancers; and he cannot but observe that, under the plausible pretext of preventing ignorant and incompetent persons from engaging in the practice of conveyancing, their real object is, by legislative enactments, to expel from such practice all country conveyancers, who, being members of the four inns of court, have established themselves under the act of the 44th of his present Majesty, chapter 98, for the purpose of ingrossing (if possible) the management of all the landed property of the realm, and increasing their own emoluments; that the petitioner respectfully submits to the house, that previous to the passing of the above-mentioned act all persons were at liberty to practise conveyancing, and that act only limited and confined the practice to a certain denomination of persons therein mentioned, and among them to persons members of the four inns of court, taking out a conveyancer's certificate annually: that as attornies and solicitors must have entered into articles with a full knowledge that the business of conveyancing was not confined to such persons as served under them, and as those persons only who have served regular clerkships, and are admitted attornies of one of the courts, can practise as attornies in soliciting, prosecuting, and defending suits at law and in equity, the petitioner humbly submits that they ought not to be now permitted to object against the practice of conveyancing being continued by men who have been long established therein, and who have always conducted themselves to the satisfaction of their employers, and acquired a good reputation; that the laws imposing the duties now payable on the articles and admission of attornies and solicitors not having had a retrospective operation, such duties have been paid by those persons only who have been articled and admitted since the enactment of those laws, and notwithstanding they may have been productive of beneficial effects, instances are by no means rare, even now, of ignorant and corrupt practitioners, while others have from time to time been justly visited with the severest censure of the courts at Westminster: that attornies and solicitors have no right to assume, that, because conveyancing requires abstruse and legal learning, that it can be acquired only in an attorney's office, and that they alone are qualified to practise it, since they are not necessarily conveyancers, and many of them have not a competent knowledge of that branch of the law, whereas it may fairly be presumed that conveyancers in general are competent and respectable, from the patronage they continue to receive from the many highly-respectable persons who employ them; that the promoters of the measures which the petitioner is under the necessity, for self-preservation, to complain of, are actuated only by interested motives, which he humbly submits must be sufficiently apparent from their acts, and that their avarice is contemptible, when it is considered that the whole body of attornies and solicitors amount to above four thousand in number, whilst all the county conveyancers do not, as far as can be ascertained, by very many exceed one hundred; that the stamp duties payable on the admission of a member of an inn of court are the same as are required to be paid on the admission of an attorney or solicitor, and the expense of the annual certificate for an attorney, solicitor, and conveyancer, is the same: that, since it is notorious that many attornies are engaged in various branches of trade, many employed in different clerkships, and various business and callings, and since most, if not all of them, are anxious to obtain the agency of landed property, the petitioner humbly submits that they ought not to make it a ground of objection to conveyancers, that many of them connect some other business or calling with the practice of conveyancing, though it may reasonably be desired that no future conveyancer, or attorney or solicitor, be permitted to engage in any trade, business, or calling that may be degrading to the profession; that the petitioner begs most humbly to represent to the house, that, with the business of a conveyancer, he unites that of a land agent, that, when necessary, he values such land as is intrusted to his care and management, and occasionally other lands, and is in that capacity styled a land surveyor, and, in order that he may legally receive the rewards due to him for such services, he takes out a licence as an appraiser, but of which licence he makes no other use whatsoever; and the petitioner humbly submits that he ought not, on account of his having been, or continuing to be, employed in those respectable avocations, to be prevented from continuing in the practice of conveyancing, especially as they are so properly connected with such practice in the country; that, though there may have been perhaps a few instances of improper persons admitted members of inns of court, and become conveyancers, the petitioner submits that the whole body ought not therefore to be disqualified, particularly after having expended much money in payment of all the duties imposed by the legislature, and been recognized and sanctioned by several acts of parliament, under the faith of which the greatest part of them have devoted much time and expense to the study of that branch of the law, and relinquished prospects of other pursuits in life; that the petitioner respectfully submits to the house, that it is evident that it always was the intention of the legislature to permit all members of inns of court, on taking only a certificate for the purpose, to practise as conveyancers, as appears by their being particularly mentioned in the said acts of parliament, and that the contrary is by no means proved by the assertion that members of such inns are presumed, upon their first admission, to be in a state of pupilage, since the same acts also authorize proctors and notaries to practise as conveyancers, without requiring any other qualification from them: that the petitioner humbly submits to the house, that the public will not in any respect be benefited by conveyancers being deprived of their present honourable means of subsistence; the petitioner having been from an early period of life bred up and instructed in the business of a conveyancer, and having practised as such since his admission to be a member of the honourable society of Gray's Inn, for upwards of eleven years, and having been employed by noblemen and others of great respectability, and no instance having occurred of any deed or instrument drawn or prepared by him having been found defective or legally questioned, and he being now above thirty-seven years of age, and having a wife and five young children to support, humbly prays the house to afford him a protection of what he conceives to be his just rights; and that, if in their wisdom the house shall deem it expedient to enact any new regulations respecting the practice of conveyancing, the same may, like the regulations which have from time to time been enacted respecting attornies and solicitors, have only a prospective operation."

The following petition of Attornies residing in and near the metropolis, was also presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

"That by the laws now in force no person can be admitted to practise as an attorney and solicitor unless he has duly served a clerkship of five years, and has paid stamp duties on his articles of clerkship and on his admission, amounting together to upwards of 145*l.*; that these laws have been highly beneficial to the public by increasing the respectability of attornies and solicitors, and diminishing the evils occasioned by the errors and misconduct of ignorant and needy practitioners; that conveyancing is a principal and the most reputable and advantageous branch of the business of an attorney and solicitor, it requires more extensive and abstruse learning than any other branch of the law, and the practice of it by ignorant persons invalidates or renders insecure and imperfect the titles to landed property, and is highly injurious to the public by creating a multiplicity of suits, and involving their property in litigation or insecurity; that the stamp act of the 44th year of his present majesty, authorizes any person being a member of one of the four inns of court, to draw and prepare conveyances, without requiring him to keep any number of terms, or producing any testimonials of his having had a professional education to qualify him for such an undertaking; that the stamp duties and expenses of obtaining admission to an inn of court, qualifying a person to practise as a conveyancer, amount only to 28*l.* or thereabouts, and tradesmen and persons who have no connection with the profession of the law, and who frequently come from distant parts of the country, are permitted to become members of an inn of court, without any inquiry into their characters, education or competency to become practising conveyancers; that in consequence of the low stamp duties paid by conveyancers, together with the easy means of obtaining admission as members of an inn of court, many ignorant and incompetent persons, such as linen-drapers, shopkeepers, sheriffs' officers, annuity brokers, bankers' clerks, auctioneers, schoolmasters, and inferior tradesmen of almost every description, together with discarded writers from attornies' offices, have been enabled to get admitted members of an inn of court, and are now actually practising in various parts of the kingdom as certificated conveyancers, to the great disgrace of the profession and ultimate injury to the public; that the petitioners respectfully submit, it never could be the intention of the legislature to authorize persons of the above description, merely by being admitted members of an inn of court, to practise as conveyancers, because every member of an inn of court is presumed upon his first admission to be in the commencement of a course of legal education, in order to qualify himself for future practice; that the petitioners beg leave to submit, that the evils they complain of should be remedied by legislative provisions, and that persons ought not to be permitted to practise as conveyancers without receiving a competent legal education, and that upon their admission as members of an inn of court, and upon their certificates or admissions to practice, stamp duties should be imposed similar to those which are paid upon the articles of clerkship, and the admission of attornies and solicitors; the petitioners therefore most humbly pray, that the house will be pleased to take the subject complained of into consideration, and that they will grant such relief in the premises as to them shall seem meet."

City Revenue.] Mr. Holme Sumner rose to submit a motion to the house, for the purpose of obtaining from the city of London an account of their revenue for five years ending the 31st of December, 1817. The application which the city of London had lately made to be allowed to raise money on the credit of the orphans' fund, or in other words, to be allowed to tax the neighbouring counties, to defray the additional sum of 34,000*l.* required to complete their new prison, an object of the city of London alone, justified him in calling on the corporation to lay an account of their affairs before the house. The measure for which the city members now came forward was of a very extraordinary nature. By the 52d of the king, the city of London was authorized to borrow 95,000*l.* on the credit of the orphans' fund, for the erection of a new prison. No one doubted, at the time this sum was granted, that it was not perfectly adequate to its purpose; but the city of London, either from having made choice of a situation for building too limited in space, or from the prodigality with which they had gone to work, had spent this money without accomplishing their object, and they now came forward to demand 34,000*l.* in addition to the former grant. The house ought not to give their consent to this application, until the city shewed the manner in which the former sum had been expended. He regretted that the house had not called for the accounts of the city when the original demand was made for a grant; but he could not suppose that they would be so neglectful of their duty on the present occasion. The corporation, it appeared, had questioned the right of that house to call for a statement of their accounts; and, from what had occurred in the common council a few days ago, it seemed that some of the members had expressed a determination not to produce them. This must have arisen from a conviction on their part, that the funds of the city had been very improperly applied; and, indeed, they had been charged in their own court, by one of their most intelligent members (Mr. Waithman), with wasteful and improvident expenditure. From the information which he (Mr. Sumner) had procured, he was enabled to state to the house, in what manner the corporation had disposed of their money. The expense of an entertainment given by them to the liberators of Europe was said to be 24,000*l.* On examination, he believed it would be found to be nearly 40,000*l.* He understood that, during the last 37 years, the corporation had expended, in improving and widening the public streets 45,000*l.; in gold boxes and swords to naval and military officers—(Hear, from Sir W. Curtis.)* If the hon. baronet could shew that they possessed a surplus, then he was ready to allow that these were proper objects of their munificence. But if they expended their money on these objects, and then came forward to ask for public aid for objects which they were bound to provide for out of their own funds, such an expenditure was most blameable. He was proceeding to say, that the corporation had expended, in making presents of swords, snuff-boxes, and the freedom of the city in gold boxes, to Colonel Wardle and other public characters, (a laugh) and in erecting monuments to the King, Lord Chatham, and Mr. Pitt, 27,000*l.*; in bounties to seamen, voluntary contributions, &c. 25,000*l.*; in charitable donations, 30,000*l.* (Hear, hear.) The whole of the sums expended on these different objects, amounted to no less than 127,000*l.* Now, the sum required for this gaol was 130,000*l.*; and thus, if the corporation had been just before they were generous, the sums which they had so misapplied might have been sufficient to complete their prison. Every particle of this 127,000*l.* so spent, was a misapplication. Unfortunately, however, this was not the first misapplication. (The hon. gentleman then went into an account of the transactions which led to the grant of the duty, commonly called the orphans' fund.) He held in his hands a brief statement of the accounts of the city, annually distributed among the members of the corporation. In that statement, he observed, that the lord mayor and aldermen of the city of London, were debtors to the amount of 53,000*l.* to a fund of which they were the trustees, and which was granted to them for a specific object. The Bridgehouse estate was vested in them for the building and repairing of London Bridge. Of the funds of this estate 33,000*l.* and 25,000*l* 3 per cent. stock, now worth 20,000*l.* in all 53,000*l.* had been appropriated by the lord mayor and aldermen to other objects. So that, if one or two arches of London bridge should happen to be swept away, a thing very far from being improbable, they must come again to the orphans' fund. In speaking of this transaction, he scarcely knew what terms to apply to it: to call it a misapplication of the fund was too lenient an expression; it was, in fact, and he could call it nothing else than, an embezzlement of that fund. But this was not the only instance in which they had misapplied the funds of that estate. By an ancient charter, the city of London had jurisdiction in part of the county of Surrey—the borough of Southwark, which had lain dormant for many years, and was not revived till the other day. But, for what purpose had it been revived? Merely for the purpose of creating a place for a decayed alderman. (A laugh.) Would they say, that, in the place where they had established this jurisdiction, there was any want of a fair and impartial administration of justice? The gentleman who was appointed to fill this office was, Sir John Eamer, and they had taken from the Bridgehouse estate 1400*l.* a year to defray the expenses of this establishment. He (Mr. Sumner) would not pass any judgment on this transaction; for he could not pass any so strong as one of their own members, who had declared, that it was one of the most scandalous things that ever occurred. So far from having assisted the administration of the law, it had occasioned considerable difficulties. At present, there were two quarter-sessions, and two grand juries; and the suitors were so much embarrassed, that they could not tell to which court they ought to go. With respect to the new prison, it was impossible that any thing could be more inadequate to its purpose, or worse planned; indeed, it could not be condemned in stronger terms than had been employed by some members of the court of the city of London. Because they had fooled away the 95,000*l.* already granted to them, were they further to be trusted with 34,000*l.* to be taken out of the pockets of those who were already chargeable with heavy county rates for their own objects? One of the pleas of the corporation was, that they were bound to maintain gaols for the county of Middlesex, as well as for the city of London. But they generally told only so much of the case as suited themselves. They did not tell the house, that, to this liability, various privileges and immunities were attached, which they had always maintained with the utmost jealousy. They elected their own sheriffs, and would not allow any of the magistrates of Middlesex to examine their prisons. By nominating to the office of sheriff persons who, they knew, would not serve, they contrived to raise from the fines a considerable revenue. In one year lately, they had raised in this way 9,200*l.* For the last four years, they had raised 20,000*l.* on an average 5,000*l.* a-year. It was proper that the house should know in what manner this money had been disposed of. With regard to the principle, that parliament had a right to demand the production of their accounts, he did not think that any objection could be raised against it; but it was the duty of the house to see that the funds had been properly applied, before they listened to any application for a new grant. He should, therefore, conclude by moving, "That there be laid before this house, a statement or account of the revenues of the city of London, as the same have been received into the chamber of the said city, for five years ending the 31st of December 1817; distinguishing them under the several heads, viz. Rents and Quit Rents, Market Tolls, Offices and Bequests, Rents received of Brokers, Freedoms sold, Freedoms, Enrolments, &c. Casual Receipts, Sheriffs' Fines, Sales and Alienation of Offices, Fines for Leases, Insurance of Officers' Lives, Interest on Government Securities, and Sale of Securities."

Sir W. Curtis rose, and spoke as follows:—"Sir, I have listened with great attention, and, I must add, with considerable pain, to the speech of the hon. member who has just sat down. Sir, the hon. member, in the course of that speech, has thought proper to charge the city of London with having been guilty of gross embezzlement: but he must excuse me, if I say, that this is a gross and unwarrantable expression. The city of London has done no such thing, as I am fully prepared to prove. The hon. member insists on the right of inspecting their accounts; and they are willing to give an account—that is, whenever it shall be right in their opinion. (A laugh.) Sir, we have maintained the gaols of London, not for ourselves alone, but for the country at large, and for the county of Middlesex in an immense degree. If, then, we are supporting prisons for other people—if we are providing for prisoners after they have been convicted—if felons and criminals are sent to us from all parts—and if, under such circumstances, our funds are found inadequate, are we not entitled to call upon this house to give us some assistance? With respect to the bill which has been introduced, we call on you now to fulfil and complete what you thought proper to sanction before. The hon. member, however, desires you not to attend to our reasonable request; and no sooner does he enter into the history of our case, than his blood begins to boil. (A laugh.) Sir, that hon. member has certainly a most dreadful antipathy to the city of London; but, before I sit down, I hope to convince you, that no blame can attach to the corporate body. We will furnish the house with an account of the 95,000*l.* which was formerly granted; and when I say this, permit me to add, that the city have never been backward in shewing their accounts. The expense of erecting the new prison for debtors has been greater than was foreseen; but gentlemen don't seem to know the value of ground in the city of London. Why, Sir, you can't get an inch of ground without putting three or four guineas on it. (A laugh.) We have chosen the best situation we could find; for, let me tell you, people don't like to see gaols near them: for God's sake, they cry, don't build the gaol near us. Well, then, at last we found a spot of ground, we availed ourselves of the breaking up of a large brewhouse, and began our building. As to prodigal expenditure, there is no prodigality about it. This, Sir, is the poor man's prison. Rich men may go to the King's Bench, and drink their Burgundy and Champagne; they first rob their neighbours, and then get white-washed. This is too common a practice now-a-days. But, the hon. gentleman has been telling a long story of the lord mayor and aldermen, and he says, that they have embezzled some of the city funds. Now, I will tell him, that I have been thirty-three years in the corporation, and I never had one shilling in my life from them; and, therefore, I don't know what he means by embezzlement. The Bridge-house estate has lent us money, for which we have given our bonds and securities. Is there any embezzlement in this? If the house thinks there is any thing improper in this transaction, we will bring the accounts before them. (Hear, hear.) Well, Sir, then the hon. gentleman says, that we have given away large sums in swords and snuff-boxes. Suppose it to be so. Is it not a happy and glorious thing, to see those heroes who have fought and bled for their country rewarded? Are the city of London to be blamed and taunted, because they have made presents to those gallant fellows? Sir, I am astonished at the hon. gentleman; it is worthy of the city that they have acted in this manner. The corporation have done their duty, and they don't come here to beg; they call on the house to complete what they have already sanctioned. If it were necessary for me to enter into detail on this subject, I must go back to what happened in the reign of King Charles, the result of which was, the grant of the duty on coal. I don't mean to go so far back; but if I live another year, I will endeavour to have the name of the orphans' fund changed; for, at present, whenever this name is used, it is thought that we are running away with all the orphans' money. We request you to make us this grant, and we will never come to you any more. (A laugh.) As to the city prisons, the house has lately appointed a committee to inspect them. But it seems, that we must have no gaols now for punishment —we must have something in them to cheer up the heart of man. (Loud laughter.) I don't know what the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bennet) wants. Does he mean that men, who have forfeited their liberty, should have coffee and chocolate of a morning, (a laugh) and luxuries of that sort? Does he wish to have the floors covered with Turkey carpets? It has been said, that these men are fed with sour bread. It is no such thing. There is no bad bread in the prisons; it is as good as any family in the kingdom can wish to eat. I only ask that hon. gentleman, whether he has tasted the bread? Let the committee ask that good woman, Mrs. Fry, whom they all love so much. (A laugh.) I say, let them ask her; she is a good woman, and deserves to be loved *. The prisoners have one pound of bread per day, and four half pounds of meat per week. The other day I stated that they had four pounds, but I was mistaken. (See page 458.) Well, then, are not four half pounds a good allowance for them? It is quite enough for men of that description—if they had more, it would make them bloated, and fill them full of gross humours. (Loud laughter.) Sir, I say, let the corporation have what they are asking for, and they will produce an account of the monies received."—The hon. baronet concluded with moving an amendment, to leave out from the word "house," to the end of the question, in order to add the words, "an account of the produce of the several duties and payments composing the Orphans' Fund, for the last six years, and the annual charges on the same, together with the debts which remain outstanding and chargeable on the said fund; and also, an account of the application of the 95,000*l.* authorized to be raised and charged on the said fund for the erection of a new Prison for Debtors in London."

Mr. Serjeant Onslow observed, that the hon. baronet had attempted to divert the attention of the house from the real merits of the question, by his humorous mode of adverting to some of the statements which had been made. He had not, however, urged one argument in answer to the reasoning of the hon. member for Surrey. The duty on coals was a very heavy tax upon the poor: and, before the city could claim such a tax for the purpose of building a prison, they ought to shew how they had expended their revenue. It was an abuse of terms to call the squandering of their money on dinners, drinking, and presents, generosity, while, for useful objects, they were obliged to demand the imposition of heavy taxes on others. The treatment of the prisoners in the new prison, respecting which so much had been said

* Mrs. Fry, (the wife of Joseph Fry, Esq. of St. Mildred's Court, banker), is a member of the Society of Friends. About three years ago, from some representations which were made to her of the wretched and demoralized state of the female prisoners in Newgate, she was induced to visit that gaol, and, having been since assisted by a committee of ladies, chiefly of her own religious persuasion, she has succeeded in effecting a moral reformation, which must produce a very material change in the discipline of prisons, and may even pave the way for a great alteration in the penal code of the country. The grand jury of the city of London marked their approbation of this excellent woman's meritorious services, in their report to the court at the Old Bailey, on visiting Newgate, the 21st of February, 1818, in the following words:—"The grand jury cannot conclude this report without expressing, in an especial manner, the peculiar gratification they experience in observing the important services rendered by Mrs. Fry and her friends, and the habits of religion, order, industry, and cleanliness, which her humane, benevolent, and praiseworthy exertions have introduced among the female prisoners. If the principles which govern her regulations were adopted towards the males as well as females, it would be the means of converting a prison into a school of reform, and, instead of sending criminals back into the world (as is now too generally the case) hardened in vice and depravity, they would be restored to it repentant, and, probably, become useful members of society."

by the hon. baronet, was altogether irrelevant to the question. Not one word had been said on that subject by the hon. gentleman who brought forward the motion. As the hon. baronet had completely failed in his attempt to answer the hon. mover, he had a right to infer, that his statement was unanswerable. The honour of the city was implicated in this affair. He really did not see on what ground they could refuse information to the house, and he should, therefore, vote for the motion.

Mr. Alderman Wood contended, that the city of London had not embezzled any part of the Bridge-house estate—in no one instance had they made gifts of any part of that property. With respect to the entertainment given to the liberators of Europe, he admitted, that a very considerable sum had been expended. Two dinners were given by the city to those illustrious personages: one of them, to the Duke of Wellington, cost 5000*l.*; and though he had opposed the war, he had moved for that very dinner. The hon. gentleman who brought forward the motion, and the hon. and learned gentleman, did not seem to be aware, when they spoke of misapplication of the proceeds of the Bridge-house estate, that the county to which they belonged had borrowed money from that estate, for the purpose of making a sewer in St. George's Fields, an object of the greatest utility, for the completion of which, however, they could not otherwise obtain funds. Another item of expense on that estate was, the erection of a justice-hall in Southwark, which was built at the earnest request of the people of the borough, who complained, that small offences were not prosecuted, on account of the distance of the sessions at Guildford. The expense of this was not 1200*l.* It was to be recollected, that the bridge at Blackfriars was built out of the fund which had been said to have been applied solely to the benefit of the city of London. The advantages derived by the county of Surrey from the building of that bridge, had increased its rental by more than 500,000*l.* The city of London, too, paid 11,500*l.* yearly towards the Orphans' Fund. The city now asked for additional aid from this fund; and, though they were not alarmed at a scrutiny, he did not think that such a request warranted the house in calling for their accounts. The prison to which this money was to be applied was principally for Middlesex debtors. There were now 400 prisoners in it who did not belong to the city of London; and 3000*l.* a-year additional expense was incurred by removing them from Newgate. It had been said, that, in return for their supporting the gaols of the county of Middlesex, the city received fines from those who declined the office of sheriff; but it was to be remembered, that these fines were paid by citizens only—no other persons in the county of Middlesex were liable to serve that office, which occasioned an expense of 2400*l.* to any one who undertook it.

Mr. Barclay said, the worthy alderman had stated, that the corporation had expended large sums, from which the county of Surrey had derived great benefits. The worthy alderman would have it understood, that the corporation had built Blackfriars-bridge for the convenience of that county, without considering that it was the great outlet for the city, and the direct passage to Dover. As to the money which had been borrowed for the sewer in St. George's-fields, it was on good security, and would be repaid. Many other sums, issued from the same fund, would, he feared, never be returned. If the city were to apply in formâ pauperis for money to maintain their own prisons, when London bridge was to be rebuilt; the house might expect a similar application. The city now said, they had received money already from the orphans' fund for the same purpose. It was the duty of the house to see, that this was not unnecessarily increased. If it should appear, when the accounts were presented, that the city had fairly expended their money—that they had been just to their creditors as well as generous—it would be proper to relieve them; but if the money had been squandered, they had no right to ask for an additional grant.

Sir James Shaw said, that when the corporation of London purchased from the crown the right of appointing the sheriffs for Middlesex, they did not become liable to support its gaols. In other counties, the King had the nomination of sheriffs, but this did not subject his Majesty to maintain the gaols. Why, then, should the sole burthen of maintaining the gaols of Middlesex be thrown on the city*? He hoped, that the house, from every consideration of generosity and justice, would suffer the bill to pass, without calling for the accounts.

Mr. B. Shaw conceived that the question was not, whether it was correct that the city of London should maintain the gaols for the county of Middlesex. They were sufficiently acquainted with that corporation to know, that they would not have taken the burthen upon them, if they had not received some adequate remuneration. He did not think it fair, that they should receive money out of a fund to which all the home counties around had to contribute. The county of Surrey supported its gaols without calling on the city of London, and the city of London ought to support its own gaols, without assistance from Surrey.

Mr. Alderman Atkins entered into an explanation of the orphans' fund. It was originally 750,000*l.* Blackfriars-bridge was built out of that fund. But the city had contributed ten times 750,000*l.* to the objects of the fund since it was instituted. The money required at present was, for the purpose of giving effect to the recommendation of the house for the improvement of gaols. If the corporation had met their wishes, they had a right to assistance from them. He appealed to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennet) whose humanity had been so active on this subject, whether it had not been indispensably necessary to enlarge and improve the gaol in question?

Mr. Calvert said, he did not see why the county of Middlesex should not be rated to the support of those prisons to which their criminals were committed, but it would be highly unjust to impose a tax on Surrey, which maintained its own prisoners, for the building or repairing of gaols in London.

Mr. Bennet said, that since allusion had been made to him, he must declare, that the new prison in Whitecross-street was one of the worst contrived, and most disgracefully conducted, he had ever seen. The men in that prison were separated—the London debtors and the Middlesex debtors; but the women were all mixed together. As to the pledge which was said to have been given, that the expense of enlarging and improving that prison should be made good by parliament, it was neither more nor less than this: when the committee on gaols visited that prison, they saw a wall which obstructed the circulation of air, and the committee said, that if the wall were pulled down, and it were made to appear, that the money had been expended properly, they would support an application to parliament for that sum. But it did not follow from this, that he should not support the present motion for an inquiry into the manner in which the city had expended their funds. (Hear.) To the questions which had been asked respecting the disposal of their money, answer had been given by an eulogium on their prisons. His hon. friend near him (Mr. Alderman Wood) had stated, that the expense of serving the office of sheriff was 2400*l*. That did not seem to prove any thing as to the question before the house: neither was it material to the question, whether more bread or less was given to the prisoners. But as the hon. baronet (Sir W. Curtis) confessed that he had been mistaken in his statement on a former day, which was on nothing less than the whole point at issue, the house might think it possible, that he had been mistaken in some of his statements on the present occasion. With respect to the condition of Newgate, a gentleman who had recently visited it was of opinion, that his (Mr. Bennet's) account of it had not been over coloured. His object was to impress on the house, that these prisons should be made schools of reform, and not schools of crime; that they should be habitations of health and improvement, not the nurseries of disease, depravity, and every species of misery. (Hear, hear.) He trusted in God that the day would soon come when those dreadful evils would be remedied.

Mr. Grenfell said, he was in no way acquainted with the financial system of the city; but he wished to be informed, whether the effect of the loan now required would be to prolong the duty on coals?

Sir W. Curtis replied, that the duty stood at present till 1837. He believed that the demand of the city would not prolong it for one half-year. It appeared, by the accounts for which he had moved on a former day, that the average expense of the city, in the last two years, for Newgate, the House of Correction, the New Prison, and the Sessions House, was 19,511*l*.

Mr. S. Thornton understood the question to be, whether the city could complete the New Prison without the aid of parliament. As he saw no means of answering this question but by viewing the income and expenditure of the city, he should support the motion.

Mr. H. Sumner replied. He observed, that this tax was limited to 1837, but was to expire so much sooner as the sums charged on it should be paid. The grant now demanded would, therefore, prolong the duration of the tax. He allowed that a rate on Middlesex for the maintenance of the city prisons, might be justifiable, but he saw no reason for charging the other neighbouring counties, which supported gaols of their own. The hon. baronet (Sir W. Curtis) should prove that the corporation of London had clean hands before they came to parliament for aid. Elder brethren of theirs had come to parliament with a similar object, whose hands were not clean. They had given a bribe of 1000*l*. to Mr. Speaker Trevor. In consequence, the Speaker was obliged to put the question of his own expulsion, and he walked out of that house. (Hear, hear.)

The question was then put "that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question." The house divided,

The main question was then put and agreed to, and the account ordered accordingly. Also, accounts, "how the said revenues have been disbursed for the like period, and distinguished under the several heads of rents and quit rents, mansion house, orphans' fund, extraordinary works, necessary charges, foreign charges, courts of conservancy, gifts and rewards, law charges, fees, pensions and liveries, bequests, insurance paid, interest and annuities, purchase of securities, royal entertainments, and prison expenses."

"Of the balances of the several accounts of cash kept in the chamber of London, on the 31st of December in each year, for the same period."

"Of the money received and paid by the chamberlain of London in pursuance of an act of the 54th year of the King, for improving the navigation of the river Thames, from the passing of the said act to the 29th September, 1817."

"Of the arrears of rents and interests due to, and of debts due by the city of London, up to Christmas last."

"Of the produce of certain estates called the Bridge-house estates, and how the same have been disposed of, for the five years ending December 31, 1817, setting forth under what grants or other instrument the same came into the possession of the city of London, and to what uses the said estates were vested."

"Of the monies received and paid by the chamberlain of London, in pursuance of an act of the 52d year of the King, for building a debtors' gaol in Whitecross-street; distinguishing the terms on which the money was raised for the said work, the names of the persons to whom bonds were issued, the expenses that have been incurred either in purchase of lands and premises, or in alteration of buildings that were constructed, and in the enlargement thereof in consequence of deviation from the plans originally submitted to this house; distinguishing also the particulars of the solicitor's or other bills, whereby it may be seen in what manner the sum of 3000*l.* charged for parliamentary expenses, and a further sum of upwards of 3000*l.* for drawing and stamps on bonds, have been incurred."

FORGERIES ON THE BANK.] Sir James Macintosh rose to make a motion respecting Forgeries on the Bank of England. There was a part of his intended motion, as to the expenses of Bank prosecutions, which he should postpone till a future day, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not now in his place. His object was, to bring under the view of the house the evil of the great increase of crimes, arising out of the restriction of Bank payments. For this purpose, he should move for an account of the number of trials, convictions, and executions, for forgeries on the Bank of England, for 14 years previously to 1797, and for all the time since that period. These numbers, since the year 1783, were already in the hands of the house, but he was anxious to have the several periods fairly arranged, and submitted to their consideration. That the convictions and executions were fewer in earlier years, would be admitted without argument. But he could prove to the house a rapidity of increase which must surprise them. In 1812, when the question of continuing the Bank restriction was discussed, it was argued, that prosecutions were much more numerous since the restriction had been imposed. It was easily foreseen that the multiplication of small notes would afford facility, and suggest temptations, to forgery. But if any man had said that forgeries would, in consequence, be multiplied a hundred fold, he would have got no credit for his statement. Yet the fact would be found to prove, that for 14 years preceding 1797, there were only four convictions for forgery on the Bank of England; from that period to 1811, there were 448; so that the number was greatly increased, by the suspension of cash payments, and the profuse issue of Bank-notes. At this time, then, when it was to be deliberated whether the restriction should be longer continued, it was a question of great, of the very greatest importance, to ascertain at what expense of human blood the system was supported. This would be pretty nearly ascertained by the accounts he should move for, as some proportion must have existed between the number of convictions and the number of accusations. The sole object of legislation was to relieve, and to amend mankind. This object they professed to have in view in all their deliberations; yet, he feared, they were grossly inconsistent with themselves. While, by the state-lottery, and the suspension of cash payments, they encouraged and promoted desperate adventures, incurable depravity, and the most fatal crimes, no exertion of benevolence could turn the balance of account in their favour.—He therefore moved, that an address be presented for an account "of the number of persons prosecuted for forging notes of the Bank of England, and for uttering or possessing such notes, knowing them to be forged, from the 1st of January 1816, to the 25th of February 1818: distinguishing the years, the number of such offences respectively, and the number who have suffered death, or other punishment."—Also, an account "of the number of persons convicted of forging notes of the Bank of England, and for knowingly uttering or possessing such forged notes, who suffered death, for the 14 years which preceded the suspension of cash payments by the Bank in February 1797, distinguishing the years: together with the like account, from the said suspension to the 25th of February 1818."—There was another part of the subject on which information was necessary. It might be supposed that, according to the increase of forgeries on the Bank, there was an abatement of forgeries on the coin of the realm. In order, therefore, to ascertain the real increase or abatement of crime, he also moved, that an address be presented, for an account "of the number of persons prosecuted by the officers of his Majesty's mint for counterfeiting the current gold or silver coin of the realm, or for uttering the same, for 14 years preceding the suspension of cash payments by the Bank of England, distinguishing the years, the numbers convicted, and those who have suffered death or other punishment; together with the like account from February 1797 to the 25th of February 1818".

Mr. Bennet suggested, that the motion should be for the numbers committed, or prosecuted, during the several periods.

Sir James Macintosh acceded, and the word 'committed' was inserted accordingly.

Mr. Grenfell said, he should not enter into the merits of the motion, but content himself with expressing his thanks to the hon. mover for his very humane and well-timed exertions. He would only suggest, whether he might not see the propriety of moving, on a future day, for the proportion of small notes on which prosecutions had been instituted. It evidently was important to know what proportion of crimes and punishments arose from 1*l.* or 2*l.* notes.

Almost all who were convicted of these forgeries were low persons, who could not have an opportunity of committing the same crime as to notes of a higher amount.

Mr. Lockhart hoped, that the conduct of the hon. mover would not excite improper commiseration for criminals of this description. No temptation ought to be considered an adequate excuse for great crimes. The great profits of the Bank ought to have disposed them to encourage artists and chymists to try their ingenuity in contriving paper and colours, which could be neither mistaken nor imitated. It was a maxim allowed by all, that the greater the difficulty of preventing any crime, the severer should be its punishment.

Sir James Macintosh said, he should not now enter into any discussion on chymical colours: but he would say, that he was as unwilling, at least, as the hon. gentleman, to prevent injurious and improper commiseration, and as anxious to bring forward nothing that might defeat, or weaken, the just terrors of the law. The question he wished to submit for consideration was, whether the legislature had not, at the time of the suspension of cash payments, brought home temptations of guilt to every bosom. It would then be very important, in the view of continuing the restrictions, to consider whether the most desperate persons, who had forfeited their fortunes and their characters, should be left to this temptation. That no circumstances of temptation were adequate excuse for great and dangerous crimes, was a position which he did not now need to be taught; but that those who supplied the temptation shared in the guilt, was a position which he would not renounce.

After a few words from Mr. Wharton and General Thornton, in support of the motions, they were severally agreed to.

COPY-RIGHT.] On the motion of Sir E. Brydges, an account was ordered "of the number of folio, quarto, octavo, and duodecimo volumes or pamphlets received from Stationers' Hall by the British Museum under the late copy-right act during the last year, from 1st January to 31st December 1817, distinguishing the numbers of each size."

CONSTABLES OF WESTMINSTER.] Mr. Calcraft presented the report of the committee on the petition of the high constable of Westminster, and the petty constables under him. The report stated, that the committee did not think, from the evidence adduced, that the petitioners were entitled to any further remuneration for their attendance on parliament.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

ABSENTEES.] General Thornton, seeing the chairman of the finance committee in his place, took occasion to ask him, whether the revenue withdrawn from this country by British subjects resident in foreign parts, had yet come under the consideration of that committee?

Mr. D. Giddy replied in the negative, adding, that he was not aware of any intention to bring that subject under their consideration.

Wednesday, Feb. 25.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. D. Gilbert, and others, brought up a message from the Commons, requesting that Lord Viscount Melville might attend the finance committee, to be examined as a witness. The messengers having withdrawn, Lord Melville, who was present, intimated his assent. The Lord Chancellor then ordered the members of the House of Commons to be called in again, and informed them, that the noble lord would attend.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.] Earl Fitzwilliam presented a petition of certain inhabitants of London and Westminster against the chimney-sweepers' regulation bill.—Ordered to lie on the table till the second reading of the bill.

On the motion of Lord Auckland, the report of the committee of the house of commons respecting chimney-sweepers (sent up in consequence of a message moved by his lordship), was ordered to be printed.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] The Earl of Lauderdale presented a petition of the burgesses of Wigtoun, complaining of the present set or constitution of that burgh. His lordship stated, that, in presenting the petition, he did not pledge himself to any opinion upon the subject to which it referred.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Earl Grosvenor said, he had a petition to present of Thomas Evans, late a prisoner in Horsemonger-lane gaol, one of the persons who had very properly resisted the measures taken to induce them to enter into recognizances. The petition, which was read by the clerk, and laid on the table, was similar to that presented to the commons from the same individual. (See page 377.)

INDEMNITY BILL.] The Duke of Montrose said, it was his duty to present to their lordships a Bill, commonly called an Indemnity Bill. It was not necessary for him to say any thing in its support in this stage. He should merely propose, that it be now read a first time. On Friday, when he intended to move the second reading, he should submit to their lordships' consideration some observations on the nature and object of the measure.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, he should not have troubled their lordships with any remarks on the noble duke's proposition at the present moment, if he did not conceive that it involved a question of great constitutional difficulty and importance. This consideration induced him to oppose the measure even on the first reading. From the title of the bill, as he had heard it stated by the noble duke, it appeared to be a bill for indemnifying his Majesty's ministers for every act they had done under the suspension of the habeas corpus. The bill, however, for aught their lordships knew, might extend still further. Now, what was the situation in which their lordships were placed? They knew, by the journals of the other house of parliament, that papers had been also sent to that house, and referred to a committee. That committee had not yet reported, and their report might be such as to render any proceeding of the kind now proposed very improper to be adopted by their lordships. It surely was not known to their lordships, that the report of the commons would acquit ministers. It might prove of a very different nature. Suppose it afforded matter on which that house should think fit to impeach ministers, their lordships would then have to sit as judges on a question which they had previously determined. He reminded the house, that, on a former occasion, they had decided, in accordance with the opinion of a noble and learned lord, that they would not entertain a certain measure, because it might come before them in their judicial capacity. On the same ground, this bill was not fit to be entertained; for, if any regulating principle of their proceedings were more to be regarded than another, it was this—that the house ought never to give an extrajudicial opinion. This, then, was a question of great importance to the constitution, and, on that ground, he trusted that their lordships would be induced to delay all further proceedings, until they learned what measures might be adopted by the house of commons. If they approved of the principle of the bill proposed by the noble duke, and read it a second time on Friday next, they might be placed in the situation of assembling as judges, after they had prejudged the question on which they would be called to decide.

The Earl of Liverpool saw no possible ground for delay in the objection stated by the noble lord. Were it good for any thing, it would be equally good against a measure which their lordships had already sanctioned, namely, the appointment of a committee to inquire into the conduct of ministers on the papers which had been submitted to their consideration. This, it was true, was done without any knowledge on the part of their lordships as to what that committee would decide: but the objection that the house ought not to proceed to a legislative measure on the opinion of the committee, was equally strong against referring the papers to that committee, in order that they might give an opinion to the house. The committee had examined those papers with the utmost attention, and had come to an opinion, which was now on their lordships' table. In pursuance of that opinion, his noble friend considered himself bound to introduce the bill which he had presented. Whether that bill was warranted by the report, was the question to be argued on the second reading. The noble lord had put the case, that the committee of the House of Commons might come to a different conclusion from that of their lordships' committee. That was doubtless ... but the supposition afforded no reason ... the progress of the present measure; since, if what the noble earl had supposed should take place, the consequence would be, that the commons would throw out the indemnity bill when it came before them. Besides, the case was by no means a new one, and there was, in particular, on the journals of the parliament of Ireland, a recent precedent for the course now taken. The bill to indemnify his Majesty's servants for their proceedings during the disturbances in Ireland originated in the House of Lords, and it never was suggested there, that it ought to be delayed, until it should be seen what decision the House of Commons came to. It was most unreasonable to argue that their lordships ought to delay a measure which appeared to be the necessary result of the report of their committee, until the other house of parliament came to a decision. Their lordships were not bound to regulate their proceedings by that decision, of which, indeed, they could regularly know nothing, except through the medium of the votes of the House of Commons. Upon the whole, then, the noble earl had not stated any thing that should induce the house to stay the legislative measure now proposed to them. Whatever objections that measure might be liable to, would come regularly under discussion, on the second reading of the bill, on Friday next.

Lord Holland said, he expected that the noble duke would have stated more at length what was the nature of the bill he had presented. He, however, did not mean to occupy their lordships' time with any observations on that point. He now rose merely to notice the answer which had been given to the objection of his noble friend, who had been, it appeared, in some measure, misunderstood. His noble friend had not argued that the house could not entertain this bill. His objection merely amounted to this—that, in a constitutional point of view, it was not proper, nor prudent, to proceed with such a measure when the other house of parliament had still to decide on the question of the conduct of ministers, and when there was before that house a considerable number of petitions, complaining of highly improper and unconstitutional acts. To the argument of the impropriety of proceeding with the measure under such circumstances, the noble secretary of state had given no satisfactory answer. He had referred to one precedent, which appeared to be that which occurred in 1798, in the house of lords of Ireland: but that was the precedent of a measure which had been condemned by the first lawyers in Ireland, and in this country, and which was the disgrace of the parliament that passed it. The reference to such a precedent as that, afforded further reason for a vigilant observance of this bill, lest some of the enormous provisions of the Irish act should be included in it. Without even waiting for the report of the committee of the commons, it was possible, that a member of that house might become possessed of facts, which would enable him to lay on the table articles of impeachment against some of his Majesty's ministers. If such a proceeding were to take place, their lordships would be reading a second time a bill for indemnifying those who were about to be accused at their bar. The noble secretary of state had reminded their lordships, that the commons might reject the bill of indemnity. Certainly they might; but then it was to be recollected, that, besides that rejection, they might also come to the bar with a solemn accusation against those whom their lordships had just declared innocent. If their lordships wished, that their acquittal should be honourable to those in whose favour it might be pronounced, they would adopt the course recommended by his noble friend. Could the people of England think an acquittal honourable and impartial, when it would appear to them that the question had been already prejudged? To delay the progress of this bill was no denial of their lordships' power to originate and pass it. All that was proposed by his noble friend was, that they should suspend further proceedings on it, until after the report of the committee of the House of Commons should be made, and that there should be no reason to suppose that any articles of impeachment would be brought up from that house.

The Duke of Montrose said, that the bill was of the same nature as the bills of indemnity proposed in similar cases, and he saw no reason for delaying its progress on the possibility of some other proceeding being instituted in the commons. It was impossible to tell how long they might have to wait for the decision of the other house; and, upon the same principle, the whole session might be allowed to pass away before the bill was read. He could not, on such grounds, consent to the house depriving itself of the opportunity of proceeding with a measure which they had an unquestionable right to institute, and the propriety of which appeared to him equally undoubted.

Lord Holland moved, that instead of the word "now" for the first reading, the words "this day se'nnight" be inserted.

The question was put, that the word "now" stand part of the question, which was carried in the affirmative.

The bill was then read a first time, ordered to be printed, and to be read a second time on Friday.

Wednesday, Feb. 25.

WATCHMAKERS.] The following petition of watchmakers in Aberdeen was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioners are under the necessity of complaining to the house of a grievance which they suffer in being subjected to the payment of the plate licence duty of 4*l.* 12*s.* per annum, and the only article of plate connected with their trade is the case of the watch, and this article pays a duty to government on being manufactured in London before it comes into their possession, while silversmiths and dealers in silver plate pay only the same licence; the consequence is, that silversmiths now deal in watches, and, as they pay only the same licence duty for all kinds of silver plate as the petitioners do for watch cases, they are enabled to sell watches at a cheaper rate, and have by that means engrossed the trade; the country is now nearly filled with watches, and the principal demand for some time past in Scotland has been from labourers and farm servants, but owing to the pressure of the times, and particularly to the circumstance of the wages of this description of persons being now reduced to about one third part of what they were formerly, the demand has very much decreased, and it is a fact that not one of the petitioners can now gain so much from the sale of watches in the course of a year as would pay the annual licence of 4*l.* 12*s.*; that this tax is unequal, and peculiarly oppressive on the petitioners and watchmakers in general, must also appear from the circumstance that each of them is obliged to pay an annual licence duty equal to what can be exacted from the most extensive silversmith and dealer in plate in the city of London, and should this tax be persisted in, the petitioners must inevitably give up the selling, and confine themselves to the repairing of watches; as this tax bears so hard on watchmakers, and particularly on the petitioners, and as it yields a mere trifle to government, they trust that the house, on taking the grievance into consideration, will see sufficient cause for repealing the act granting the plate licence duty in so far as it affects watchmakers; may it therefore please the house to take the matter into consideration, and repeal the act allowing the plate licence duty in so far as it affects the petitioners and watchmakers in the kingdom."

Mr. P. Moore then moved, that a select committee be appointed "to consider of the laws relating to watchmakers, and to report their observations and opinion thereupon, and the minutes of the evidence taken before them to the house."—The motion was agreed to, and Mr. P. Moore, Mr. Butterworth, Sir W. Curtis, and several other gentlemen were named on the committee. The report presented to the house on the 11th of July 1817, was ordered to be referred to them.

PRIVATELY STEALING.] Sir S. Romilly, after having moved that the act of the 10th and 11th of William III. c. 23, intituled, "An act for the better apprehending, prosecuting, and punishing of felons that commit Burglary, Housebreaking, or Robbery in Shops, Warehouses, Coach-houses, or Stables, or that steal Horses," should be entered as read, stated, that he rose for the purpose of moving for leave to bring in a bill to repeal so much thereof as takes away the benefit of clergy from persons privately stealing goods in any Shop, Warehouse, Coach-house or Stable. It would not be necessary for him to trouble the house at any length, because their opinion on this subject had already been strongly expressed. The bill for which he was about to move, had passed the House of Commons four times; twice in the last parliament, and twice in the present. On the last occasion, the bill passed without any opposition whatever; he might therefore say, unanimously; yet it was in each instance rejected by the other house. In proposing an alteration of the law, it would be proper to take a view of what the state of it really was, according to the mode in which it was at present administered. This might best appear from the returns of the number of criminals apprehended, tried, convicted, and executed. In the course of 12 years, from 1805 to 1817 inclusive, 655 persons had been indicted for the crime of stealing privately in a shop property to the value of 5s. Of these, 177 were acquitted; 113 were capitally convicted, and not one was executed. In the remaining 365 cases, the jury, either finding that the property was not of the value of 5s., or that it was not stolen privately, acquitted the prisoners of the capital part of the charge, but found them guilty of simple larceny. It was evident, therefore, either that these 365 persons had been improperly charged with a capital offence; or that the juries, influenced by feelings of humanity, had, in so many instances, violated their oaths. It was true, there were high authorities in justification of this kind of pious perjury, as Mr. Justice Blackstone was pleased to call it. That learned judge had stated, that the mercy of juries would often make them strain a point, and bring in larceny to be under the value laid in the indictment, when it was really of much greater value. In such cases, (he adds) considering the great intermediate alteration in the price or denomination of money, the punishment of death is undoubtedly a very rigorous law, and made Sir Henry Spelman, (above a century since, when money was at twice its present rate) complain, that while every thing else was risen in its nominal value, and become dearer, the life of man had continually grown cheaper. (Hear, hear.) This practice, however, of acquitting criminals, with a view to save them from the severity of the law, had a most immoral tendency, and he (Sir Samuel Romilly) contended, that it was the duty of the legislature to remove all temptations to it. By the mode in which the law had been recently administered, the crime of shop-lifting had gone on increasing in a regular progression. The extraordinary severity of the law often prevented persons, whose property was stolen, from prosecuting; but, if the punishment of death were taken away, that unwillingness to prosecute would be removed, and, consequently, prosecutions would multiply, and the sentence of the law be carried into force. In considering this subject, it was important to direct the attention of the house to other branches of the criminal law, in which it would be seen, that, under the operation of severe enactments, the crimes intended to be checked had greatly increased. He alluded to the offence of stealing to the amount of forty shillings in a dwelling-house, and still more to those of fraudulent bankruptcy and forgery. With respect to the former, those who were acquainted with the bankrupt laws must know what a number of fraudulent cases had occurred, particularly during the last forty years. By the 5th of George II., c. 30., any bankrupt who refuses or neglects to surrender to his commission, or who conceals or embezzles his effects to the value of 20*l.*, is guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. This was a crime for which it had been long understood, that no mercy was to be expected from the crown. It had been thought, that the interests of trade required, that this law should be most rigorously enforced, and there was only one instance of a person (of the name of Bullock) convicted of it being pardoned, and that under very peculiar circumstances. But the consequence of this had been, that though the crime was very common, convictions of offenders were extremely rare. During a period of 85 years, he believed there had been only four instances of conviction for fraudulent bankruptcy. While the punishment was so dreadful, men were unwilling to prosecute. Creditors were often defrauded, but they came to a determination to leave their debtor to enjoy complete impunity, rather than take the alternative of proceedings which might lead to the shedding of blood. (Hear.) But he was satisfied, that if the punishment were less severe, the number of those who committed such frauds would be considerably diminished. The offence of Forgery had also greatly increased—perhaps by the long existence of so much paper currency, not merely of the Bank of England, but of other bodies, and the general augmentation of the number of paper securities. By a multitude of statutes, the greater part of which had been passed during the present reign, this crime was declared to be felony without benefit of clergy; and, in almost every case, the law had been carried into execution. The severity of the law had not, however, caused a diminution of the crime. On the contrary, the crime had greatly multiplied, and he was persuaded, that its frequent punishment by death, excited a strong feeling of compassion on the part of the public towards the sufferers. Indeed, some recent examples of this punishment had made a deep impression on the public. That day se'nnight two women had been executed for forgery, and that very morning two boys, one 16 and the other 17 years of age, would have been executed for the same crime, had it not been for the exertions of a worthy magistrate and an hon. friend of his, (Mr. Alderman Wood, and Mr. Bennet) who had detected a conspiracy for the purpose of their seduction, and who had successfully pressed a recommendation for a suspension of their punishment. Was it possible that such spectacles as these could have any other effect than to produce, not obedience to the law, but compassion for those who transgressed it? If the sanction of the law was insufficient to prevent the crime, it was calculated to produce the worst effects. There was not only the loss of lives, but the deterioration of moral feeling, which such exhibitions were calculated to occasion. It was the duty of the legislature to inculcate respect, and not disregard, for human life. This sentiment had been much better expressed by Mr. Burke, in speaking of the punishment of a great many persons for political crimes. "Such executions," said Mr. Burke, "only increase the ferocity of men, and teach them to regard their own lives and the lives of others as of little value; whereas, the great policy of government is, to teach the people to think both of great importance in the eyes of God and the state; and never to be sacrificed, or even hazarded, to gratify their passions, or for any thing but the duties prescribed by the rules of morality, and under the direction of public law and public authority." Before he sat down he begged leave to say a few words on a public spectacle, which had been within a few days made at Newgate, of a wretched man who, being accused of murder, had destroyed himself. It was stated in the newspapers of the day, that the mangled and bloody corpse had been exhibited in an elevated situation, with a small gallows erected over it, to which was appended the instrument of destruction. Such a horrid exhibition, he was persuaded, was calculated to produce the most mischievous consequences on the men, women, and children, by whom it was beheld. There was no authority for it. All that it was justifiable to do with the body of a man on whom a coroner's jury had pronounced a verdict of self-murder, was, to bury it without the rites of the church. But it was a grave matter of complaint, that a sheriff, or any other person, should take upon himself to pronounce an individual under such circumstances guilty of another crime, for which he had not been tried (however evident his guilt might appear), and to cause his exhibition in so hideous a form, and in a way so disgraceful to the character of the country, and so injurious to the morals of the people.—The house would well remember the strong and impressive manner in which a late right hon. gentleman of distinguished talents (Mr. Sheridan) had reprobated a similar scene that was allowed to take place a few years ago. (The case of Williams, the supposed murderer of the family of the Marrs.) Such disgraceful exhibitions deserved to be noticed, and he trusted that they would not occur again.—The hon. and learned gentleman concluded, by moving for leave to bring in the bill, repeating his conviction, that the substitution of a milder punishment than that of death, would tend more effectually to prevent the crime of larceny in Shops, Warehouses, Coach-houses and Stables *.

* By the 8th of Elizabeth, c. 4. the offence of privately stealing from a man's person, as by picking his pocket, or the like, (to the value of 12*d.*) was punishable by death. Ten years ago, Sir Samuel Romilly brought in a bill to abolish this offence, and substituted in its place a new offence, one of a much wider description, and which was intended to comprehend a much greater number of cases, namely, that of stealing from the person, whether privately or not. The reason for thus altering the description of the offence was, that the privacy of the stealing requisite to bring the act within the statute, though it did not in truth constitute the heinousness of the crime, had the effect of greatly confining the operation of the law. If the person robbed perceived the theft while it was committed, the Judges held, that it was not done privately; and, in many instances, the very effrontery with which the crime was committed, protected the delinquent from the more severe punishment which the law had appointed. The difficulty of bringing a case within the statute was such, that, though the crime of picking pockets was frequent, prosecutions, or at least convictions upon the statute, even if there had been no reluctance in prosecutors, or juries, to do their duty, never could be very numerous. To remedy these defects in the law, the statute of 48 Geo. III. c. 129, was brought in by Sir Samuel Romilly, and was altered to its present form at the suggestion of Sir Thomas Plumer. It enacts, that persons feloniously stealing from the person, whether privily or not, but without force or putting in fear, and all present aiding or abetting, shall be punished, at the discretion of the court, with transportation for seven years or for life, or imprisoned, or confined to hard labour for a period not exceeding three years.—Sir John Silvester, the recorder of London, in his examination before the select committee appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the state of the police of the metropolis, (June 19, 1816) stated, that "one cause of the increase of felonies is owing to the capital part being taken off from the privately stealing from the person;" and he added, in proof of this assertion, "that there are now many more prosecutions for that offence than formerly."—Sir Samuel Romilly, however, in his examination before the committee, (June 25, 1816) observed, that "he did not believe that the repeal of the act of Elizabeth had caused any increase of the crime; on the contrary, he believed, that as far as it had had any operation, it had prevented the commission of the crime.—The mode in which it had been attempted to prove that the crime had been increased, was, by shewing that there had been a greater number of prosecutions for the offence since, than there was before the capital punishment was abolished. An increase, however, of prosecutions does not of itself prove an increase of crimes. It appeared somewhat a strange mode of proving that any measure had failed of success, to shew that it had produced the very effects which were expected from it. If of 100 offences committed before the repeal, only 10 were the subject of prosecution, an increase of the crime would not be proved by shewing that the prosecutions had increased from 10 to 90.—The consequence of this alteration of the law has been, not only to remove the unwillingness of prosecutors to indict, but to bring within the aggravated crime described in the new statute, a very great number of offences, which even the most willing prosecutors never could have charged as a capital crime, or any otherwise than a simple larceny. Nothing, therefore, can be more calculated to deceive, than to compare the number of persons indicted since the act of 1808, for stealing from the person, with those indicted before the passing of that act, for stealing privately from the person. They are quite different offences."

Mr. John Smith said, he did not wish to state any thing that might take off the effect of what had fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman. Circumstances enabled him to confirm what he had said on some points, especially as to only four convictions under the bankrupt laws. The instances of concealments fraudulently made in bankruptcy were, indeed, innumerable. As to the crime of forgery, it had increased during the last four or five years; and several persons were now waiting to take their trial for that offence. He believed that neither the house, nor the country at large, were aware of the numerous offences of this kind that were compromised and hushed up. Bankers were perpetually liable to the effects of this crime. They had, indeed, formed an association, and appointed a solicitor for the prosecution of offenders; but they were very often moved by pity, and acted contrary to the principles of their society.

Sir John Newport thought, that no stronger proof was necessary, to shew the solidity of his hon. and learned friend's views, than the statement of such numbers of offences being hushed up. He hoped that his hon. and learned friend would persevere in bringing such matters to a conclusion; and he trusted, that noble and learned persons would be induced to pause, before they rejected such important measures.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

PERSONS ARRESTED FOR TREASON.] Sir William Burroughs moved an address, "For a return of all persons arrested, committed, or detained on treasonable charges in the year 1817; distinguishing such as were committed on charges of high treason from those committed for suspicion of high treason or for treasonable practices; and also distinguishing such as were committed by warrants issued by his majesty's secretaries of state from those committed by justices of peace; together with the names, additions, or descriptions of the said persons, their occupations, ages, and places of abode respectively, at the times of their being arrested, as far as the same are known; and a return of the different prisons to which they were first committed and afterwards removed, and of the authority or orders by which such of the said persons as were not brought to trial were released from confinement: together with the respective dates of their arrest and release; distinguishing such as were required to enter, and did actually enter, into recognizances before justices of peace for their appearance after being released, and such whose recognizances were afterwards vacated, and the dates of their being so vacated, at the desire or on the motion of his majesty's attorney-general."—Ordered.

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.] Mr. Macdonald asked, why a new writ had not been moved for Southampton, in the room of George Henry Rose, esq. who had accepted the office of clerk of the parliaments, and who had actually appointed a deputy to execute the office?

Lord Castlereagh replied, that the fact of Mr. Rose's having accepted that office was not before the house.

Sir M. W. Ridley rose, and moved a new writ.

After a few words from Mr. Tierney, and Mr. Curwen, Lord Castlereagh moved, that the discussion on this point should be adjourned till Friday. At present, there was no document before the house on the subject.

Sir J. Newport observed, that when a member accepted the Chiltern hundreds, no document was required. Here it was notorious, that the individual in question had accepted the office, and had appointed a deputy.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that this was only surmise. Would the hon. member who moved for the writ, take on himself to say, on his own knowledge, that Mr. Rose had performed any act in the execution of the office of clerk of the parliaments?

Sir M. W. Ridley acknowledged that he was not prepared to take on himself this responsibility; but he had been informed, on good authority, that Mr. Rose had appointed a deputy. Mr. Rose's name was in the patent for the reversion of the office in question.

Lord Milton recollected, that when the present Lord Lindsey was member for Staffordshire, a new writ was moved for General Bertie, who had become Earl of Lindsey. A doubt, however, arising, whether he would actually succeed to the title, the writ was superseded, and no injury was done to the representation. But, in the present case, the house was actually deprived of the representative for Southampton, who must be presumed to have accepted the office of clerk of the parliaments, as his name was inserted in the patent for the reversion to that office.

Mr. Abercromby said, that, under the circumstances which had been stated, he would recommend his hon. friend to allow the matter to stand over till Friday next, in order that it might be ascertained, in the mean time, whether Mr. Rose had accepted the office. (Hear, hear.)

The question was put from the chair; and it was carried, that the debate should be adjourned till Friday.

Mr. Macdonald then moved, that the speaker do issue his warrant to the clerk of the crown for a new writ for a member to serve in this present parliament, for the borough of Christchurch, in the room of the late George Rose, Esq. Ordered.

PARDON OF CONSPIRATORS.] A Member said, that seeing a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst) in his place, he wished to inquire, whether there was any truth in the information which he had lately received on visiting Newgate, namely, that Brock, Power and Pelham, three men capitally convicted, about a year and a half ago, of being accessories before the fact to coining, had been discharged on a free pardon (hear, hear)? If this was the case, he wished next to ask the right hon. gentleman, whether he had any objection to the production of the opinion of the judges on which a free pardon was granted to those men? The house would recollect, that, about eighteen months ago, three poor Irishmen were convicted of coining, and that it afterwards turned out, that these poor men were employed by Brock, Pelham and Power, who set them to work, for the purpose of procuring their conviction. Brock, Pelham and Power were then tried, and convicted of being accessory to coining before the fact. But he understood, that a doubt had arisen in the mind of some of the judges, on the trial of a police officer (Vaughan) for a similar offence, whether, as the law stood, a person could be convicted of being accessory before the fact to coining; and the point was accordingly reserved for the opinion of the twelve judges. His only object now, was to obtain satisfactory information with respect to the ground on which those blood-hounds had been let loose on the public to commit similar crimes (hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Bathurst said, the hon. gentleman had stated the result in this case quite correctly. It had been found by the twelve judges, that, as the law now stood, it was impossible to convict those persons of the offence for which they were tried. The law officers of the crown, how greatly soever they might wish such criminals to suffer the execution of the law, had found that they could not be brought to punishment. He was glad that this matter had now been agitated, as it was desirable that the public should know the ground on which those persons had been liberated. At the same time, he begged to state, that the law-officers had been desired to take into consideration the necessity of introducing an act for the amendment of the law in that particular. With respect to the opinion of the judges, on which those men had received their pardon, it did not exist in such a shape as to be laid before the house. This was all the explanation which he was enabled to give to the statement of the hon. member.

Sir Francis Burdett conceived, that in a matter of such consequence as the pardon of these wretches, it was highly proper that the opinion on which it was granted should be produced to the house. He apprehended, that, without an opinion of the judges distinctly pronounced, the ministers of the crown had no right to advise a free pardon. He trusted, therefore, that the pardon in some shape or other, and the opinion of the judges, would be laid before the house.

The Attorney-General begged to state the particulars of this case. A police-officer of the name of Vaughan, who was prosecuted for the crime of being accessory to coining before the fact, having been found guilty, the point whether, as the law stood, a person could be so convicted, was reserved for the opinion of the twelve judges, and, in the meantime, certain other persons, who stood in a similar situation, were prosecuted, and found guilty. The case of the first of these persons, and not that of Brock, Pelham, and Power, came to be argued before the twelve judges in the exchequer chamber, and the judges thought, that the facts charged did not amount to the crime imputed to him. Though the case of Brock, Pelham, and Power, had not been argued before the judges, it was exactly of a similar nature with the other, and it was deemed advisable, that a pardon should be extended to them. The person whose case had been argued before the twelve judges had also been convicted on a charge of a different nature, of a conspiracy to procure the commission of certain crimes; but Brock, Power, and Pelham had only been convicted of the crime which he had already mentioned. He had since applied his mind to the subject, but he found some difficulty in framing an act to reach such cases. The prosecution against Brock, Power, and Pelham, had been carried on by the city of London with great assiduity; and, with respect to the law officers of the crown, he could assure the house, that there never existed a more serious and anxious desire of bringing persons to justice. (Hear, hear, hear, hear.) But, when the law came to be discussed, and most ably and gravely it was discussed, some very nice points arose, and the learned judges were of opinion, that judgment could not be executed. The offence was enormous, and could not fail of being held in the greatest abhorrence. The persons, he admitted, deserved to suffer the most condign punishment, but the law was defective; and, under such circumstances, they were pardoned.

Lord Stanley was proceeding to offer some observations, when Lord Castlereagh rose to order. There was no motion, he said, before the house; and no benefit could arise from prolonging the conversation.

Mr. Brougham said, he was not satisfied with the explanation which had been given respecting this extraordinary case. It had been stated, that Brock, Power, and Pelham, had received a free pardon; but he wished to know, whether they were not to be indicted for a conspiracy to seduce the poor Irishmen to commit a capital offence?

Mr. Bathurst said, it was not in his power to give any further explanation on the case of these persons.

Lord Milton wished to know, in what manner this case had come before the twelve judges. He conceived this to be a most important point, and it ought to be distinctly stated.

The Attorney-General observed, that on the trial of Vaughan, an objection had been taken on a point of law, and this point, the learned judge who presided on the trial, reserved for the opinion of the twelve judges. The opinion of the twelve judges, after hearing counsel on this point, was what he had already stated.

Lord Milton asked, whether he was to understand that the point had been reserved in the case of these three persons? (No, from the ministerial bench.) Then he was to understand, that the point had been reserved on the trial of another person, and that the case of these persons was so similar to that in which the twelve judges had given their opinion, that his Majesty's ministers, without any point being reserved in their case, had advised a free pardon to be given to them. It struck his mind that they had acted rather precipitately in this case.

The Attorney-General said, it was considered that the first decision decided also the second case. Under these circumstances, it became the duty of those who were concerned for the crown to take care that the sentence of the law, in the case of Brock, Pelham, and Power, should not be carried into execution, however they might abhor the crimes of which those persons had been convicted.

Sir F. Burdett was about to offer his opinions on this case, when

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to order.

Sir F. Burdett said, the right hon. gentleman would not gain any thing by this mode of proceeding; for, in a very few words, he could make a motion which would detain the house more than two hours. He wished to know why those persons had not been indicted for a conspiracy to take away men's lives for money?

Mr. Bathurst, in reply, stated, that he had given all the information in his power.

USURY LAWS.] Mr. Serjeant Onslow gave notice, that on the 8th of April next, he should submit a motion to the house, respecting the laws which prohibit the taking of interest for money, or limit the rate thereof.

CORONERS' REWARDS BILL.] Mr. Mellish moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Dickinson, Mr. Curwen, and Mr. Shaw Lefevre, contended, that an increase of allowance to coroners was unnecessary, and highly objectionable.

Mr. Mellish argued, that the allowance to coroners was at present very inadequate.

Mr. P. Moore perfectly concurred with the hon. gentlemen who had preceded him; and, to prevent any further discussion, he moved, that the bill be read a second time on this day six months.

General Thornton rose to second this motion. Two years ago, he found that inquests had been holden without any occasion for them, and that the county of Middlesex had been subjected to very unnecessary charges. If this bill were suffered to pass, the same sort of practice would be carried into other parts of the country.

The question was then called for, and strangers were ordered to withdraw.

For the second reading . . .	13
Against it	30
Majority	17

The bill was thus lost.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] An account was presented "of all interest paid on exchequer bills in three years, ending the 5th of January 1817, distinguishing each year, with the average thereof."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.] Mr. Macdonald rose, and begged to ask a question of the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bathurst) whether the report of the secret committee would be presented this evening?

Mr. Bathurst, in reply, said, that a point had arisen late in the day, which had prevented the committee from coming to a conclusion. He thought it probable, however, that the report would be presented at the next sitting of the house.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTH DAY.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was ordered, that the house should adjourn over to-morrow, it being the day appointed for the celebration of her Majesty's birth.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Feb. 27.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Earl Grosvenor presented a petition of Samuel Bagguley, of Manchester, complaining of his treatment under the act for suspending the habeas corpus. It was to the same purport as that presented to the commons on the 16th instant. (See page 411.)

INDEMNITY BILL.] Lord Holland presented a petition, purporting to be from the lord mayor, aldermen, and livery of London, in common hall assembled, praying that the bill of indemnity might not pass into a law. His lordship said, the petition was signed by the lord mayor, two aldermen, and twelve common-councilmen, which, he understood, was the number requisite to constitute a common hall of the city of London.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that the petition could only be received as the petition of those who had signed it.

The petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table, merely as coming from the lord mayor, the two aldermen, and the twelve common-councilmen who had signed it.

The Duke of Montrose then said, that in rising to move the second reading of the bill of indemnity, it appeared to him necessary, as a justification of the measure, to refer to the circumstances which had caused it to be brought forward. In doing this, he should have to trouble their lordships by recalling to their recollection what had been the situation of the country during the last session, and for some time previous to its commencement. He might, perhaps, by some, be thought to deviate from the object under consideration, by the period to which he was disposed to trace back the circumstances which had rendered the measures adopted in the last session necessary: but he could not refrain from referring to the alarming symptoms of disorder which had prevailed in some parts of the country for several years past. Their lordships were well aware of the atrocious transactions which took place in the disturbed districts of Leicester and Nottingham, where the destruction of frames and houses, and the perpetration of murder, were carried on by a regular system, to the astonishment and terror of the country. Many of the persons, who had suffered for these crimes, had confessed, that an organized plan had existed for destroying frames and other property, and that even a price was put upon men's lives. It had been acknowledged, that there was a plan for shooting the judge (Mr. Justice Graham) upon the circuit, and that money had actually been raised for carrying that plan into effect. While these alarming symptoms prevailed, clubs of various names and descriptions, and union societies, had been formed in different parts of the country, under the pretence of seeking a reform in parliament. These clubs communicated with each other, and with associations of the same kind in London. They even appointed delegates to assemble in the metropolis. The institution of these clubs was followed by public meetings held in different quarters of the country, at which the most inflammatory and seditious language was used. Having reminded their lordships of the situation of the country under this dreadful system, he now came to that recent period which had been unfortunately marked by the loss of trade, and the decline of manufactures. There was then no regular employment for that useful class of men, the agricultural labourers. Many of the country banks had stopped, the farmers had no sale for their produce, and, consequently, were no longer able to pay their rents. At that most extraordinary and distressing period, meetings of the nature of those to which he had already adverted took place in the metropolis, and various parts of the country. Their lordships would recollect the two which had been held in Spa-fields. The second of these had led to robbery and assassination, if not to high treason. That alarming disturbance was soon followed by the atrocious insult and attack on the person of his royal highness the Prince Regent, which took place while he was in the act of proceeding to exercise his royal functions in that house. After that transaction, their lordships and the other house of parliament thought fit, in consequence of the general state of the country, to appoint a secret committee, to inquire into and report on the evidence laid before them. The opinion of those committees had been solemnly recorded and sanctioned, and, upon their report, a bill was introduced and passed for suspending some part of the act of habeas corpus, namely, in its application to the apprehending of persons charged with designs against his Majesty's person and government. That bill was opposed, and underwent much discussion. It was asserted, that the existing laws possessed sufficient strength and energy to protect the constitution; and it was asked, why resort to the measure then proposed, when the disturbances complained of could be suppressed without it? His answer was, that those who proposed the suspension of the habeas corpus were not afraid of the constitution. They did not apprehend that the constitution would be overthrown. They had no fear that their lordships would be interrupted in the exercise of their functions, or that the succession of the throne in the house of Hanover would be altered. All the fear which the supporters of the bill had, was for what might befal the unfortunate persons, to guard against whose misconduct its provisions were framed. It was for the sake of those infatuated men, for the sake of humanity alone, that the suspension of the habeas corpus act had been proposed. And here he would ask their lordships, as a noble lord had emphatically asked when the bill was in progress in that house, whether they did not think it better to prevent crimes than to punish them? His noble friends were perfectly sensible, that, in the ordinary state of the law, they could have put down every disturbance which had taken place. They could have easily employed force enough for that purpose; but, then, it must have been employed at the expense of thousands of lives. Their lordships, therefore, passed the act for suspending the habeas corpus on the ground of humanity, as well as for securing the peace and tranquillity of the country. With a view to those objects, it had appeared to them indispensably necessary; and, in passing it, they must have looked forward to the introduction of the present bill, which was the natural consequence of their agreeing to suspend the habeas corpus act. The present bill was merely a corollary deduced from that which had preceded it. Their lordships had hoped, that the first act for suspending the habeas corpus, which had been passed during the last session of parliament, would have been sufficient to restore tranquillity to the country; but, in this, they were disappointed, and it had been found necessary to renew it. Public meetings, of a seditious and inflammatory tendency, continued to be held; and one, in particular, of a very alarming description, took place at Manchester. At that meeting, it was proposed to petition the Prince Regent; but the petitions were not to be conveyed to the foot of the throne in the usual manner: they were to be carried up to the metropolis by large bodies of persons, who evidently intended to seek their object, not by prayer, but by alarm, or force. What would have been the consequence, had those men been permitted to proceed on their march from Manchester? They would, in all probability, have committed numerous robberies and murders on their way; and it was impossible to foresee what mischief might have been the result of their project, had they been suffered to come near the metropolis. He did not wish to rest the introduction of the present bill on precedent; the ground on which he proposed it was, necessity. Their lordships could not avoid passing it: for, as the circumstances to which he referred justified what had already been done, this measure must necessarily follow. Their lordships were called upon to pass the bill in justice to his Majesty's ministers, and the magistrates who had acted upon the suspension of the habeas corpus in the disturbed districts, and to whom, in his opinion, the thanks of parliament, and of the country, were due. If their lordships did not pass this bill, they would never again have the opportunity of preventing insurrection. They might, indeed, put it down, when it broke it; but that suppression could only be accomplished by a military force, and by means, perhaps, of an enormous waste of human blood. From the papers which had been laid before the committee, he was certain that the magistrates had performed the duties which were imposed upon them with the greatest prudence and humanity. (Hear, hear.) He doubted whether all the persons who ought to have been apprehended had been taken into custody, and detained. (Hear, hear, hear.) Some of their lordships might be surprised at this observation; but, if they had examined the papers as he had done, they would be of the same opinion. He should not trouble their lordships with any further observations, conceiving that the circumstances which he had recapitulated sufficiently proved, that the proposed measure was one which they were bound to sanction.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he did not rise for the purpose of attempting to persuade their lordships to reject this bill, but to call their attention to its character and extent, which were eminently deserving of consideration. Affecting as it did the rights and properties of the people, it inflicted, in conjunction with the bills of last session, a serious wound on the constitution. He was, therefore, of opinion with the noble duke, that it was impossible to separate the consideration of the present bill from those which had passed last session. But, notwithstanding what had been said, he could not believe that the noble duke intended to maintain that the passing of the present bill was a necessary consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus act. The noble duke, surely, could not think of supporting that proposition. Were it possible to conceive that the present bill could be regarded as a necessary consequence of those which had been passed in the course of last session, it would then be no profitable employment of their lordships' time to consider what had been done under those acts, which, however, the noble duke had thought a fit subject of discussion. But, if it really were intended that the present bill should be a consequence of the measures of last session, would it not have been more candid and manly to have said so when those measures were introduced? No such declaration had, however, been made. On the contrary, their lordships, at that time, heard nothing from ministers but repeated boasts of their responsibility. According to the noble duke, however, nothing was more distant from their minds, than that they should be responsible.

The Duke of Montrose rose hastily, upon which there was a call of Order, from the opposition. The noble duke said, he meant to explain, and that the present appeared the most proper time for what he had to say. The words he had used did not go to the extent to which the noble marquis had interpreted them. Their lordships had passed a bill, in the hope of avoiding the necessity of proceeding further. If their lordships had not approved of the conduct of ministers, they would not have invested them with the same powers by a renewal of that bill. Though the present measure was, according to his view, a necessary consequence of those passed in the last session, it was not strictly so, unless the house approved of the conduct of ministers.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he believed that the expression of the noble duke was, that the bill was a corollary of those which had preceded it. Certainly, it was not what he should call a corollary, nor did he understand how the noble duke could so call it, if it was to depend upon the conduct of ministers.

The Duke of Montrose begged that he might not be represented to have said what he did not mean to say. He did not use the word corollary in the sense imputed by the noble marquis: all he meant to state was, that if the ministers had acted upon the measure of the last session, and acted properly, that an act of indemnity ought to be a necessary consequence.

The Marquis of Lansdowne resumed, observing, that with respect to the definition of the term corollary, he did not exactly agree with the noble duke: he attached a different meaning to it. He was ready to admit, that, if the measures of last session had not been acted upon, there would have been no need of this bill, as a consequence, or corollary, of any sort from the former. It would, however, still be necessary for their lordships to inquire into the state of the country, both before and after those acts were passed, in order to ascertain how far it was proper to press the bill before them. The grounds on which the former bills had been passed were stated in the reports. It was asserted, that a spirit of sedition and insurrection prevailed throughout the country, and that there existed plans in the metropolis, in the midland counties, and in Scotland, for resisting the laws, and overturning the constitution, by violence. Now he maintained, that unless this intended violence was not only proved, but proved to have existed to such an extent that the ordinary laws of the country were incapable of overcoming it, all the pretences which had been alleged for suspending the habeas corpus act were unsound and fallacious. With respect to the state of the metropolis, the report recently laid before their lordships said little, though from what was said in it, as well as from what had been said in former reports, some inference bearing on the present measure might be drawn. He was willing to give his concurrence to that part of the report which stated, that there were still some disaffected persons engaged in projects in London. He was not only bound to make this admission, because the statement had his concurrence, but because it formed a part of the grounds of his objection to the measures which had been adopted, as well as to that now proposed. Their lordships must perceive, that if there really existed in London such a disposition, those who cherished it must, indeed, be very few in number. It had produced no effect; and, notwithstanding the powers given to the noble secretary of state, and his vigilance in detecting treason, he had found no persons whom he thought so dangerous as to render their arrest necessary, except the two Evanses, the Spencean philosophers. All the other leaders of the disaffected in London had been allowed to prosecute their dangerous projects without any interruption. The case to which the late measures had been applied, was one of leaders without followers; and not that to which alone a measure of suspension could be properly applied, a case of followers without leaders. How a suspension of the habeas corpus act could deprive leaders of a body of followers, he would leave their lordships to conjecture. If there had been leaders, they would have been able to effect something. Every advantage they could desire had been offered to their designs. During a year of unparalleled distress, they had repeated opportunities of working on the passions of the people of London. But, after all, they had been able to effect nothing; every day saw them with diminished hope, and diminished forces: and when it was most important for them to call their ranks together, they could never, at any one point, muster more than 50 or 100 individuals out of a population of 800,000 people. He mentioned this as most decisive of the weakness of those persons to whom so much power to produce mischief had been imputed. He mentioned it as most decisive of the state of feeling in the population at large; because, if any experiment could be tried on the temper of society, (he was far from wishing that any such experiment should be tried), none could have afforded a more decisive result than this, where mischievous men had been at work through a whole year of great public distress, and, at the end of it, were found to have failed in producing any effect from all their machinations. But it was perfectly true that there had been, and might still be, persons actively employed in diffusing violent and erroneous opinions; and it was singular, that the persons most actively employed, as mentioned in the two reports of last session, were incapable throughout of proportioning the means to the end; they never once appeared to consider with what insufficient means they thought to compass their projects. In all the circumstances, in all the bearings of these proceedings, it would have been much more effectual, if parliament had conferred the extraordinary powers on the governor of Bedlam, rather than consign the objects of their fears to his Majesty's prisons; and so much easier would it have been to convict them of madness than of treason, that it would never have been necessary for Dr. Monro to call on the house for a bill of indemnity. (Hear, hear.) This, then, was the case of the disturbances that had taken place in London.—He should now come to the case of the midland counties, as set forth in the reports of the last year, and of the present session. In the midland counties, as elsewhere, (notwithstanding the state of London was such as he had just shewn), it was generally believed, that a large body of people were ready to co-operate with any who should join them. How that belief obtained ground he would not now discuss. That it had been produced, in Yorkshire especially, by that delegate from London, better known by the name of Oliver (hear, hear), was undoubtedly true; but, to what extent other parts of the kingdom had been misled by inflammatory speeches, and the writings of persons resembling madmen, (for madmen they did resemble), what portion of the expectation was derived from the latter, and what from Oliver, he could not pretend to say. He certainly was bound to state that Oliver exceeded his instructions; and he wished their lordships to observe this, because the evidence which shewed the improper instigation of Oliver, was of the same nature as that on which several persons informed against by Oliver had been arrested, and if there was any objection to the one, the same objection must apply to the other also. In both cases, the evidence was that of parties concerned in the transaction. But, after all, what was the extent of the disturbances that occurred in those counties? Their lordships would read, in the report of the committee, a detail of what took place near Derby, and of the insurrection that broke out in Yorkshire; they would find how small was the number of the rioters, and with what extreme facility they were put down; indeed, the object had rather been to overtake than to put down sedition: they would find what was the disposition of the inhabitants of the neighbouring counties, and of the surrounding villages, in the very centre of all the disturbances that had taken place. Instead of any large body of men being ready to join the insurgents, the people in the villages were utterly averse to it: some of them were compelled by force to join the insurgents, but the rest positively refused, and remained at home. Such was the extent of that insurrection; and, whatever its amount might be, no diminution of it was effected by the suspension of the habeas corpus. In Derbyshire, the suspension had afforded no check whatever to the disaffection that existed. The disturbance there took place under the reliance which the discontented of that district had on their leader; it took place on the nomination of Brandreth, called the Nottingham captain, who was appointed to command the expedition. Here, then, was the whole extent of the operation of the suspension acts in that county.—He knew it would be said, that if it had not been for the operation of that measure, the same disturbances would have taken place in other counties. But he would ask, in estimating the extent of such a possible insurrection, even in places where the disaffected possessed the strongest hold—he would ask if, even in those places, it could not have been put down with equal facility; if there would not have been found in each of the adjoining counties one magistrate, one captain, one serjeant, and eighteen men, for no more of each had been employed (hear, hear,) to quell the whole force of the disaffected in Derbyshire? But the noble duke had insisted, that the object of government was to prevent insurrection, rather than to put it down. Had the noble duke considered the consequences of arming a government with arbitrary powers, under the pretence of preventing crimes? Had he reflected on the abuse of imprisonment, the false information, the insecurity of persons and of property, which always ensued? It was of the very essence of a free government, that offences should be met only by the laws, and that the offenders should be brought to trial in the regular administration of justice. He had stated, on supposition, that if similar insurrections had taken place in all the counties, they would have been put down in a similar manner. But what did really happen? It appeared, that some persons attached to the left wing of the grand insurrectionary army in Derbyshire, had committed burglaries in Yorkshire—they had broken open houses at Huddersfield, and stolen arms. These formidable rebels (a laugh) were apprehended without any difficulty; they were arrested without any exercise of the powers conferred by the suspension of the habeas corpus, and were afterwards tried at York; but, in consequence of the prevarication of an old woman, the only witness, they were all acquitted. But, according to the former reports, it was not from Yorkshire alone that the deluded persons at Derby expected to receive support; they expected it from Scotland also, and their expectations had certainly not been frustrated by any exercise there of the extraordinary powers conferred on ministers. When those reports came out, it was stated, that all the manufacturing districts of Scotland, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and a variety of other towns, were equally implicated in the conspiracy to overturn the laws and government of the country. Ministers intended, that the suspension acts should extend to Scotland, but their lordships were aware, that, in consequence of the wording of those acts, such doubt existed on the subject, that it was not thought proper to apply them to that part of the kingdom. And what was the consequence? In Derbyshire, where they expected great clouds to come from the north, no movement took place, till the suspension act had passed. In Scotland, which was left to the course of its own law, there was no movement at all! What were we to infer from this? In Scotland, where the remedy could not be applied, the cure had been most complete. Insurrections had taken place in Derbyshire, where the extraordinary powers might have been supplied; and none in Scotland, where they had not been used. He had now stated the situation of the metropolis, of the midland counties, and of Scotland. The result was, that in the metropolis, without any exercise (except as to the Evanses) of the extraordinary powers vested in ministers, any danger that might originally have existed had been gradually diminishing. In the midland counties, an insurrection took place, and treason was aroused to its full developement, but was attended with no evil, even to those in its immediate vicinity. In Scotland, where the suspension had never been acted on, the country presented a scene of unbroken tranquillity. He said, tranquillity, because the trials that had taken place in Scotland had afforded no proof whatever that the tranquillity of that part of the empire had been even menaced. He must consider it as an extraordinary proof of tranquillity, that, after all the instances which had been adduced of a disaffected spirit prevailing there: after all the representations of his Majesty's ministers, and the various allegations in the different reports; after all that had been stated of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and the manufacturing districts, his Majesty's law officers, with all their ingenuity, could bring only four persons to trial. The first was an old clergyman, (the Reverend Neil Douglas) who was charged with having used seditious expressions in the pulpit, which, of course, were not difficult of proof, because they were used before a public assembly; and yet the verdict was "not proven." Two other individuals were tried for having used seditious expressions at a public meeting; all of which, in the sentence of the court, amounted only to "indecorous, absurd, and improper expressions." The only remaining person tried in Scotland was Andrew M'Kinlay, who, (after conduct on the part of the crown prosecutor to which he should not now advert, but which, he thought, loudly demanded a separate inquiry,) (hear, hear, hear,) was returned to his family, the jury having pronounced a verdict of "not proven" to the charges brought against him. These were the only cases which the ingenuity of the law-officers of the crown in Scotland could rake together; and it was evident from these, that not the slightest symptom appeared in that country of any insurrectionary movement. Having now stated what was the situation of the country at the time of the suspension of the habeas corpus, he begged to remind their lordships, that he had set out with undertaking to dwell only on that statement which went to shew that there had existed any real danger to the government of the country; because it was unnecessary, in any case but that of actual violence, to have recourse to a suspension of the habeas corpus. He had on a former occasion stated, that if the house, instead of inquiring for designs of violence, and searching out for treason arrayed, had only inquired, whether erroneous and mischievous opinions existed, and to what extent, they would have found, that whole classes of people were affected by foolish and erroneous doctrines; but he hoped that he should not be told, that such opinions were to be repressed by the measures of an arbitrary government. On the contrary, it was clear, that those absurd and erroneous notions were principally caused by the pursuit of such arbitrary measures, and by the withholding of public justice from the jurisdiction it ought to exercise over offences. Such proceedings formed the noxious aliment on which those opinions were nourished, and it was by adhering to such proceedings, that the surest handle was afforded to those who were disposed to inflame and mislead the public mind. (Hear, hear.) He was firmly convinced, that if the assailants had been more in number, and greater in power, than the most alarmed had ever imagined, the true citadel in which to resist and defy all their attacks was, the citadel of our law. (Hear, hear.) This tower of strength, built by our ancestors for the protection of the monarch, of the nobles, and of the people, had been handed down to us, sanctioned by time and the accumulated wisdom of ages, and, as long as England existed, would be venerated by all that was great and good in it. (Hear, hear.) Let their lordships adhere to the law, and they would be safe. Let the danger be what it would in appearance from any seeming spirit of discontent, if they confined themselves to the public forms of justice, if they exerted themselves to defend the regular and impartial administration of the laws, they might rely upon the support of the people, and would preserve the constitution unimpaired, amidst the gratulations of the great majority of the nation, notwithstanding every shock by which it might be assailed. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was in vain to conceal, that considerable discontent existed amongst a numerous class of individuals; but it was a most important object for their lordships' consideration, whether the appearance of arbitrary measures, whether the appearance of injustice towards individuals, did not materially contribute to increase that discontent; whether, also, that increase was not aided by the want of that publicity, with regard to charges against individuals, which was justly considered as a most essential part of the liberties of the country. Let them revert to the known and established laws of the country, under which all persons accused had the advantage of a free and open trial, and much of that discontent which now prevailed would probably be done away. (Hear, hear.)—This led him to the particular measure now under the consideration of the house; a measure which, in character at least, was an additional invasion upon the laws of the country. (Hear, hear.) He said, additional, because the suspension of the habeas corpus, however violent and improper, was a temporary measure, while this would have a permanent effect, to the end of the lives of those who had suffered under the former measure, and would be appealed to as a precedent in future. He had said before, that he thought it impossible for any noble lord to contend, that a suspension of the habeas corpus should necessarily be followed by a bill of indemnity; but if reason were not sufficient for such an assumption, he was also borne out by historical precedent. The habeas corpus act had been often suspended; but, in 1722, Sir Robert Walpole, a minister who ought to be mentioned with respect, would not call for any bill of indemnity. After other suspensions, different bills had been proposed and adopted, but none to the extent of the present, except in 1801, or that of Ireland in 1798; which he did not mention, because he hoped the transactions of that dreadful period would never be called a precedent for any proceeding whatever. If, then, it appeared to their lordships, that under one suspension similar to that of last year, no indemnity whatever had followed; if they considered not only what provisions the present bill contained, but what persons were chiefly affected by it, he trusted they would pause before they proceeded. Their lordships were in possession of the report made by the committee. When that committee was appointed, he had suggested that it should be armed with power to make a complete investigation, and to send for papers, persons, and records. It had afterwards been proposed to refer the various petitions from parties aggrieved to the consideration of the committee. Whether that had been acceded to, or it had been understood that the committee should have power to send for papers, persons, and records, was of no material importance; but he considered it worthy of their lordships' attention to have made a full and impartial inquiry, or still to make it, before they passed a bill which affected the interests of so many who claimed redress, which professed to exclude them from that redress, and set aside the whole intent and effect of equal laws. If their lordships hoped to satisfy the public, they could not proceed to pass such a measure without completing the inquiry. If such inquiries were inseparable from indemnity bills in general, they were more especially necessary in the present instance. He did not say that he should oppose an indemnity in all cases of suspension; but he entreated their lordships to look at the provisions of the bill before them. It provided an indemnity, not only for those who were authorized to commit and detain under the suspension act, but for all persons who, since the 1st of January last, had detained any parties whom they might suspect, however unwarrantably, of being disaffected towards his Majesty's government. (Hear, hear.) It included, not only secretaries of state, privy councillors, and magistrates, but also all officers, spies, (hear, hear) informers, every one, in short, who might in any manner have contributed to the detention of persons suspected, however unjustly, of treason. Would their lordships at once invade and annihilate the legal rights and claims of a description of persons so large as those who had been affected by the late extraordinary measures, without affording them an opportunity of making their complaints heard, and holding out a hope of some redress to those who, under every precaution, might have fallen victims to misrepresentation or mistake? Let their lordships consider to what an extent such an indemnity would operate. They knew not, indeed, nor could they know without inquiry, how many persons, who had been outraged or injured, would be thus precluded from obtaining redress by the laws of their country, who would be thus shut out from every channel through which they could obtain the slightest remedy for the grievances they had sustained. Measures which went to set aside the laws of the country, might, in the way of precedent, operate upon persons yet unborn; and it behoved them to take the most sedulous care that gross injustice was not committed, in order that it might not be drawn into precedent, to operate, perhaps, still greater injustice at a future period. The committee had done their duty, but the duty committed to them was only that of inspecting papers submitted to them by the Prince Regent. (Hear, hear.) He would ask their lordships, whether it was not due to the interests of those who were affected, and to the honour of the house and the country, to interpose such a delay as might afford time to the parties interested, to be heard at the bar of the house; to abstain from further proceedings in this measure, if their complaints were worthy of attention; and if not, to dismiss them without retaining a cause for complaint. He begged to remind their lordships, that, pending a bill of indemnity in the time of William and Mary, all petitions from parties who had been imprisoned were referred to a committee to inquire into their merits, and he could produce the names of all the petitioners. Why that course should not now be adopted, he had yet to learn. He knew it might be stated, and with some chance of approbation from many noble lords, that the individuals affected were worthless. Certainly, with respect to those he had heard of, he could not, even before the committee sat, think very highly, and the result of that sitting had not prejudiced him in their favour; but the distinguishing feature of government by law, was, that every individual, however bad his character might appear, was to be presumed innocent, until the contrary should be proved. And, in truth, there was no individual more interesting than he who, smarting under obloquy, appealed to the tribunals of the country, to justify his character. Such a person, however low his station in the community, however worthless his reputation might be thought, was an object of greater interest than any one of their lordships basking in the sunshine of fortune; and let it be recollected, that, in this measure, was concerned the fate, not only of many such individuals, but also the hopes and happiness of many who were yet unborn. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was the duty of the legislature to prevent men from being deprived, under any hasty analogy, of the benefit of laws and privileges which they inherited by birthright. He was not now disputing the propriety of entertaining the bill at all, (it might or might not be a necessary appendage to the last act of the legislature, to which it referred): he only asked their lordships not to deprive men of their rights, not to extinguish every hope of redress, by adopting this measure, without some inquiry more full and extensive than that which they had hitherto been satisfied with. He entreated them to adjourn the question for one fortnight; it could expose them to no inconvenience, as the ex post facto law they were proceeding to pass would cover all the interval, and it would afford time to deliberate on the claims of parties who had been aggrieved. He therefore moved, that, instead of the word "now" for the second reading, the words "this day fortnight" be inserted.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that as far as the speech of the noble marquis related to the particular provisions of the bill, as this was not the proper time for discussing them, he should postpone what he had to submit in reply upon that part of the subject till the house should have gone into a committee. He should then be prepared to shew, that the provisions of the present bill did not go beyond those of other acts passed under similar circumstances. These, however, were matters of detail which could not be satisfactorily examined, except when the house should be enabled to consider whether any and what amendments were necessary. The question of this night was, whether the principle of the suspension act, founded as it was upon the report of a secret committee of that house, sanctioned by the subsequent report of another committee, and succeeded by the report now upon the table, rendered it proper to pass an indemnity bill of the general nature of that proposed by his noble friend. And here he must remark, that the noble marquis had, he was sure, unintentionally, mistaken and misrepresented the argument of his noble friend, who had never meant to contend, or to say, that an act of indemnity was a sort of corollary, or a necessary consequence of an act for suspending the law of habeas corpus. His noble friend's meaning was, that, after the inquiry that had taken place, and the report which was presented, a bill of indemnity seemed to follow as a corollary to such investigation and report (hear). How, then, did the question stand? It could not be denied, that, for some time previous to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, a feeling of great alarm, whether well or ill founded, pervaded numerous classes of society. Many sensible persons entertained a persuasion that great danger existed. Parliament thought it necessary to inquire into the fact, and the result of that inquiry was, a similar persuasion on their part. The danger appeared to them so formidable as to require that ministers should be armed with power to take up persons suspected of high treason, and detain them in custody in a manner not authorized by the ordinary law of the land. Parliament had deemed it necessary to adopt the same course in other cases, no matter whether few or many, when the constitution was threatened with danger. In those cases they appointed committees, and acted upon their reports. The same course was pursued on the present occasion. Their lordships appointed two committees, at several periods, during the last session. The first committee recommended, that extraordinary powers should be invested in his majesty's government, and the second committee recommended a further extension of those powers, under the circumstances then existing. At the commencement of the present session, on the first day of meeting, his majesty's government came down to the house, and stated, that those powers were no longer necessary; that the causes which existed during the last session happily existed no longer, and they proposed the immediate repeal of the measures under which they had acted for the protection of the country, and which would have been in force more than a month longer, had they been permitted to run to the limit prescribed by the enactments. (Hear.) If any one in that state of things had moved for a bill of indemnity, it would have been as a corollary to such proceedings, and not to the mere act of suspension. But that was not the course which ministers pursued. They were anxious to lay every information with respect to their conduct before committees of the two houses of Parliament, in order that they might know, how they had exercised the powers entrusted to them, generally and particularly, and judge from them how far they were entitled to such an act as they now applied for. They did not ask for it as a necessary consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus act, but on the ground of the belief expressed by the committee, that the powers intrusted by parliament to their discretion had not been abused. That was the ground upon which they now stood before parliament and the country. The noble marquis had observed, that it was impossible to detach the consideration of the present bill from that of the habeas corpus suspension act. To a certain extent, he was willing to admit the truth of this proposition; but, in some respects, the two questions differed materially from each other. It was possible that an individual might admit the existence of the danger, but deny that the measures adopted in consequence were a proper or defensible remedy. Yet, according to his judgment, such an individual would be bound to vote for a bill of indemnity, because the question was not now upon the expediency of granting those powers, but upon the fact, whether or not those powers had been abused by the persons to whom they were entrusted (hear). If parliament was of opinion that such powers were necessary at the time, it would not be fair to say to the executive government, "I will try you, not by the opinion of parliament, but by an opinion of my own (hear, hear). I will not take their judgment upon the subject of expediency, but I will form a judgment for myself, and, according to my impression upon this previous consideration, I will determine to grant, or to withhold the bill." This would not be a fair proceeding, even if the suspension of the habeas corpus act was not clearly made out to be a necessary and justifiable expedient. But he should not avail himself of such an argument. He was prepared to maintain, that its necessity was distinctly proved by the transactions of the last session, and by every thing that had since happened.—The noble Marquis had traced the internal state of the country, from London through the different districts, and had offered a few observations with regard to Scotland. He had said, that the number of persons arrested in London was extremely small. That circumstance he did not mean to dispute; but did it follow from thence, that many were not concerned in exciting disaffection? He would not say that the danger was greater in London than in any other part; but he would beg their lordships to recollect what was the state of the metropolis in the months of November and December 1816, and January 1817, when the meetings were held in Spa-fields. The noble marquis was not, he believed, in England at that time, and was not, therefore, personally a witness to the danger that threatened this town; but he (Lord Liverpool) was not exaggerating the description of it, when he stated, that apprehension was visible in every face, till the alarm was sounded in parliament. It was possible that ministers had reason to be fully persuaded, that the disaffected were governed by able and active leaders, without possessing the means of bringing them to justice. But the noble marquis knew that some of them were placed on their trial; and was it nothing that the peace of the country had been secured, that apprehensions generally entertained had been allayed, that confidence had been every where restored? He would undertake to state, with reference to this town in particular, that the alarm which was excited among the disaffected by suspending the habeas corpus had materially checked their proceedings. It had the effect of abashing their boldest advocates, of defeating their schemes both here and in the districts, of forcing them to distrust their cause, and, what was often of greater importance, to distrust each other (hear). Such were the consequences which all the accounts received from different parts of the country concurred in stating to have attended the operation of the suspension-act. One great advantage of the act was, that it furnished the means of securing the peace of the country by the sacrifice of few or no victims. (Hear, hear.) The state of London, and of the country generally, at the close of the year 1816, and the commencement of the following year, rendered precautionary measures indispensable, and the creation of discretionary powers, for a limited period, an act of the most obvious policy.—At the same time, he thought it important to declare, in the discussion of a question so nearly affecting the liberty of the subject, and in a prospective view, should future emergencies make it necessary to resort again to the same expedient, that he had never contended that the mere existence of a dangerous and nefarious conspiracy would justify a suspension of the habeas corpus act. When his noble friend (Lord Sidmouth) and himself were connected with a former administration, a conspiracy of the most malignant nature had been discovered—he alluded to Colonel Despard's plot; but no bill of suspension was proposed, because the conspiracy was regarded as an insulated act, not extending to other places, or ramifying into other and no less dangerous designs against the safety of the government. He was ready to admit that no local disturbance, or partial mischief, would afford sufficient ground for the adoption of so extraordinary a measure. It was upon this principle that the secret committee which sat in 1812, to inquire into the disorders and outrages committed in the midland counties, and into the nature of the Luddite associations, although they recommended new legislative measures, did not deem it necessary to suspend the habeas corpus act. However wicked and mischievous the practices of those persons were, and however disaffected many of them probably were to the constitution of the country, their plans were not immediately directed to the overthrow of the government and laws. But the conspiracy which had been proved to exist during the last year, was not confined to London, or to the individuals professing the Spencean principles, but was a systematic and organized plot, carried on simultaneously at London, at Manchester, at Leicester, at Nottingham, at Derby, and throughout the whole of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The persons acting together in the prosecution of this common design, were avowedly disaffected, and threatened the subversion of the constitution. He well knew that the danger was materially increased by the peculiar circumstances of that period, and it was this consideration which rendered it an act of mercy to protect unhappy individuals from that delusion, which their private distress rendered more than ordinarily powerful. All these facts had been proved, not only by the reports of the secret committees to which the evidence had been referred—although that, he conceived, must satisfy their lordships—but had been proved in courts of justice, and according to the established laws of the country. The law of England would not be what it was, and what it ought to be, if it did not admit the possibility of a conspiracy being fully proved, whilst the person accused of it was acquitted. He was far from being disposed to reflect upon verdicts of acquittal, nor was he willing, when a jury of the country said not guilty to a prisoner, to bear hard upon him in any comments which his case might seem to suggest; but their lordships must be fully aware, that a jury might often conscientiously acquit a prisoner in cases which left no doubt of the existence of guilt somewhere, although, from a defect of legal evidence, they did not feel warranted in finding a different verdict. But there had been other trials which had terminated in convictions. Those trials not only brought to light the circumstances attending the insurrection in Derbyshire, under the Nottingham captain, but shewed that a rising took place at the same time, on the 9th of June, at Nottingham, and although the insurgents were comparatively few in number, they were armed, and formed in military array, marching to join each other. On the same day, a similar rising took place at Huddersfield. These proceedings were not caused by a scarcity of provisions, nor had for their object the destruction of any private monopoly, but were parts of a concerted plan and system, organized throughout the most populous districts of the kingdom, with the view of overturning the established government. The noble marquis had said, that this conspiracy was not prevented by the suspension act, but he would ask, if the suspension had not taken place, was it not probable that the Derbyshire conspiracy would have assumed a very different character, and terminated in a very different way? (Hear, hear.) The noble marquis had put it to the house, whether they were in all cases of insurrection to suspend an act so important to the preservation of our liberties? He (Lord Liverpool) did not mean to say so, and the cases he had mentioned (those of Despard and the Luddites) shewed that it was not the system pursued by his majesty's government. It appeared to him, that it must always be left to the wisdom of the legislature to decide, according to the nature of the existing evil, whether it could be remedied by due course of law, or required the adoption of some strenuous exertion beyond its ordinary powers. It must always be a question of degree; and, in the late instance, the danger was of that extent and degree which justified parliament in the view they had originally taken of it. A dangerous spirit had prevailed, not in one place or county, but spreading through many counties, though sometimes stronger in one than in another, not confined in point of time to a day, or a week, or a month, but continuing unabated from December 1816, to June and July in the following year. With regard to the extent of the conspiracy being caused by the misconception under which one party laboured as to the means and force of another, it was natural that the leaders should over-rate the chances of success, and make exaggerated representations of every kind, in order to raise the hopes of their followers. This, he apprehended, was a course which those who were labouring to excite disaffection seldom failed to pursue. He should say but little respecting the conduct of a person (Oliver) who had certainly been employed by government, and who, it was alleged, had promised the conspirators in the north support from

London. He had great reason to doubt the truth of those statements, and he noticed them only to shew that they did not at all affect the present question. The conspiracy had existed for weeks and months before that person went into the country.—The state of Scotland had been alluded to, and it had been inferred, that the danger in that part of the kingdom could not have been great, because the suspension-act had not been enforced: but those who were acquainted with the ordinary powers of the law in Scotland, knew that they differed materially from those of England, and they had for that reason been found adequate to the emergency. Upon all these grounds, he contended that a case was clearly made out in justification of ministers. As to the argument which went to underrate the danger, on the ground that those concerned in the traitorous designs were few in number, he thought it could have very little force. When a conspiracy of this kind was in existence, when distress had disposed the minds of the lower orders to disturbance, who could undertake to say what numbers might have been concerned (hear)? Who could undertake to deny that there might not have been tens and twenties of thousands? Those who recollected what had passed in 1780, must know what a few hours might produce in collecting numbers for purposes of disturbance, and how possible it was, even from beginnings the most trifling, to produce a degree of confusion which might last for days, and even weeks, and render the most violent measures necessary to restore the peace of the country. When persons assembled for purposes of outrage and violence, it was impossible to say, if their career was successful, by whom, or by what numbers, they might be joined. A noble lord opposite well knew that the formidable riots in the year 1780 were commenced by a few boys and old women. Evils of this kind, if they were not likely to endanger the stability of the government, might, if not instantly and vigorously checked, shake the peace of society to its foundations. With respect to the argument, that a state could not be revolutionized without the agency of men of rank, he thought we had lived in times when such a doctrine could no longer be advanced. Even in former times, many passages in our history would be found to discountenance the opinion that there was no danger to be apprehended from conspiracies which were confined to the lower orders; but, in our own days, with the example of France before our eyes, with the example of what had passed in Ireland, he did not expect to hear property and consequence insisted on as necessary to render disaffection dangerous (hear.) The question, however, now was, whether a danger had not existed which made it wise, with a view to the public safety, and humane, as respected culpable but unfortunate individuals, to vest a power in the executive government, which might indirectly, and by its very name, operate to put down the mischief, without having recourse to measures of the last severity. In this point of view, there never had been a measure of preventive justice which had repressed evils of a more extensive or heinous nature. His firm and thorough conviction was, that, under all the circumstances, it was a measure of humanity as well as of justice. He agreed with the noble marquis, that even those who thought the suspension of the habeas corpus necessary, might differ as to the propriety of passing the present bill. The bill did not follow as a matter of course. The conduct of ministers had been referred to a committee, falsely said to be a committee of their own friends. They were anxious to place in it those who differed from them in opinion, as well as those who agreed, and this committee, so constituted, had made their report, in which they stated, that all the arrests and detentions which had taken place under the act were necessary.—The noble marquis had alluded to the act of 1801, by which the habeas corpus was suspended. He would allow, that, looking at the character of the danger which then existed, at the state of the public mind in this country, and at what was passing in France, the danger was greater at that crisis than during the last year, when the same measure was resorted to. But there was this to be also observed, that, during the whole of the period of the former suspension, there was no insurrection in the country. It was to guard against a secret poison which infected the minds of men, that it was tried on that occasion; but, in the late instance, it was to guard against the consequences of an immediate insurrection. Acts of insurrection had taken place in every case, according to the intelligence they had received, except in one, and in that one it was prevented. The noble marquis had said, that the danger was so remote as to render it uncertain, whether it would ever arrive. In that he would agree. But ministers now came before parliament with the report of the committee, which stated, that they were justified in the steps they had taken. Might they not, therefore, ask, under the sanction of this report, —"Why will you not give us the same protection which you gave in 1801?" It was not given to the magistrates then, for they did not want it; but in 1715, and in 1745, they did want it, and they had it (hear.) Any one who knew the history of this country must know, that, in many instances of this nature, the government would find it necessary to act upon information which they could not afterwards produce in evidence, consistently with their public duty. It was to prevent the necessity of bringing forward such evidence, that bills of indemnity were passed. Were any question to arise as to the manner in which they had exercised the powers entrusted to them, a ground might be made out to justify the refusal of such a bill; but as that was not the case in the present instance, he felt confident, for the reasons he had already stated, that their lordships would reject the amendment of the noble marquis, and agree to the motion, as originally proposed by his noble friend.

The Marquis of Lansdown briefly explained. He had never argued that indemnity was the natural result of the suspension of the habeas corpus act, or that those who either supported or opposed that suspension were bound, in their support or opposition, to the act of indemnity. What he had said was, that it became necessary to recur to a full examination of the state of the country, in order to ascertain how the powers with which the government had been entrusted were exercised; and whether any difficulties subsequently existed which prevented such a disclosure of evidence, as in a court of justice would have been considered sufficient to warrant the detention of the persons imprisoned.

Lord Erskine said, the question immediately before their lordships was, whether the bill should be read a second time now, or be deferred, according to the suggestion of his noble friend, for a fortnight. The noble earl (Liverpool) had endeavoured to establish, that the risings and insurrections alluded to in the report were of a magnitude sufficient to justify the suspension of the habeas corpus act. Admitting, for a moment, that he had been successful, what influence could it have on a question wholly distinct—a question which went to ascertain whether the powers entrusted to the noble secretary of state, under the provisions of that act, had been either abused or exceeded? (Hear, hear.) If such powers had been abused or exceeded, it would be most preposterous to maintain, that, because their lordships, on an impression of danger to the public security, passed a certain act, individuals who had suffered in property, character, and person, under the abuse of its provisions, were to be shut out from that legal protection which, from time immemorial, was the birthright of the people of this kingdom. Their lordships, he trusted, would never accede to such a proposition. Were their lordships prepared—and if they passed the bill now before them, such a result must follow—to afford impunity to every false, wicked and malicious informer, to shelter every dark and mercenary incendiary, by taking from the persons aggrieved by such criminal designs, those remedies which the law of the realm had provided? His noble friend, the secretary of state for the home department, might feel in his own mind, that, so far as he was instrumental in carrying the law into effect, no abuse of authority had taken place; but could his noble friend answer for those subordinate persons to whom unlimited power over the liberty of the subject was delegated? Could he answer for the truth of those informations which were given by every malicious and sanguinary spy? (Hear, hear.) For his noble friend he had long entertained the sincerest regard. Were that noble lord now upon his trial, he would be a most willing witness to his humanity and tenderness, although, in his conscience, he believed him, in the recent instances, to have been greatly imposed upon by the artifices of bad men. (Lord Sidmouth signified his dissent.) His noble friend dissented. That he had been deceived, was still his full conviction; but, altogether disregarding that fact, were the noble secretary his own brother, a twin of the same birth, he never would consent to the passing of any act of indemnity, until he had first read and examined the evidence. (Hear, hear.) Their lordships must remember, that when these proceedings were first adverted to in the present session of parliament, they were asked to refer the full examination to a committee of the house, selected without any regard to party distinctions. Of the committee that was appointed he was not disposed to speak with feelings of disrespect. On questions of general importance, unconnected with any particular prepossessions, no men were better calculated to form a mature and enlightened judgment. But when the question was, whether those entrusted with dangerous authorities had abused or exceeded their trust? When it was notorious, that men were arrested and imprisoned for months, some of whom, without trial, were discharged upon their own recognizances—that many were the victims of dark and mischievous machinations—when such was the extent and character of the inquiry for which the secret committee was selected, he must ask, whether the manner in which that selection was made, was, under all the circumstances, a proper mode, or was at all likely to satisfy the expectations and solicitude of the country for impartial investigation? (Hear.) For his part, he would only say, that, if he himself were upon his trial, he should like to have for his judges such a majority of friends as his majesty's government had on the secret committee. Such a construction of the committee might secure a release from responsibility, but it neither established innocence, nor would it satisfy the demands of the country. What would the noble lords opposite say to the proposition, if such had been made, of having the prisoners at Derby tried by the very traitors with whom they associated? (Hear, hear.) And yet the prisoners at Derby might have said, with as good grace as ministers, "we will not be tried by a jury of our countrymen,—we will not allow any challenges to be made,—we will be tried by our fellow-traitors." The house would bear in mind, that, in the last session, when his Majesty's government submitted these restrictive laws to its consideration, he told them to beware of these intricate pursuits—he solemnly urged them to oppose to temporary outrage the constitutional correctives of the law. Had they acted upon those suggestions, they would have secured the attachment of all the sound and enlightened minds in the country—they would have drawn around them all the men of property, whose best and firmest security must ever be found in the due and impartial administration of justice—they would have obtained the support of those who looked for constitutional reform, because to the success of such a cause there could be no greater obstruction than outrage and turbulence—no greater enemies than the abettors of such mischiefs—they would have entitled themselves to the gratitude of those who, on all exigencies of the state, look to parliament for redress; and, in obtaining such support, they would have attached to themselves a host of friends. By a vigorous administration of the law, those insurrections would have been effectually repressed, and a vigilant and spirited magistracy would have stood in no need of being confounded in a bill of indemnity with wicked and malicious incendiaries.—He was glad to hear the noble earl (Liverpool) say, that he should abstain from any comments on the decisions of juries. The expression of a regretted and enlightened friend of his (the late Mr. Windham) respecting the persons tried at the Old Bailey, in 1794, appeared to him very reprehensible, and had always given him pain. If those persons, who were acquitted by a jury of their country, were to be called "acquitted felons," with equal propriety might it be said, that the Derby traitors were convicted innocents. Other individuals, charged with treason, had been tried, but the whole of them were acquitted, and the nation rejoiced in the verdicts of the juries. "It is," said his lordship, "the character of the people of this country, and long may it continue to be their character, to rejoice in the acquittal of fellow-subjects arraigned for grave crimes against the state. But, unless the government puts itself in the wrong, such acquittals are received with sober feelings of gratification. If they ever degenerate into violence, it is from some appearance of injustice that excites disapprobation." But it was now unnecessary to enter into proofs of the general loyalty of the people. The report of the secret committee expressed a decided conviction of it. The language of that report, and he begged their lordships to attend to it, was as follows:—"The committee have the satisfaction of delivering it as their decided opinion, that not only in the country in general, but in those districts where the designs of the disaffected were most actively and unremittingly pursued, the great body of the people have remained untainted, even during the periods of the greatest internal difficulty and distress." What more decisive evidence of sound, unshaken loyalty could be exhibited in any country in the world? How different was the state of public feeling at the period of the French revolution, when theories of government were afloat in the minds of men; some of whom were little acquainted with the principles of the monarchical part of the constitution?—But he did not rely on the report of the secret committee alone for evidence of the untainted state of the public mind. He had a more powerful illustration of it, as appealed to in his royal highness the Prince Regent's speech at the opening of the present session, on the lamented death of the presumptive heir to the crown—a death which involved the whole country in the deepest affliction, and for which, like the children of one common parent, the whole population of our land shed tears of distress and commiseration. (Hear, hear.)—After all that had been said of the great danger which threatened the town and country, he should like to hear, in what system of violence the cause for all the alarm existed. From the present report he could glean nothing but the outrages in Derbyshire; and of their character, what said the report? It said—"this insurrection, of small importance in itself, is a subject of material consideration, as it was manifestly in consequence of measures detailed in the two former reports." Thus it was, that one report was brought to bolster up a previous statement, but nothing intrinsically dangerous in either could be traced or established. But, surely, if discontent prevailed, such measures as those now before them were not calculated to diminish it. To refuse to adjourn the further proceedings as proposed by his noble friend, and thus to shut out the people, who had suffered, from legal remedies, was the most certain mode of exciting, if not a greater disaffection, a greater unpopularity to the government. His noble friend, the secretary of state for the home department, could not divest himself of his responsibility; by the course now pursued he increased it; in not availing himself of the means of defence, and satisfying the country that his conduct was justified by the necessity, he made that responsibility double. Were their lordships prepared, by yielding to the motion of the noble duke, to lay it down as a proposition to be hereafter maintained, that oppressions and hardships, no matter how great, carried into effect by the most wicked and malicious of men, were to pass with impunity, because that house had agreed to suspend for a time the provisions of the habeas corpus act? Did his Majesty's ministers mean to avow such a proposition? Did they think to establish such a principle, on the flimsy pretext that the noble secretary had made out a case to a jury of his own selection, or, in fact, to himself sitting in judgment on himself? (Hear.) If such principles as these were to be acted upon, he would contend, that the measure of this night would entail a greater danger on future times than any we had yet experienced in the annals of our history. No words could faithfully express his regard for the dignity of their lordships' house. In the correct administration of justice, its character had never been aspersed. By an honest exercise of that sacred function, it had secured the affection, and the reverence, of the whole people. Were they that night, pending an inquiry by the other house of parliament into the conduct of those who were accused of oppression, to set the example of indemnifying men who said they were innocent, but who might be guilty? On that guilt, or innocence, their lordships might, in their judicial character, be hereafter be called upon to decide, and should they not pause before they acceded to such a bill as was now proposed—a bill that went to a greater extent than any of a similar precedent—a bill, that in one sweeping provision protected every kind of oppression and abuse in the exercise of arbitrary power—that denied to the aggrieved the remedy of the law—and that cancelled, without a full and rigorous examination, all personal actions, suits, indictments, and prosecutions heretofore brought, or now depending, or hereafter to be brought, and all judgments thereupon obtained, and all proceedings whatsoever against any person or persons, on account of any matter, act, or thing, done or advised, directed, ordered, or commanded to be done since the 1st of January 1817. He should most deeply lament it, if their lordships should not accede to the motion of his noble friend, to examine all the petitions which had been presented, as well as those which would still be presented, before they passed a bill of indemnity. If they once passed the bill now before them, those petitions could not be examined or taken into consideration. What then, he would ask, were the people of England to think of their lordships, if they passed a bill of indemnity against charges, the extent, proof, enormity and wantonness of which they refused to inquire into? (Hear, hear, hear.) No man in the British empire was more devoted than himself to the constitution of the country, but let them beware of venturing beyond the endurance of a free people. A free people must be governed on free principles. (Hear.) He would, therefore, support an adjournment of the subject—he would do all in his power to procrastinate, to retard, and, if possible, to prevent a measure which, in his conscience, he believed to militate against every principle of freedom and of justice. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The Lord Chancellor said, he must take that opportunity of giving his reasons for supporting this measure. The indemnity arose necessarily from the suspension act. The suspension went to the preservation of our constitution, which constitution few lords had reason to be more pleased with than himself and the noble and learned lord who had just sat down. Of the adjournment he should speak afterwards; he would now make some observations in reply to the arguments of the noble and learned lord. While he did so, he hoped that his learned and noble friend would receive whatever might drop from him with that indulgence which he was always disposed to feel when his noble friend spoke. (Hear, hear, from Lord Erskine.) It was allowed on all hands, that there were cases which required a suspension of the habeas corpus, and cases which were entitled to an act of indemnity. There had been many such cases. He had said, at the time of passing the last bill of suspension, that an indemnity would follow it, and he had used that as an argument to awaken their lordships to a proper view of its importance. That act of suspension was a most important measure; but it was a necessary measure; and an act of indemnity should now follow it, as its natural consequence. It was now a century and a half since the habeas corpus act was passed. (In the reign of Charles II.) It formed the great bulwark of our liberties, and the pride of our constitution. But that very act would have caused the greatest danger to the constitution, if parliament could not control parliament; if what was then enacted could not, on occasions, be suspended. He was old enough to have more than once known this to be so. Since the reign of Charles II. there were periods of danger which proved the necessity of occasional suspensions of the habeas corpus. His noble friend had read that part of the report which represented the great body of the people to have been sound, and triumphantly asked, if that did not prove the suspension to have been unnecessary? But he would ask his noble friend—the friend of the people—whether the great body of the nation were not sound in the reign of William III? Yet the suspension of the habeas corpus passed three times during that reign, and they were respectively followed by acts of indemnity. The acts of indemnity then passed were in the same words as this bill, and they referred in like manner to individuals. The individuals were, indeed, of a different description; but the principle was the same. Those acts did not say, that an indemnity was calculated to prevent inquiry into individual cases; they did not deny, that there might be individual grounds of complaint; but they admitted, that there were violations of law, and went to justify and cover them. If their lordships considered the principle of the suspension, they must be aware, that it went to give powers, which, without an act of suspension, would be unjust. Those who acted under it, therefore, injured individuals; but it was for the public safety, and from public necessity. Then, surely, from the same principle from which the suspension was necessary, it was necessary to take away from individuals the right of complaining, or prosecuting for the exercise of it. But not only were acts of indemnity passed in the days of King William—the days of freedom and popularity,—but also in 1715 and 1746. In those years, too, they were passed in the terms of the present bill. The proceedings under the different suspensions were justified from the exigency of the juncture, and it was judged right, that a peaceable, good subject, should not prevail in an action for unjust imprisonment, where it was for the benefit of the country that he should not prevail. Salus populi, suprema lex, the public safety, the highest object of law, was the salutary principle of such measures.—It had been said, that the London Corresponding Society was not so dangerous as the report had represented it to be. This the house could not inquire into. When a great number of the lower orders of people thought that the constitution, as consisting of king, lords, and commons, could be dispensed with, this was more dangerous than any particular society, or any party question. In 1795, the habeas corpus was suspended. No act of indemnity followed. In 1798, the suspension was renewed, and, in 1801, a bill of indemnity was proposed. It was strange, that not a single action was brought, nor complaint made, after the first suspension had expired. In fact, not a word was heard, until the act of indemnity was proposed. After this, would any noble lord say, that the indemnity ought to be refused, on account of the petitions which had been presented? The question, then, was, whether the suspension was necessary? An adjournment had been moved for a fortnight. For what purpose? Could the noble lords in that time bring forward reasons to resist the indemnity? No reasons could justify the refusal of indemnity, if the suspension was necessary. He should say, then, that the suspension act was necessary, because parliament passed it—not on the recommendation, for it did not recommend any measure, but, on the report of the secret committee. Remarks had been made in that house, and out of the house, respecting the secret committee, in language extremely unfit to be used towards them. That their lordships should act on the report, no man denied. Was not the report, then, warranted and correct? Did they think the committee such a pack of rogues and vagabonds as would not report fairly upon the facts before them? No committee could be less objectionably formed, while the constitution of the house remained such as it was. Whether a committee were chosen by ballot or by vote, it was, in truth, the same thing, and he should, therefore, say nothing on that point. Well, then, upon the report of the committee, the suspension was necessary. According to some, there was but a little riot in Spafields, and a foolish mob in the streets; but they forgot what was prevented on those occasions. Parliamentary reform was the ostensible object. For his own part, he was satisfied with the constitution as it is. It was a constitution to which we owed our civil happiness, our domestic happiness, our public prosperity, our foreign credit, and many other benefits. He felt astonished that those who were in the secret of those things, should pretend ignorance of the real intentions of the reformers. The Whig side of the house was in greater danger from them than the other side. With respect to many noble lords on that side, the doctrine was, that an open enemy was better than a false friend. When he said this, he meant no disrespect to any noble lord on that side of the house, and particularly to the noble mover of the amendment. He therefore affirmed, that that person must have a stout heart, who, living in London or Westminster, did not feel a very, very serious alarm indeed, on the day of the second meeting in Spafields; and, as to the subsequent trials, he would say, that those who should not submit that proceeding to a jury, would be guilty of a great dereliction of duty to their king. The rebellion in Derbyshire had been also spoken of as insignificant. But what would the rising have been, if their captains in other parts of the country had been left at large? (Hear, hear.) Were they for reform? No, that was downright nonsense. They were for the overthrow of the constitution; they were for marching to their object through blood and murder; it was neck or nothing with them. This was fully proved by the evidence which terminated in the conviction of many of them. To the suspension act, therefore, more than to any thing else, the tranquillity of the country was owing. That measure was not intended for any problematical effect; it was called for, and justified, by the state of the country. It was mild, merciful, preventive of much disturbance and misery, instead of being the occasion of misery. If the noble lords near him were to say, that if the petitions against indemnity were taken into consideration, they were prepared to act upon them, he would not accede to their proposition. Their proposition would be entitled to more attention, if the principle of the present measure were such as any petitions which had been received, or which might have been received, could possibly overthrow. The principle of the bill, however, was, that no redress ought to be given for unjust imprisonment under the suspension. If he, [although innocent, had been taken up and confined on suspicion of treason, he should give way to the public safety: he should patiently bear the hardships of his fate for the good of his country. But the main ground of the measure was, that ministers could not disclose the evidence on which they had acted. On this ground, the bill of indemnity was most reasonable. If an examination of those persons who gave evidence was the object of those who opposed the bill, that was the very thing which could not be disclosed. If their object was the examination of those who complained, that was useless and beyond the purpose. A noble earl (Grosvenor) for whom he entertained great respect, had on a former night expressed a wish that the depositions should be given without the names. He wished the noble earl had been in the profession in which he and his noble and learned friend (Lord Erskine) were, and he would know, that every one perceived at once, from the nature of the deposition, who it was that made it. He must, then, repeat the proposition, that the necessity of the suspension, and the safety of the country, precluded those who complained of sufferings under the suspension. This proposition he felt himself bound to state, although it gave him great pain that such a proposition must fall from his lips. He was sorry that any man, imprisoned or accused, should not have an opportunity of knowing his accuser; but, on the other hand, he felt most forcibly the necessity of refusing that opportunity, with a view to the future safety of the country.—With respect to the several clauses of the bill, upon which a noble lord had thought proper to observe, that he (the Lord Chancellor) would express some doubts, he could inform the noble lord that his calculation was erroneous. For while he admired the act of Charles II. as one of the most valuable privileges of a great and free people, he was convinced that this country could not have so long continued great and free, if it had not been for the disposition of its parliament and people, whenever occasion required, to submit to a temporary sacrifice of their liberties, for the purpose of securing the permanent enjoyment of them. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Lord Holland said, that the question under consideration was, whether the bill should be read a second time this evening, or upon a future day; but to this question it was not his intention to confine himself, because so much matter connected with bills of this description had been introduced in the course of the discussion, that it was difficult to speak upon it without wandering into other topics. In the first place, he should endeavour, in a calm, dispassionate manner, to point out the motives and character of the bill, and the motives and intentions of the report on which it was founded. The noble and learned lord on the woolsack had reposed with great satisfaction on his precedents; but these precedents were at entire and complete variance with this measure. None had thought fit to characterize this bill; none had clearly told their lordships what it was. The learned lord had contrived to embarrass the subject, rather than to elucidate it. The noble duke, when he introduced it on a former night, said, it was a bill, commonly called an indemnity bill. It was commonly called an indemnity bill! Before it was introduced into the house, before it was fledged to carry itself into execution, the noble duke, who had been most sedulously hatching this portentous act, named it, " The commonly called indemnity bill." A Spanish monk had discussed with much learning a subject which monks did not dislike to discuss. The holy father had treated the subject in a very indelicate manner; it was more delicately stated in an English work (Tristram Shandy.) There it was argued, with much learning and gravity, how far it was lawful, and proper, to baptize a child before it was born. The noble duke, without hesitation, thought it lawful and proper to baptize this bill before it was born, and he named it, " the commonly called indemnity bill." (Much laughter.) Let the house, then, examine what the bill before them really was: what were its objects and effects; and how it bore on the allegations by which it was supported. If those allegations were well founded; if ministers had only done their duty under the suspension act; if they had arrested no person but upon oath; if, in short, they had not exceeded their powers, and committed injustice, under pretence of preserving the laws and constitution of the country, with the care of which they were intrusted, then they had no need of indemnity. Indemnity was only necessary in cases where law would yield no protection; but where there had been no oppression, there was no breach of law, and, consequently, no use in the present measure. If an indemnity bill, as had been mentioned by the noble duke who introduced this measure, was always to be a corollary, as he called it, to a suspension act, then it would follow, that any just exercise of the powers conferred by the latter must necessarily be an excess; or, in other words, that an act of parliament could not be executed without being abused. (Hear, hear.) This argument of the noble duke appeared to him to cut double, and, therefore, was as dangerous in his hands as against him. But other noble lords had defended the bill on different grounds. They said, it was necessary to protect the government against suits or actions, instituted to recover damages, by those whom they had oppressively arrested and detained; because, in allowing legal proceedings to go on against them, it would be necessary for their own justification to disclose the information on which they acted. What was this but stating, in other words, that the noble secretary of state for the home department, who, in his zeal for the protection of the constitution, or, in his alarm for the public safety, might have been led to commit acts of individual hardship, which his opinion of the exigency might to a certain extent excuse, if not justify, stood in no need of indemnity; but that his informers must be protected against the consequences of their falsehoods, their calumnies, and their delinquencies? (Hear, hear.) What was it but saying, that that horrible miscreant Oliver must not suffer the reward of his crimes; that the shield of power must be held before that vile wretch; that, in elevating this shield for his protection, the victims of his atrocious arts, and frightful iniquities, were to be left without redress, to pine under the effects of his machinations; and that all law and justice were to be trampled under foot, lest their retributive force should extend to him condign punishment, or expose him to merited infamy? (Loud cries of hear.) But the noble and learned lord (Chancellor) had said, that he had voted for the suspension act in 1795, which was repealed in 1797; and that, though the liberty of England was thus destroyed for two years, and the subject was left at the mercy of the executive, no action was instituted for any abuse of power exercised under the act. The noble and learned lord had then detailed other precedents to justify the late suspension, and the present indemnity bill; but in his (Lord Holland's) opinion they did not apply. He had alluded to the precedent in King William's time, and had mentioned, that that was a period when the government could not be accused of wishing to exercise power at the expense of justice, and yet, that a bill of indemnity had then passed. But it ought not to be forgotten, that though the government of that prince was in general wise and just, he was surrounded by a party who, in their zeal for the Orange interest, had exceeded their powers. The noble and learned lord had stated as a justification of the late suspension act, when the great body of the people were professedly sound, that the same act had passed in William's reign, when the whole country were actuated by sound principles. The latter part of his statement could not be admitted without considerable limitations; for though the majority of the nation was in favour of government, there was a very powerful, and a very active party, who supported the rights, and were zealous to restore the sway, of the abdicated monarch. The periods of 1715 and 1745 were equally dissimilar from the present, and the precedents taken from them equally inapplicable. At both those times there was a civil war in the country; great parties, headed by men of influence and distinction, were arrayed against the existing government; and if, as the noble and learned lord had said, the salus populi was the suprema lex, it was necessary to consult that safety by suspending the ordinary laws. (Hear.) The noble and learned lord, in recurring to the enactment of the habeas corpus in the time of Charles II., had not, he thought, treated that great bulwark of our liberties with sufficient reverence, or stated with sufficient force the importance and necessity of the circumstances which would justify its suspension. A royal writer, whose observations on the subject were very objectionable and dangerous, had, in a letter to his son, treated this invaluable law with great levity, and had even ventured to say, that the passing of it was a great misfortune to the nation.* The noble and learned lord had not gone this length. He had praised the law itself; but he seemed, from his language, to think, that "it was more honoured in the breach than in the observance." The noble duke who introduced the present measure, and other noble lords who had defended it, had stated that a bill of indemnity always followed, as a matter of course, the exercise of the powers granted by the suspension act, and that those who approved of the latter could never object to the former. This statement was neither correct in principle, nor consistent with fact. He (Lord Holland) could quote authorities in support of a contrary doctrine. The late Dr. Laurence, a man of great talent, and political energy, had vigorously supported the suspension acts of his time, and as vigorously (as he could do nothing without energy)† opposed the bill of indemnity which followed. At the period of 1800, he remembered that the noble and learned lord had supported the bill of indemnity, on the ground, that the persons who had given information might be in the power of the enemy, and, therefore, that their names ought not to be disclosed. No pretence of this kind could be now advanced. The informers under the late suspension act were in no danger from an enemy; they would only be left, as they ought, by a disclosure of their names and testimony, to the execrations of their country, and the burthen of their own infamy. In citing precedents in their favour, one of the noble lords opposite had alluded to the bill of indemnity which passed the Irish parliament in 1798, and had said, that posterity would judge of its necessity and justice. The judgment of every impartial man who was acquainted with the circumstances had already decided against that iniquitous act. One of the greatest lawyers and ablest politicians that Ireland had ever produced had loudly declared against it. The late Lord Avonmore, (better known as Chief Baron Yelverton) had said from the bench, that the oppressions suffered under the suspension act ought to have been redressed. After having mangled the limbs of a man without trial, and without proof of guilt, it was a horrible crime to deny him redress, by passing an act to protect his

* The writer here alluded to, is King James II. At the end of the second volume of the life of that monarch (lately published), there is a document entitled, "The advice which James II. bequeathed to his son James, generally known by the name of the Chevalier de St. George." In that advice, the royal writer says, "'Twas a great misfortune to the people as well as to the crown the passing the habeas corpus act, since it obliges the crown to keep a greater force on foot than it needed otherwise to preserve the government, and encourages disaffected, turbulent, and unquiet spirits to contrive and carry on with more security to themselves their wicked designs; 'twas contrived and carried on by the Earl of Shaftsbury to that intent."

† Dr. French Laurence was a man of very considerable learning. In 1782 and 1783, he was the editor of a periodical paper called The Jesuit. Mr. Burke, (with whose friendship and patronage he was honoured, and which he procured by his merit and abilities alone,) recommended him to conduct it, and he was the writer of the whole, from facts and hints with which he was supplied. He was also one of the principal authors of The Rolliad, and of The Probationary Odes. At a subsequent period he applied himself closely to the study of the law. His professional abilities were universally acknowledged, and his practice, as a civilian, was very extensive. In 1796, he was returned one of the representatives of Peterborough. In parliament he had no pretensions as an orator, but his speeches were characterized by good sense. He died in the year 1809. The following eulogium was pronounced by Mr. Whitbread, in the debate on the Orders in Council, on the 6th of March. "Now Dr. Laurence is dead, I am sure there is no one in this house who will not do justice to his memory. Now, that party animosity is silent, let justice, let gratitude, let a sense of our dignity, as a house, awaken, and let us acknowledge with one common voice, that we have lost a man whose like we shall not soon see again. Would to heaven that his spirit only had fallen amongst us! I should not then have feared, under its influence and inspiration, to have opposed myself to the learned advocates whom I see ranged against me."

persecutors. Lord Avonmore had expressed himself in very decisive terms upon this subject, on the trial of an action brought at Clonmel assizes, in the spring of 1798, by Mr. Francis Doyle, against the notorious Sir Thomas Judkin Fitzgerald. The following were the words of that respectable judge in his charge to the jury upon that occasion:—

"This, gentlemen, is an action brought to recover damages from the defendant, Colonel Fitzgerald, for an act admitted to be against law. If, therefore, the acts of indemnity which have been cited to you had not passed, no damages, that you could give, would be too great.

"Much, gentlemen, has been here spoken respecting loyalty; and, lest the clamours of pretended loyalty should drown all considerations of justice, it is incumbent on me to inform you what loyalty is, and in what true loyalty consists. Loyalty is another term for legality; and he who acts with legality, acts in strict conformity to the laws. That man, therefore, is to be esteemed the most loyal, who is a steady and faithful adherent to his lawful prince, and a strenuous supporter of the established constitution, by paying due obedience to the laws of his country, respecting social order, and preserving every member of the state in his just rights and possessions.

"You must find that the defendant acted maliciously, and not with an intent of suppressing the rebellion or saving the state, according to the words of this act, which places an insuperable bar between injury and redress, and sets all equity and justice at defiance."

Such was the language of a judge, who executed the law, though he bitterly lamented that it was necessary to be the instrument of executing it, and the defendant was, in consequence, refused the redress to which he was entitled. Lord Avonmore was not only a man of great talents, but of great independence and respectability, though reports to his prejudice had gone abroad, respecting his conduct in regard to the union. But the reason why he so strenuously supported that measure, was to be found in the conduct of that parliament which had passed the acts which he so bitterly lamented, and so severely condemned. A parliament that had executed such atrocities, that had rendered itself the instrument of such iniquitous acts, did not deserve his favour or respect; and though he knew he was destroying the theatre in which he had made so great a figure, and that independence where he had earned his greatest honours, he would rather agree to its extinction than prolong its existence, after such a dereliction of principle and justice. If such were the motives of that great man in consenting to the loss of the independent legislature of his native country, what must be the sentiments of the people of England, when they saw their liberties invaded, and their rights destroyed, by similar acts? He (Lord Holland) had no love for the mad schemes of reform that had been so zealously advocated, and so clamorously demanded; but bills of the kind now before the house, if passed to bar the injured from redress, would do more to promote the cause of reform than all the petitions about annual parliaments, or all the elaborate blunders of Major Cartwright. (Hear.) The noble and learned lord had feelingly described the alarms of November 1816, and had passed an eloquent and just eulogium on the powers and influence of parliament. Why, then, was he one of those who had advised the throne to adjourn the meeting of parliament so long? Why was it not convoked till the mischief was past, till the Spafield riots had taken place, and till an account of the execution of the plots could be given, instead of measures proposed to prevent them? He did not wish to go through all the reports of all the secret committees; but he could not help saying, let any one read the two first, and then consider the state of the country as represented in the last, and lay his hand upon his heart, and declare, whether the dangers were not greatly exaggerated. (Hear, hear.) But the ministers said, the suspension of the habeas corpus was the cause of the re-establishment of tranquillity, and though they allowed that it gave them no power to put down insurrection, except the right of detaining a few wretched individuals, against whom they had charges which might have been prosecuted to conviction, they attributed the whole change to that measure. Whether there was insurrection or not, their acts of power and oppression were declared to be useful and necessary. The noble duke who introduced the present bill, had treated the subject rather lightly, by saying, that the government, under the suspension act, "had merely abstracted a few individuals from society." So then, (said Lord Holland,) you take men from their family, friends, and employments; you immure them in dungeons; you doom them to solitary confinement for months; you expose their persons to every species of hardship, and their characters to every kind of suspicion, and you call this "only abstracting a few individuals from society." When he heard this from a nobleman of humane temper and mild disposition, he could not but see the danger of arbitrary power in blunting our feelings of right, and destroying our respect for law and liberty. It was this which he wished particularly to impress on their lordships when considering the tendency of measures like the present, and the operation of their example on the country and posterity. When it was known that the noble secretary of state employed such a character as Oliver; when it was known that he spoke of him with respect, their lordships ought to look to the effect that such conduct would have on the magistrates. Some country magistrate, the little tyrant of his own domain, might wish to imitate the example of the noble secretary. He would say, "I shall have my Oliver and Castle; I shall likewise have my correspondent as well as the secretary of state; I shall employ spies to enable some neighbouring nobleman, with whom I wish to ingratiate myself by my zeal and my subserviency, to detect the poachers on his estate." It would be superfluous to point out all the ramifications through which the poison of such an example might spread, destroying private confidence, corrupting the honest feelings of the people, and setting one class of men, or one part of the population of the country, against the other. The example of France was often, on other occasions, referred to, as a warning; and their lordships would do well to consider the evils which had arisen in that country from that source of corruption to which he now wished to direct their attention. Let them look to the description, lately published, of the state of Lyons and its neighbourhood. It was a tale of spies encouraged—of seditions which those spies had instigated—of ignorance which they had basely seduced—and of indiscretion, which, through their means, had been barbarously punished.* If a proper opportunity were offered, he would pledge himself to prove, that so far back as 1812, a similar system of espionage and dissension had commenced in this country. He alluded to the districts about Bolton and Manchester, where orange clubs were established, where spies had been for some years employed, and from whence much of the information on which the government had lately proceeded had come. If the noble and learned lord cited the precedent of the reign of William III. in justification of the late measure of the suspension and present indemnity, might not the example now furnished be soon established into a valid precedent? The noble and learned lord called the late measures, measures of necessity; but when would ever a statesman, who wished the possession of arbitrary power, want the plea of necessity to justify his demand? The sufferings of the individuals lately imprisoned required consideration, even independently of the perni-

* In 1817, some disturbances broke out at Lyons, which were soon suppressed. Marshal Marmont, Duke of Ragusa, was sent to take the command of the district, and to inquire into the cause of the late disorders. He arrived at Lyons on the 3d of September. In February 1818, Colonel Faubier, the chief of the marshal's staff, published an account of that officer's military administration during the mission, together with the result of the inquiry. The following is an extract from that work, to which, it is to be presumed, Lord Holland alluded in the above passage of his speech.

"The marshal experienced at first great difficulties in procuring a knowledge of the truth. The principal authorities supplied relations so uniform—they appeared still so alarmed at the terrible dangers which they, according to their own account, had warded off; they cited so great a number of facts, made so many revelations, praised with such apparent sincerity their own devotion and energy, attacked the opinions of those functionaries who did not concur with them, by imputations so grave in appearance, that it was necessary to believe the conspiracy to be real; that France owed them thanksgivings for their efforts, and that all the evils which they had committed were necessary.

"He applied to respectable citizens; he imposed upon himself the obligation of seeing every thing with his own eyes, and, in this manner, he soon learned the real state of things. The comparison of the present and the past forced upon him the conviction that the enemies of the repose of France, abusing, no doubt, the errors and weakness of the principal authorities, had got possession of power, and made use of it to persecute every one who did not partake of their opinions and interests. The city of Lyons, and the surrounding communes, saw the revival of the era of 1793. A band of agents traversed the city and the country, introduced themselves into taverns and private houses, acted the part of malcontents, breathed nothing but violent complaints against government, announced changes and revolutions, and, if they could draw a sign of approbation from the unfortunate citizens, pressed by want and harassed by a thousand vexations, they hastened to denounce them, and to reap the reward of their infamous stratagems. The proceedings of the Prevotal court attested the employment of these odious means, but the excesses even which attended them soon made them public. Every one of the authorities having his own separate means of police, at every instant these vile instruments encountered each other without knowing it; attacked mutually with equal ardour, and, in a short time, the less active being denounced by his more zealous fellow-labourer, expiated for a time his infamy in chains. He found it necessary, therefore, to resign his mission; the authority who employed him claimed his agent, the prisoner disappeared, and proceeded afterwards in the pursuit of a new prey or in the preparation of a new scandal. By the aid of these numerous informers the prisons were filled with victims, heaped upon each other with such disorder, that the very reading of the prison registers proved to what extent the laws and humanity were outraged. Independently of those whom the ordinary procedure of law placed in the Prevotal courts, there were seen in the cells of the town prison, hundreds of wretches, the victims of vain terrors and fatal counsels, who waited for whole months, deprived of every comfort, the favour of being interrogated. Arbitrary measures were carried on in all departments of administration. While the magistrates, from passion, acted without moderation or shame, it is easy to guess the excesses of their agents.

"The Prevotal court, doubtless yielding to an error, but to the most cruel and deplorable of errors, brought to its fatal bar, 122 persons out of 155 accused. Out of this number, the most considerable, perhaps, that any criminal proceeding had ever brought at once before a tribunal, horrible to relate, not one escaped punishment more or less severe. Twenty-eight were condemned to death; six to compulsory labour; thirty four to transportation; forty-two to imprisonment, and others to a long surveillance and bail, which they were unable to procure. Thus, out of a mob which did not exceed 250 men, and of whom only 60 were armed, more than 110 were condemned as authors or chiefs of the sedition. And of all these wretched beings, only one attempted to resist the public force, by wounding a gendarme. All the others were disarmed before the cavalry sent in their pursuit came up with them."

cious effect which the example of denying them redress would have on posterity. Let the house look upon the ruin into which arbitrary arrest and confinement had thrown them. After being injured in character, and ruined in circumstances, the present bill proposed to take from them that just redress to which they had as good a title as their lordships had to their estates. Suppose these persons instituted actions. Then, it was said, the noble secretary must disclose the information on which he acted. What would be the evil of this? Was the existence, or the welfare, of those wretched and detestable persons who had become informers, and who refused to support openly their evidence, necessary to the existence of the state? If they suffered by such disclosure, a little remuneration would reward them for their infamy, and pay them sufficiently for that loss of character which was of so little value. The wretch to whom he had alluded in Ireland, (Sir Judkin Fitgerald) was so indemnified, and now bore his infamous honours. On the broad principle of justice and right, he called upon the house to throw out the present bill, and allow the injured men to seek their redress. He would most decidedly give his vote against it. The house should do something for the dignity of its character. He was against the measure altogether, but would vote for the motion of his noble friend.

Lord Sidmouth observed, that he was not a person who could properly enter upon a discussion, the object of which was to indemnity him for the way in which he had performed the functions committed to him: but he had a motive for rising, quite distinct from any personal considerations. He must in the first place say, that those who conceived that he asked for this bill, in order to preclude himself from the necessity of disclosing the information which had come before him, completely mistook his purpose and his character. The individuals who had trusted their names to his confidence might have felt perfectly secure, even if this bill were not passed: for no consequence which might involve his own liberty, property, or reputation, would ever have induced him to betray them. (Hear.) The noble lord who spoke last had asserted, that the bill was not intended as an indemnity for the secretary of state, but for an individual upon whom that noble lord had, in a few words, heaped more abuse than he (Lord Sidmouth) had ever heard uttered against any one man. But he would tell that noble lord, that he was mistaken in his opinions respecting that individual: the bill did not concern him in any manner whatever; he had done nothing which could possibly make such a bill necessary for his security; no person had been apprehended in consequence of information from that quarter, nor had any steps been taken at his suggestion, or arising out of his disclosures. The noble lord had poured out a great deal of indignation against that man, an indignation which was perfectly natural and honourable, on the supposition of his having done what was imputed to him, but which was, in fact, totally unfounded and unjustifiable. But the noble lord, not content with venting his indignation against an informer, had gone further, and vented it on a body which had hitherto been unimpeached. He had drawn a most degrading picture of the character of the magistrates (no, no, from Lord Holland)—of that useful body of men who were the main pillars of the internal strength of the country, and without whose co-operation the public tranquillity could not be preserved. (Hear, hear, hear.) These men did not deserve to be treated with that levity which the noble lord had employed against them; he did not accuse the noble lord of any wish to degrade them, but his manner had certainly that tendency. (No, no, from Lord Holland.) On the subject of spies and informers, that noble lord had held such language as he was sure he could not have held had he been placed in an official situation. At the same time he gave the noble lord perfect credit for consistency. In saying this, he meant no disrespect, (for admiring, as all must, the talents of that noble lord, and prizing, as all did, his personal qualities, it was impossible for any administration not to regret that he should differ from them, and withhold his sanction), yet he must say, that the noble lord, and some of those who sat beside him, had a claim to the character of consistency on one ground at least, which was, that they never had on any occasion supported any one measure which the wisdom of parliament had thought necessary for the safety of the country. (Hear, hear.) As to the system of espionage, he disdained it as much as any man: he abhorred with all his heart whatever tended to shake the confidence of the private dwelling, or weaken the bonds of social intercourse between man and man; but when he was placed in a situation which presented an opportunity, by means of an informer, of saving his country from insurrection, could he as an upright minister, could he as an honest man, reject such information? He only wished that he could consistently with his duty disclose what had been communicated to him: above all, he wished he could disclose what had passed between him and Oliver. He had, indeed, made a full disclosure to the secret committees of both houses of parliament; so full, that he was not aware of a particle that was not in their possession: he wished that it were consistent with propriety to make an equal disclosure to the country generally, that he might state what related to Oliver, and shew how much the public were mistaken in that man's motives and conduct. As to the question of the treatment of the prisoners, his noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Erskine) had gone too far, when he asserted, that he (Lord Sidmouth) must be conscious of at least one instance of injury inflicted on some innocent person, or he would not ask for a bill of indemnity. He could broadly say, there was not a single case of imprisonment, which, in his own mind, or in the minds of any of those who had officially advised it, produced the slightest feelings of self-reproach. Not a single individual had been apprehended, against whom he would not proceed in a similar manner, under similar circumstances. (Hear, hear.) The accounts of their treatment, as furnished by the prisoners themselves, were full of the grossest misrepresentations and falsehoods, and he could enter into particulars which would convince the house, except that they did not concern the present discussion. He would not therefore touch upon them: indeed, his chief object in rising had been to state, that Oliver could not come within the scope of the present bill;—he had done nothing that required forgiveness or indemnity. He defied any noble lord to say, that he had made use of Oliver in any way repugnant to strict honour, or to strict law, or that he had exercised any of his official functions in a way inconsistent with honourable feelings, he might say, with the delicacy of honour, or the purity of the British constitution. (Hear.)

Lord Holland rose to explain. He denied that he had passed any such sweeping censure on the magistrates as had been imputed to him. His argument was simply this: that as ministers had openly encouraged the busy, meddling activity of spies and informers, and as magistrates were merely men, and actuated by human motives, it was possible, that one consequence of the system adopted by ministers might be, that some magistrates out of a vast number would be induced to act with more zeal than discretion, with more anxiety to please the government than to keep within the strict limits of their duty. The noble viscount could not pretend to say that such an effect had not been produced on some magistrates. (Hear, hear.)

Earl Grosvenor said, that nothing had occurred which could justify the suspension of the habeas corpus act. There was nothing that might not have been left to the ordinary laws of the country. The noble viscount might be, and perhaps was, satisfied with his own conduct, but his self-opinion furnished no sufficient reason for the satisfaction of the house generally; the grounds of that self-approbation must be better explained before the house could ratify it by their sanction. The noble viscount had defended Oliver, and not without cause; for, if Oliver should turn out to have been guilty of the acts imputed to him, then the noble lord himself would be answerable for the conduct of his agent, on the common principle of Qui facit per alium, facit per se. But he would not then, at that late hour, discuss a subject which might be discussed at another time: he should content himself at present, with expressing his decided approbation of the motion of his noble friend.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, he would not detain the house long, but he could not be content with giving a silent vote. The noble viscount (Sidmouth) had commenced his speech by disqualifying himself from taking any part in the present discussion, and had fairly avowed what was the fact, that he could not with propriety advocate a measure which was so personal to himself. This was a very correct view of the subject, and he trusted that the noble viscount would carry it a step further, and would give no vote on a matter so extremely personal. (A laugh, and hear, hear.) But he should like to know, when, and how, the noble viscount had arrived at this just opinion? for he (Lord Carnarvon) could not but recollect, that, a few days ago, that noble lord had appointed himself to sit as judge on his own conduct, in conjunction with certain other judges, all chosen from a list furnished by himself. (Hear, hear.) Since the appointment of that committee, several petitions had been laid by him (Lord Carnarvon) upon their lordships' table; and he could not but think it peculiarly hard that the petitioners could procure no hearing before the house, and that now they were also to be shut out from all redress before the ordinary tribunals of their country. But what was scarcely less hard was, that the noble viscount should, in the very face of these facts, get up and declare to the astonished ears of their lordships, that he had laid before the secret committee all the evidence that could be procured; all the circumstances of every case. The noble viscount had forgotten, but would the house forget, that he had, a very few days ago, refused to lay these petitions before that committee? When he (Lord Carnarvon) first laid the petitions on their lordships' table, with a desire to make a motion on the subject, he was told that such a proceeding was premature, and delay was required. Well, after the interval which had been begged of him, he brought forward his motion, but was then told, that the committee were about to make their report, and that such additional information would only puzzle and distract them. And now that a report was made, and a bill of indemnity, its usual consequence, was brought in, it was said, that the subject of the petitions should not be alluded to—it was quite irrelevant—it was too late. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) But he did not think it irrelevant: he did not think it was too late: for, what was the question before their lordships? Was it not, whether ministers had abused or not the powers entrusted to them? And was it not fitting that all cases of alleged abuse should be strictly inquired into by that house, before their lordships proceeded to shut up the tribunals of justice against the petitioners, and through them against the people of England? The noble viscount seemed to consider that the great object of the habeas corpus suspension act was, to detain persons in prison whom they never had the least intention of trying; in other words, that it was its object to erect in every county a bastile for persons who were obnoxious to ministers. He would tell the noble viscount, that this was an erroneous view of the subject, and he doubted whether their lordships would ever have given their consent to such an act, had ministers avowed such an object. He would not now trouble the house any further: (hear, hear, hear) he should have a better opportunity when the details of the bill should come before their lordships; or when its terrible principle should, as he hoped it would, be again discussed. But he would now conclude with observing, that, on their conduct in this business, depended the character of their lordships, the character of the ministers, nay the character of the injured Oliver himself (a laugh, and loud cries of hear, hear); for, against him, as well as the unfortunate complainants, whose petitions lay scorned and unheeded upon their table, would this bill of indemnity block up all the avenues of legal redress. (Cries of hear.) He would oppose the bill in every stage.

The question was then put "that the word now stand part of the question?"

Friday, Feb. 27.

FEES ON PARDONS.] An account was presented (pursuant to an order of the 24th instant) of fees received on pardons under the great seal.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

EXCHEQUER BILLS.] Mr. Arbuthnot presented an account "of the Unfunded Debt in exchequer bills outstanding on the 5th of January, 1818."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

WANT OF EMPLOYMENT, &c.] General Loftus presented the following petition of inhabitants of Cork. "That the petitioners, beholding the daily increase of poverty among the inhabitants of that city, arising from want of employment, which has unhappily induced its necessary consequences, disease and misery, and knowing that similar evils are felt in every part of Ireland, approach the house to state the calamitous situation in which that country stands, and to call upon the house to protect them from that ruin into which all ranks appear to be fast sinking: the petitioners have to deplore the want of sufficient encouragement to their manufactures, the difficulties which stand in the way of agriculture, and the absence of a majority of the nobility and gentry, who receive the produce of the soil, and spend it in other countries; the petitioners shall not presume to dictate to the house in what way their sufferings can be best alleviated; but, as they principally trace them to want of employment for their superabundant population, they would beg most humbly to suggest the propriety of some legislative enactment respecting the non-residence of the nobility and gentry, the encouragement necessary for the increase of their manufactures, the formation of canals, the working of mines and fisheries, the more profitable tillage of land, the construction and repairing of roads, and such other means of employment as the house may think proper to devise; the petitioners would also earnestly solicit the attention of the house to the means of extending the benefits of education to all classes of the community as the best corrective of human depravity, and the most efficient moral engine of state; the petitioners most fervently beseech the house to take the case of Ireland into their early consideration, and to reflect on the urgency of the circumstances under which the petitioners address them, disease making rapid strides through all classes, and no prospect of its decrease, while so large a portion of the population are unemployed, and continue in a consequent state of poverty and wretchedness."

Sir N. Coulthurst bore testimony to the facts stated in the petition, and, on his motion, it was ordered to be printed.

LEATHER TAX.] Mr. Shaw presented a petition of the corporation of Tanners of Dublin, against this tax.—A similar petition was presented of Tanners and inhabitants of Morpeth.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.] Mr. Symonds presented a petition of inhabitants of Hereford, against the employment of climbing boys.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COPPER.] On the motion of Mr. Grenfell, accounts were ordered "of the quantities of copper exported from Great Britain in the year ending the 5th of January 1818; distinguishing each sort, from what part sent, and to what country exported."

"Of all copper imported into Great Britain in the year ending the 5th of January 1818; distinguishing each sort of copper, from what country, and into what port, imported."

"Of all copper imported into Ireland in the year ending the 5th of January 1818; distingguishing each sort of copper, from what country, and into what port imported."

"Of the quantities of copper exported from Ireland in the year ending the 5th of January 1818; distinguishing each sort, from what port sent, and to what country exported."

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION ACT.] Mr. Alderman Wood presented the following petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, in common hall assembled. "That the petitioners have viewed with the deepest concern the continual encroachments that have been made upon the rights of the subject; they have been called upon to make sacrifices without bounds, and to submit to burthens and privations without example; they have evinced the utmost patience, fortitude, and forbearance under their sufferings, under a persuasion that upon a return of peace they should have witnessed a disposition, on the part of his Majesty's government and the house, seriously to inquire into the cause of their sufferings, and to redress their grievances, to diminish their burthens, and to make such necessary reparations in the constitution as would remove the numerous and deeply-rooted abuses, and restore it to full vigour and energy: in all these expectations the petitioners have been unhappily disappointed, and, instead of seeing realized expectations so reasonably founded, at a moment of unexampled distress, when they were representing their grievances to the house, no redress was afforded them, nor were their complaints inquired into, but, upon unfounded alarms, raised and fomented by the hired emissaries of ministers, and for the purpose, as they believe, of stifling the complaints of the people and protecting abuses, and upon no other evidence than the partial documents furnished by ministers to secret committees, the great pillar of the constitution, the habeas corpus act, was suspended; that, as the grounds and pretences for such a measure, and in a time of profound peace, were without precedent, so they believe is the wanton, arbitrary, oppressive, and vindictive proceedings of ministers without example, in the annals of the country; the petitioners will not detail these oppressions, many of the facts have already been stated to the house, and are generally known; but, while they forbear to dilate upon the cruel and vindictive imprisonment and prosecutions of numerous individuals, which have ended in the defeat and disgrace of ministers, the petitioners cannot forbear expressing their decided impression that, in the instances where convictions have taken place, those unhappy and deluded men had been led into the commission of crimes, through the agency of those infamous and abandoned emissaries who had been employed; that they are further convinced that the existing laws are fully adequate in those cases, and that, by due vigilance, those acts which led to the forfeiture of the lives of those unhappy individuals, might have been prevented; the petitioners submit to the house, that the justice of the country, and outraged feelings of the people, demand a full, impartial, and rigid inquiry into all the proceedings of ministers, both in obtaining and under the late suspension act; that no inquiry before secret committees, composed partly of those ministers and placemen, can promote justice, or satisfy the nation, and must lead to an inevitable conviction that those, who ought to be the guardians of the property, the liberties, and lives of the people, are guided by other motives and considerations than the welfare and honour of the nation; the petitioners therefore humbly pray, that the house will immediately institute a full, impartial, and rigid inquiry into the conduct of ministers, and all the proceedings in obtaining and under the late suspension of the habeas corpus act, and that the said inquiry may be referred to such committees as are composed of such members only of the house as hold neither places nor pensions under the government, and that the house will not pass any bill of indemnity, nor preclude those who have been the victims of oppression from making an appeal to the legal tribunals of the country."

On the motion that the petition do lie on the table,

Sir W. Curtis observed, that all he had to say was, that he had attended the common hall, and that he disapproved of every word of the petition.

It was then ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

RIBBON WEAVERS.] Mr. P. Moore presented a petition of Ribbon Weavers of Coventry, praying for some regulations. It was referred to a select committee, consisting of Mr. P. Moore, Mr. Butterworth, and several others, who were ordered to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their observations thereupon to the house.

A petition of Silk Weavers of the town of Macclesfield was presented, and referred to the committee.

MOCK AUCTIONS.] Mr. Sheriff Desanges presented a petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of London, against mock Auctions.

Mr. Alderman Atkins, in moving that it do lie on the table, stated the frauds that were committed in these auctions, by imposing spurious articles on the public, and the facilities which they afforded for the disposal of goods that had been obtained under false pretences. He begged to call the attention of the right hon. gentlemen opposite to this subject; and he hoped, that when a bill should be introduced to remedy the evil, it would not meet with the difficulties experienced in the last session. After a very careful investigation of the evils attendant on these auctions, he was enabled unequivocally to declare, that no measure could be more generally useful than one by which they should be suppressed.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

GAME LAWS.] Mr. G. Bankes presented his bill "for the more effectual prevention of offences connected with the unlawful destruction and sale of game."

Mr. Grenfell expressed his hope, that the hon. gentleman would not name an early day for the second reading of a measure on which so much diversity of opinion existed.

Mr. G. Bankes said, he wished to fix a distant day for the second reading, in order that those hon. gentlemen who were under the necessity of attending the quarter sessions and assizes, might be present at the discussion of the measure.

On Mr. Bankes's motion, the bill was ordered to be read a second time on Friday, the 10th of April, and to be printed.

LEATHER TAX.] On the motion of Mr. Lushington, an account was ordered "shewing the annual amount of the duties upon Leather in Great Britain, for the five years preceding the period when the additional tax was charged, and also, shewing the amount annually received since that time; distinguishing each year; and a similar return of drawbacks for the same period."

General Gascoigne took the opportunity of asking the noble lord who had signified his intention of making some proposition on this subject, whether he meant to propose that the petitions against the tax should be referred to the consideration of a committee, or to move at once for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the tax?

Lord Althorpe said, that he had not yet made up his mind as to the course he should pursue.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] Lord Archibald Hamilton presented the following petition of resident burgesses in the royal burgh of Wigtoun. His lordship observed, that he thought this petition would shew, that the inhabitants of the burghs were not so fully satisfied with their situation as some hon. members on the other side had represented.—"That the peculiar circumstances of the burgesses of the cities and burghs of Scotland, have repeatedly been submitted to both houses of parliament, and while ameliorations and redress of grievances have been liberally conceded to almost every class of society, the petitioners and their predecessors have been totally neglected for the last three or four centuries; that the constitutions or sets of the burghs in Scotland are well known to the house, and although the petitioners, as resident burgesses of Wigtoun, may be naturally supposed to have an interest and voice in the election of their rulers and the administration of the funds of the community, yet the fact is, they have neither the one or the other, and the present members of the corporation continue from year to year to re-elect themselves and their successors in defiance of the petitioners; the members of the corporation of Wigtoun are nineteen in number, being a provost, two bailies, and sixteen counsellors, and of these only six are known to the petitioners, or reside within the burgh; the remainder consists of honourables or right honourables in different quarters of the globe, and persons in the immediate employ, or under the direct influence, of a neighbouring noble lord; the petitioners indeed aver and offer to prove, that they have neither voice nor influence even in the management or application of the funds of the community; and if the present system of self-election is much longer persisted in, total ruin must overtake every burgh in Scotland; without entering into unnecessary detail, the petitioners humbly crave that in place of the odious and defective system, that resident burgesses only be capable of electing and being elected members of the corporation, and that the present system of self-election be speedily put an end to in the burgh of Wigtoun, and every other burgh in Scotland: of the present set and mode of electing their parliamentary representatives the petitioners approve, but here their approbation must rest, for of the system of self-election and non-resident magistrates and counsellors the petitioners have and ever will complain; the petitioners are not even admitted to an inspection and examination of the funds of the community, far less consulted in the management thereof, and, at this moment, the funds of the burgh, in place of being subjected to the controul of the burgesses, are administered by persons, the majority of whom never set their foot within the royalty, except perhaps on the day of the annual election, and in order to carry on the present system; may it, therefore, please the house to take the case of the petitioners into consideration, and in their great wisdom to grant them such relief and redress as they shall judge proper."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.] Sir M. W. Ridley rose to ask, whether or not it was the intention of the hon. gentlemen opposite to move a new writ for Southampton?

Mr. S. Bourne replied, that the present member for that borough had neither been sworn into the office of clerk of the parliaments, nor had he appointed a deputy.

Mr. Brougham remarked, that whether the hon. gentleman had been sworn in or not, was quite wide of the present question, which was, had he accepted the office?

Mr. S. Bourne said, that, unquestionably, he was entitled to it by reversion. He maintained, however, that his hon. friend's seat was not vacated, until he had actually taken possession of the office, which he had not yet done.

Sir M. W. Ridley observed, that the hon. gentleman came into possession of the office immediately on the death of the holder; so that a new writ ought to have been moved for within a short period of that event. Of such a proceeding several instances had occurred. He should now, therefore, move the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for Mr. Speaker to issue his warrant to the clerk of the crown, to make out a new writ for the election of a burgess to serve in the present parliament, for the town and county of the town of Southampton, in the room of G. H. Rose, Esq. who, since his election, had accepted the office of clerk of the parliaments.

The debate was accordingly resumed, and on the motion of Sir W. Ridley the new writ was ordered.

REPORT OF THE SECRET COMMITTEE.] Mr. Bathurst appeared at the bar, and presented the report of the secret committee, which was read by the clerk, as follows:—"The committee of secrecy, to whom the several papers, which were presented (sealed up) to the house, by lord viscount Castlereagh, on the 3d day of February, by command of his royal highness the Prince Regent, were referred, and who were directed to examine the matters thereof, and report the same, as they should appear to them, to the house;—have agreed upon the following report—

The first object of your committee, in examining the papers which have been referred to their consideration, has been, to form a just estimate of the internal state of the country, from the period when the second report of the secret committee, in the last session of parliament, was presented, to the present time.

The insurrection, which broke out in the night between the 9th and 10th of June, on the borders of Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, shortly before the close of the sitting of that committee, was the last open attempt to carry into effect the revolution, which had so long been the object of an extended conspiracy. The arrest of some of the principal promoters of these treasonable designs, in different parts of the country, had deranged the plans, and distracted the councils, of the disaffected; occasioned delays and hesitation in the appointment of the day for a simultaneous effort; and finally, left none, but the most infatuated, to hazard the experiment of rebellion.

The suppression of this insurrection (following the dispersion of the partial rising which had taken place the night before in the neighbourhood of Huddersfield,) the apprehension and committal of the leaders for trial in the regular course of law, under the charge of high treason, and the detention of several others of the most active delegates and agitators, under the authority of the act of the last session, frustrated all further attempts at open violence. But the spirit of disaffection does not appear to have been subdued; disappointment was frequently expressed by the disaffected, at the failure of an enterprise, from the success of which a relief from all distress and grievances had been confidently predicted; and the projected revolution was considered as not less certain, for being somewhat longer delayed.

In the course of the succeeding month, bills of indictment for high treason were found against forty-six persons, at the assizes at Derby; which must have tended still further to check the progress of sedition, by apprizing the wavering of the danger to which they were exposed, and overawing the remainder of the more determined leaders. On the trials which took place in October, twenty-three were either convicted by the verdict of the jury, or pleaded guilty; against twelve, who were mostly young men, and related to some of the prisoners already convicted, the law officers of the crown declined offering any evidence. The remaining eleven had succeeded in absconding, and have not yet been apprehended. The result of these trials, and the examples which followed, seem to have had the effect which might be expected, of striking a terror into the most violent of those engaged in the general conspiracy; whilst the lenity shewn to the deluded, was gratefully felt by the individuals themselves, and restored quiet and subordination to the district, which had been the principal scene of disturbance.

In the course of the autumn, a gradual reduction in the price of provisions, and still more an increased demand for labour, in consequence of a progressive improvement in the state of agriculture, as well as of trade and manufactures in some of their most important branches, afforded the means of subsistence and employment to numbers of those, who had been taught to ascribe all the privations to which they were unfortunately subjected, to defects in the existing constitution.

Your committee see fresh cause to be convinced of the truth of the opinion expressed by the first secret committee, which sat in the last year, of the general good disposition and loyalty of the great body of the people; and they advert with pleasure to the confirmation afforded by the late trials at Derby, of the testimony borne in the report of the last committee, to the exemplary conduct of the mass of the population, in the country through which the insurrection passed. They have no doubt, that the numbers of those who were either pledged, or prepared to engage in actual insurrection, has generally been much exaggerated by the leaders of the disaffected, from the obvious policy, both of giving importance to themselves, and of encouraging their followers. It is, however, impossible to calculate the extent to which any insurrection, not successfully opposed in its outset, might have grown in its progress through a population, in a state of reduced employment, of distress, and of agitation. In such a state of things, opportunity would, no doubt, have been afforded to active and plausible demagogues, for seducing into acts of violence and outrage, persons altogether unaware of the nature and consequences of the measures, to which they were called upon to lend their assistance; that these consequences would have involved the destruction of the lives and property of the loyal and well-affected, in the event of any decided, though temporary, success of the insurgents, is sufficiently evident, from the designs, which have in some instances been proved.

It was therefore the duty of the magistracy, and of the government, not only to prepare the means of effectual resistance to open force; but, where they had the opportunity, to defeat the danger in its origin, by apprehending the leaders and instigators of conspiracy. Your committee indulge the hope, that the hour of delusion, among those who have been misled into disaffection, may be passing away; and that some, even of the deluders themselves, may have seen, and repented of their error. But your committee would deceive the house, if they were not to state it as their opinion, that it will still require all the vigilance of government. and of the magistracy, to maintain the tranquillity, which has been restored. It will no less require a firm determination among the moral and reflecting members of the community, of whatever rank and station they may be, to lend the aid of their influence and example, to counteract the effect of those licentious and inflammatory publications, which are poured forth throughout the country, with a profusion heretofore unexampled.

Your committee have hitherto applied their observations to the lately disturbed districts in the country. In adverting to the state of the metropolis, during the same period, they have observed, with concern, that a small number of active and infatuated individuals have been unremittingly engaged, in arranging plans of insurrection, in endeavouring to foment disturbances that might lead to it, and in procuring the means of active operations, with the ultimate view of subverting all the existing establishments of the country, and substituting some form of revolutionary government in their stead. Your committee, however, have the satisfaction to find, that, notwithstanding the desperation and confidence of the leaders, the proselytes that have been gained to their cause are not numerous. The sensible improvement in the comforts and employment of the labouring part of the community, has tended to diminish at once the motives of discontent, and the means of seduction. The mischief does not appear to have extended into any other rank of life, than that of the persons referred to in the first report of the secret committee of last year, nor to have received countenance from any individuals of higher condition.

Eager as these agitators are, to avail themselves of any popular assemblage, still more, of any occasion that might happen to arise of popular discontent, and capable as they appear, from their own declarations, to be of any act of atrocity,—your committee see no reason to apprehend that the vigilance of the police, and the unrelaxed superintendence of government, may not, under the present circumstances of the country, be sufficient to prevent them from breaking out into any serious disturbance of the public peace.

The attention of your committee has next been directed to the documents, which have been laid before them, relative to the apprehension of the several persons suspected of being engaged in treasonable practices, who have been detained under the authority of the acts of the last session. They have examined the charges upon which the several detentions have been founded, and find them, in all instances, substantiated by depositions on oath. Your committee have no hesitation in declaring, that the discretion thus intrusted to his Majesty's government, appears to them to have been temperately and judiciously exercised, and that the government would, in their opinion, have failed in its duty, as guardian of the peace and tranquillity of the realm, if it had not exercised, to the extent which it has done, the powers intrusted to it by the legislature. Of the thirty-seven persons, which is the whole number of those who were finally committed, one was discharged on the 4th of July, one on the 31st on account of illness, ten on the 12th of November, fourteen on the 3d of December, one on the 22d of December, six on the 29th of December, and three on the 20th of January, and one died in prison. From the circumstances of the country, as laid before your committee, and as publicly notorious during the period in which those imprisonments took place, your committee see no reason to doubt that the detention of the several prisoners, was governed by the same sound discretion, which, as your committee have already stated, appears to have been exercised in apprehending them. The whole of the arduous duties confided to the executive government, appears to your committee to have been discharged with as much moderation and lenity, as was compatible with the paramount object of general security.—27th February, 1818."

Lord Castlereagh moved, that the report do lie upon the table, and that it be printed.

Mr. Tierney asked the noble lord, when he proposed that the report should be taken into consideration, and what measure, if any, he intended to found upon it?

Lord Castlereagh said, that it was not his intention to propose any day for considering the report. The report was not fit to be taken into consideration at present. All that he meant to do was, to move that it be printed.

Mr. Tierney professed himself very much puzzled to find out the noble lord's reason for moving that it be printed. The noble lord had declared, that the report was not fit to be taken into consideration by the house; and if so, why it was worth while to print it passed a reasonable man's comprehension. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord was quite right, perhaps, in his avowed opinion of the report, for it was really nothing but a jumble of nonsense. (Much confusion on both sides.) Every syllable that had been foretold had been verified; all the absurdities that satire had invented, as likely to form part of this precious document, were here embodied in writing, for the amusement of the country. (Hear, hear.) Who was the author of this valuable production it might be hard to say; but for any information it contained, it would have been much better if the Derby trials had been taken in short-hand and presented to the house. (Hear.) It was nothing but the old story: and well it might be, for what else had ministers to offer? There was, however, one material point, and, with the other side, it might constitute the chief value of the report, namely, that it was a complete white-washing of the administration: it contained two points only—the internal state of the country, and the internal state of the administration. (Hear.) The whole object of it was to induce the house to believe without evidence, (or rather with evidence all the other way,) that ministers had exercised the powers intrusted to them with the utmost moderation and humanity. Would the house take that fact for granted, merely because it was so asserted in the curious specimen of composition just read? (Hear.) For what purposes had the committee been appointed?—first, to defend the conduct of the former committee, and next, to defend the conduct of ministers: very properly for such a task, the members of the former committee, and the members of the administration, had been selected. What could be better when a man was accused, than to constitute him his own judge? Yet, after all, what had they to say? Nothing; but that the Derby trials had taken place; and that, if an insurrection had begun and proceeded, no man could tell the consequences. All had been taken for granted—not a tittle of evidence had been produced to shew that there had been any such insurrection; in fact, all that had occurred, had been occasioned by the backwardness of ministers in availing themselves of the powers they undoubtedly, and constitutionally possessed, by arresting those on Sunday who were about to rise on Monday; so that, in order to have the Derby trials, it was necessary to have an insurrection; and there could be no insurrection, unless ministers neglected their duty by not putting into effect the ordinary laws of the country. (Hear, hear, hear.) Contrivance and artifice were evident on the face of the whole business; and yet the report concluded with the assertion, (which every man expected of course from a body so constituted,) that ministers were a most meritorious set of men, and had preserved the constitution from ruin and destruction. Did the noble lord really flatter himself that he could impose upon the house; or, if he could, that he could juggle men of sense and independence out of doors? (Hear, hear.) The noble lord was as expert as any man at such things, and the delay of this notable report had been a part of the contrivance. The committee had sat for three weeks; public curiosity had been stretched from day to day; only the day before yesterday, the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bathurst) had stated, that a new point of the utmost importance had been started, which occasioned a new delay; and the postponement of the report until long after it had been presented in the other house, naturally led to the conclusion that there would be at least something in it; but who could assert that the report now launched upon the public contained any thing? It was unworthy to be taken into consideration, even according to the noble lord, and no measure was to be founded upon it. It arose from nothing—it was in itself nothing—and it was to lead to nothing. Nothing could come of nothing; or, if the noble lord's ingenuity could make something out of nothing, as, perhaps, had been very nearly accomplished when he himself was made a minister, he was afraid to avow it; he was ashamed, a quality in which he was not always abundant, to own that a bill of indemnity was to be founded upon such a thing as now laid upon the table. (Great confusion.) He (Mr. Tierney) did not believe a syllable of it; he would not believe assertions unsupported by proofs, and when all evidence to the contrary was rejected. (Hear, hear.) It was not very usual for men to be judges in their own cause; but that course had been here pursued, with many other novelties. On other occasions, when a green bag had been sent down, the aid of parliament was required: but here nothing was asked, excepting that the crown wished for the opinion of the house, while the ministers refused the means by which an opinion could be formed. No man in his senses would give credit to a body constituted as this committee had been. While the table was covered with petitions demanding inquiry; while the whole country wished to be satisfied why the constitution had been suspended, this notable report was put forth. He would not now repeat old arguments, old, but never answered, upon this subject; but he defied the noble lord to state any reason why the report was made, but that a bill of indemnity might be founded upon it; or, to shew any precedent of a committee named like the present, without purpose or result; or, in plain English, without head or tail. Where were the vouchers for this singular, not to say ridiculous, production? Not one had been submitted to the house; and, therefore, the report would give no more satisfaction to the country, than if every member of the committee had separately risen in his place in the house, and declared, that, in his opinion, (having, in truth, no opinion of his own) ministers were very wise men, had acted most discreetly and impartially, and had entitled themselves to the everlasting gratitude of the country and posterity. It was scarcely worth while to oppose seriously the motion for printing a document so absurd, contemptible, and ludicrous: it would, no doubt, be a waste of the paper on which it was impressed, and it would be also a waste of the time of the house to make further comments upon it.

Lord Castlereagh said, that though he did not intend to propose any thing to the house founded upon the report, yet the right hon. gentleman was, of course, at perfect liberty to do so, if he thought it proper or prudent. The opinion just expressed was undoubtedly strong, and considering that the report had been only once read, it was sufficiently summary; it was no less than that the right hon. gentleman did not believe a syllable it contained, and he, of course, endeavoured to excite a feeling in the house and in the country, in both of which he would completely fail, (Confusion on both sides) that the report was a production wholly unworthy of notice. What reliance would be placed upon this hasty judgment, either in doors or out of doors, experience would make evident. This was not the first time the country had had reason to think, that the right hon. gentleman was not the profoundest oracle that had ever sat on the other side of the house. (Hear, hear.) It was not difficult to prophesy, that, on the present occasion, as on many others, the right hon. gentleman would not succeed in deluding the public, in persuading them that no danger had existed, and that ministers deserved no credit for their promptitude, and their decision. Though the report was not to be taken into consideration on any particular day, yet occasions would be afforded for discussing it. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman and his friends need not despair of occasions when they might endeavour to renew discontent and alarm. (Hear, hear.) As to the assertion, that the opinion of the committee was nothing but the opinion of government, the right hon. gentleman must know too much of the constitution of that body, to suppose that the resolutions would all be passed without opposition; and it was quite a sufficient ground for appointing a committee to say, that it was desirable that the country should be informed of its real situation. (Hear.) The danger had been great, and was now happily diminished; but it was not yet so far past, but that it might return, unless proper and vigorous precautions were adopted. The moral and well-disposed part of the community had a right to know, as they did from this report, from what dangers they had escaped, and what yet remained to be encountered. It was no humiliation of the government, or of the house, to name a body for such a purpose; and while dangers still remained, they would be met by ministers with the same firmness of spirit, and vigour of action, that had hitherto distinguished them, recurring at the fit season to the salutary principles of the ordinary law. No man could deny that much had been accomplished by the powers with which the wisdom of parliament had invested ministers; and the country, now that the danger had been in some degree removed, were not to be imposed upon by being told that their fears had been idle, and the precautions taken by ministers unnecessary. It was fit that the report should be printed, and circulated among the members, and he did not apprehend that the house would carry the spirit of economy so far as not to consent that it should be printed. (Hear.)

Mr. Brougham remarked, that if the noble lord were so well informed as to the feelings of the house and of the country—if he thought the disposition of the one, or of the other, were so favourable to him and his friends, it was singular that, instead of submitting the whole inquiry to the whole parliament, he should have picked out a body for that purpose composed almost entirely of his own special associates and adherents. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord had said, that his right hon. friend was at liberty to submit a motion upon the subject of the report; but the noble lord seemed to forget, that the whole objection to this document was, that it was unworthy of any attention—that it was futile in its progress, and ridiculous in its conclusion. In fact, the committee were appointed, and carried on their inquiries, in such a manner, that there was not a man in the country who could expect to derive any advantage from them. It did not appear from the report, whether they had availed themselves of the power to call persons before them for examination. The noble lord, perhaps, would be more disinterested, and inform the house, whether the committee had had recourse to the only evidence worth having, namely, parol evidence. Ministers had professed a desire that the state of the country should be ascertained in a fair and impartial manner; and then, by way of making a show of impartiality, and to blind the country, they proposed one member from the opposition side of the house. It was true, they had named some others, but they knew that those members would either not attend on the committee, or would vote with ministers. With respect to his noble friend (Lord Milton), there was something like impartiality in naming him, as he was an avowed enemy of the measures to which ministers had resorted: but he was the only one admitted into the committee. His hon. friend on the bench below (Mr. W. Wynn) was not in that predicament—he was known to have a fixed and steady opinion in favour of the conduct which government had pursued last year; and he came to the inquiry prejudiced in favour of the former reports. The nomination of his hon. friend, therefore, was most insidious; he carried to the committee all the weight he derived from the side of the house to which he belonged, while, on this question, he was well known to have given his support throughout to ministers. In regard to another hon. and learned friend, whom the noble lord had named on the committee, it was well known that he did not attend on the former investigation; and it was anticipated, therefore, that he would not devote his attention to the present inquiry. In point of fact, this was a committee of the last secret committee; and they were selected in this way to whitewash the government, and to justify the reports of last year. (Hear, hear.) If any thing were wanting to satisfy the house and the country of the mockery of nominating a committee in this manner, it was the refusal of the noble lord to fill up the vacancy occasioned by the non-attendance of the member for Derbyshire, (Lord G. Cavendish) and of his hon. friend (Sir A. Piggott) who refused to attend on the former occasion, and who, he repeated, could not be expected to attend on this. Ministers attempted to make it appear that four members were taken from the opposition to sit on this committee; but the fact really was, they had taken but one. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the report, he would rather it were printed, that the country, who were anxiously watching their proceedings, and who had seen the way in which the committee were named, might also see the manner in which they had executed their duty.

Mr. Bathurst said, that the hon. and learned member (Sir A. Piggott) had attended on the whole inquiry of the first committee in the last session, and several times on the second committee. (Cries of no.) He (Mr. Bathurst) had asserted the fact, and would maintain it. What reason, then, had the ministers to suppose that he would not attend the present inquiry? They were not aware that he was more engaged in business this year than in the last, nor had they heard that he was prevented from attending by indisposition. Much had been said respecting the manner in which the committee had conducted their proceedings: but, he would ask, what was the meaning of a secret committee? From the very nature of the thing, the proceedings of such a committee must be secret: a secret committee could not act in any other way. The innocence or guilt of the persons implicated, and the propriety of bringing them to trial, was not the ultimate object of inquiry; the only question was, whether there appeared sufficient ground for government to demand extraordinary powers, and whether the house in general thought that those powers had been wantonly exercised, or whether they had been exercised with as much lenity and moderation, and as strictly consistent with legal forms, as the nature of the case, and the importance of circumstances, would admit. (Hear, hear.)

Sir William Burroughs said, he thought it incumbent on the noble lord to inform the house whether any and what viva voce evidence had been obtained by the committee. If the noble lord refused to give an answer, he should feel it his duty, if no other member came forward, to make a motion to the house, with a view of ascertaining the fact.

No answer was given.

Lord Folkestone said, that, on a former night, he had stated, that no precedent could be found for a bill of indemnity similar to that which was now to be introduced, except that which was passed in 1801. The noble lord opposite had contradicted that assertion, and declared, that it would be much more difficult to find an instance in which a bill of indemnity had not been passed under similar circumstances. Now he (Lord Folkestone), though he thought he was right on the former occasion, had since examined the matter more carefully, and he would repeat the assertion, that no precedent could be found for such a bill as was now proposed, except that of 1801. He stated this fact, for the purpose of challenging the noble lord to contradict it, if he could. He challenged him to produce a single precedent from the statute-book of this kingdom, except that to which he had before alluded, which would warrant the house to pass the bill which ministers demanded. The statute-book of Ireland might furnish a precedent; but the statutes of England would not afford a single instance in which a similar bill had received the sanction of the legislature, with the solitary exception of 1801. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh did not reply.

Mr. Brougham said, there was one very important circumstance connected with these transactions, which required some explanation, as no light was thrown upon it by the report of the secret committee. In the first report of the committee of last year, the house were told, that the doctrines of the Spenceans were calculated to produce the most imminent danger; that their object was to possess themselves of the landed property of the country, and then to seize upon the funds. It was known, that many gentlemen were greatly alarmed at this information, and had been induced to vote for the suspension of the ordinary laws of the land, from the terror which that system inspired. Now, as far as he had been able to attend to the report which had just been read, he did not hear a single word upon this subject, and he was at a loss to know why it had been passed over in silence on the present occasion. It was stated, indeed, that a revolution was still going on in London, and this, perhaps, might allude to the Spenceans; but no other part of the report referred to their plans. If the lips of the noble lord were not sealed, and he was not tied down to secrecy on this point, he could wish him to give some information to the house respecting it.

Lord Castlereagh could not understand on what ground the learned gentleman considered himself entitled to put questions to this member or that member of the committee. The committee had made their report, and he did not know why the hon. gentleman supposed that the Spenceans were not referred to in the danger which was stated to exist.

Mr. Brougham said, that, in the reports of last year, the Spenceans were referred to by name, and a great parade was made of the dangers to be apprehended from their system. (Hear, hear.)

The report was then ordered to be printed.

Sir W. Burroughs moved, that the committee be directed to report to the house whether any, and what number of persons had been examined, viva voce, touching the matters which had been referred to them.

Mr. Speaker apprehended that this motion could not be entertained. (Hear, hear.) The committee had made their report, and, consequently, had discharged the duties which they had to perform. It was obvious, therefore, that no further instructions could be given to them.

In point of fact, they had ceased to exist. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh then moved, that the secret papers which had been submitted to the committee should be returned to the office of the secretary of state for the home department.—Ordered.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.] Mr. W. Smith said, he held in his hand a petition from Norwich, praying, that that city might be included in any measure which the legislature might think proper to adopt for the better administration of justice in the four northern counties. The petition being brought up, the hon. member moved, that it be referred to the select committee on that subject, with an instruction to take the same into their consideration.—Ordered.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Mr. Bennet presented the following petition of Samuel Bamford, of Middleton, in the county palatine of Lancaster, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

"That at dusk on the 11th day of March 1817, a young man was introduced to the petitioner by doctor Joseph Healey at Middleton aforesaid; that the said young man stated himself to have been deputed by some persons in Manchester to propose to the petitioner and the rest of the Middleton reformers the burning and sacking of Manchester aforesaid, the storming of the barracks and New Bailey prison, and the liberation of the blanketeers confined in that place; that the above proposal was by the petitioner rejected with horror, and the petitioner, considering the young man as an innocent dupe to some spy, urged him by every legal, humane, and honourable consideration to have nothing more to do with the business; that the young man appearing affected, promised that he would never more propose such a thing to any person, and he shortly afterwards returned to Manchester, on his way to which place he told a person who accompanied him a short distance, that one Lomax, of Bank Top, in Manchester, was one of the persons who sent him to Middleton; that notwithstanding the above demonstration of the petitioner's reverence to the laws of his country, of his love to the principles of humanity, of his abhorrence to rapine and plunder, the petitioner was, on the morning of Saturday the 29th day of March, arrested on suspicion of high treason, by authority of a warrant signed by the secretary of state for the home department; that the petitioner was, by the deputy constable of Manchester, handcuffed like a common thief, and by the said deputy escorted by a party of the king's dragoon guards, conveyed to the New Bailey prison in Salford, where he was put into a common cell, in which were four other persons who were charged with felony; that the petitioner frequently requested the governor and turnkeys to let him have a blanket to shelter him from the intense cold, but that the petitioner's request was not attended unto; that, on the following morning, the petitioner was, with seven other persons, heavily ironed, and put into a stage-coach, in order to be conveyed to London; that the petitioner was accordingly, in company with the above seven persons, conveyed to London, by two king's messengers and two police runners; that on the night of the petitioner's arrival in London, when he retired to rest, he was chained in bed to two other fellow-prisoners (Healey and Lancashire;) that on the 1st day of April, the petitioner was taken to Lord Sidmouth's office at Whitehall, when Lord Sidmouth informed the petitioner that he (the petitioner) was arrested by virtue of a warrant signed by the said Lord Sidmouth; that afterwards the petitioner was taken to the house of correction in Cold Bath Fields; that on or about the 8th day of April, the petitioner was again examined by Lord Sidmouth, who repeated to him the aforesaid charge, and that the petitioner in his defence affirmed, that no just ground of suspicion could exist against him, for that instead of having done or encouraged to be done any thing of a treasonable nature, his conduct had always been the reverse; the petitioner at the same time acknowledged himself to be a reformer, and did then, as he still does, take credit to himself for so being, but strenuously denied having ever recommended violence in the accomplishment of a reform; that during the month of April the petitioner was frequently examined, at one of which examinations Lord Sidmouth questioned him respecting his knowledge of a person named Lomax, whether the petitioner was ever in company of said Lomax, upon what occasion the petitioner was in company of said Lomax, and what was the subject of discourse during the time the petitioner was in said company, to all of which questions the petitioner answered simply and truly, whereupon Lord Sidmouth observed, 'This cannot be the man,' or words to that effect, for the petitioner had understood Lord Sidmouth as having alluded to a near neighbour of the petitioner's, residing at Middleton; but when the petitioner in his prison room began to reflect upon every circumstance, he saw the improbability of his former conjecture, and was convinced that Lord Sidmouth meant one Lomax, who resided at Bank Top at Manchester, and who, after the arrests which took place at that town, was recognised by the whole country as a spy in the pay of the police; the same Lomax, at whose instigation the young man, mentioned in the beginning of this petition, proposed to the petitioner the burning and sacking of Manchester, which proposal was rejected by the petitioner as before stated; that on the 29th day of April the petitioner was liberated from his confinement in Cold Bath Fields prison, and was allowed 3*l.* to carry him home to Middleton aforesaid; that from the foregoing circumstances, the petitioner ventures to express confidence, that the house will perceive the extreme probability of the petitioner's arrest having taken place in consequence of false information furnished by the aforesaid notorious Lomax; but that whatever may be the opinion of the house respecting this conclusion, they will not fail to express that strong feeling of indignation and abhorrence which ought always to animate the guardians of the lives and liberties of Englishmen, when, as in the case of the petitioner, their lives are basely endangered and their liberties violated; wherefore the petitioner prays that the house will no longer countenance a system of terror, of blood, and of oppression, by granting to his majesty's ministers a bill, indemnifying them from the consequences of the numerous outrages by them committed against the constitution of this realm."

Mr. Bennet then presented the following petition of Elijah Dixon, of Manchester, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioner was, on the 12th day of March 1817, whilst following his lawful occupation, apprehended by a warrant issued by Lord Sidmouth, and carried to London in double irons, and was, on the 15th of the same month, committed to Tothill Fields Bridewell by the same noble lord on suspicion of high treason, and there detained till the 13th of November, although the said noble lord must or might have known that he was perfectly innocent of the crime imputed to him; the petitioner therefore prays, that the house will be pleased to consider the justice of making the said noble lord responsible for the loss of time of the petitioner, and for the injuries which his family has suffered, in consequence of his long, unjust, and unredressed imprisonment; he also prays, that they will be pleased to adopt such a reform in the election of members to serve in the house, as shall give each man a feeling sense that he is really represented, and enable him once more proudly to boast of our glorious constitution, in king, lords, and commons."

Mr. Bennet next presented the following petition of Robert Pilkington, an inhabitant of the township of Bury, in the county palatine of Lancaster, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. Setting forth, "That, on the 18th April 1817, a king's messenger, attended by three special constables, entered his house, demanding his attendance, and, when he disputed the authority of these intruders to seize on his person, the only authority they exhibited was the gorget of the messenger; this he considered insufficient, but was under the necessity of submitting, as one of the messenger's attendants seized him by the collar of his coat, and dragged him from his family, which consisted of a wife and six small children, with whom he was about to retire to rest; and when he remonstrated with the messenger's attendants on being conducted in so brutal a manner (reminding them that he had not attempted to escape), only oaths and imprecations added to the disgraceful scene; he also charges these unlawful visitants with robbing his house of a number of papers and publications; also, when he was loaded with irons and seated in the mail, he heard the deputy constable of Manchester say to his emissaries that were to attend the petitioner, that he would give them five pounds if they could hang him; the petitioner hopes that the house will not suffer such violations of decorum in its officers of peace without manifesting its displeasure; after the petitioner arrived in London, he was three times conveyed to Whitehall, and twice given to expect an examination and twice disappointed; at first these officious gentlemen affected not to have sufficient information, and, when this twice-promised examination came on, he had to endure the mortification of only hearing declarations without foundation, without one word or act being specified that he had said or done, and without being asked one question; after this mock examination, he was committed on suspicion of a crime of which he was not guilty, and has had since to endure the torture of solitary incarceration for upwards of seven months, without being permitted to walk in the open air for a single hour; and in opposition to a positive declaration of Lord Castlereagh in the house, his wife had been refused the privilege of seeing him during his confinement in Manchester, and that two gentlemen of respectability had met with the same denial from the governor of Surrey gaol; that, in consequence of his late imprisonment, his family has had to endure sufferings too complicated for this statement; his house has been broke up, and his family necessitated to enter the workhouse, and have there been treated in an inhuman manner: although his oldest child was then only eleven years of age, two of them, and his wife, have been confined in the workhouse dungeon, one has been in irons for three days, one has been confined a night and a day without meat, or even water to drink, with many other abuses; and, when this inhuman governor was remonstrated with respecting his conduct, he had the audacity to say he had received orders how to treat them; the petitioner now hopes that, after suffering in his mind, body, character, and family, the house will not preclude him, by any bill of indemnity, from obtaining a just redress by virtue of the law of the land; but, should they pass a bill that will indemnify all those that have, under the auspices of government, committed their ravages on society during the suspension of the habeas corpus, to the injury of individuals and to the ruin of families, it may be assured that both law and legislators will cease to possess that respect originally paid to the British house of commons and its admirable laws; the petitioner is of opinion that there are traitors of the blackest hue; if he be one, he refuses not to suffer; and, except the house enters into a rigid inquiry for the purpose of bringing them to condign punishment, the petitioner is convinced that it must, in the sight of God and injured society, be guilty of all the flagrant enormities that have taken place during the suspension of its own laws; the petitioner, therefore, for the honour of the nation, the welfare of society, the punishment of offenders, and the redress of injured innocence, hopes the house will possess its original dignity, in honestly, manfully, and courageously refusing to pass a bill that will indemnify villains who have committed notorious depredations with impunity."

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Bennet presented three petitions of inhabitants of the town of Nottingham, praying for annual parliaments and universal suffrage.—Ordered to lie on the table.

ARMY ESTIMATES.] Lord Palmerston rose to submit to the house, whether, after the time which had been occupied with the report of the secret committee, they wished him to proceed with the statement of the army estimates, which were appointed for discussion this night. He was prepared to go into the subject, but as several members had retired, it might be more desirable, perhaps, to defer the discussion till Monday. Beyond that day, it ought not to be delayed, on account of the necessity of passing the mutiny bill. He should now move, that the order of the day be read for granting a supply to his majesty, and either proceed with his statement, or postpone it, as the house might think most expedient.

Lord Folkestone wished to make one or two remarks. He recollected that, about six years ago, he complained of an order that was issued by the Horse-Guards for giving general officers in the German legion permanent rank in the British army. He was then answered, that they would have that rank only while serving in the German legion, and that the legion must, by the act under which it was taken into our service, be broken up six months after the conclusion of peace. It was natural to suppose, therefore, that, after the dismissal of the German legion, the general officers would also disappear from the list; but he now found fifteen or sixteen general officers on the army list, entered as from the German legion. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Palmerston said, that not knowing the names to which the noble lord alluded, he could only return a general answer. He assured the noble lord, however, that what he had stated formerly on this subject was perfectly correct. On the expiration of the act alluded to, all the officers who had commissions in the German legion, ceased to belong to our service. A few of those who were natural born subjects of this country, after the expiration of their service, received commissions in the English army.

Lord Folkestone hoped the noble lord would inquire into the subject. He was convinced that the persons to whom he had alluded were not natural born subjects.

Mr. Grenfell wished to say a few words on the subject of certain papers then upon the table. The hon. gentleman was proceeding with his observations, when Mr. Speaker stated the question, and observed, that the hon. gentleman was not in order.

Lord Palmerston then moved, that the house resolve itself into a committee of supply, and that the army estimates be referred to the said committee.

Mr. Grenfell said, he would now take the liberty of making a few observations. He considered that he was entitled to address the house on any subject connected with the supply. After having called for the several papers which the Bank of England had lately produced to the house, he thought it due from him to take some notice of them, although he did not mean to submit any specific motion on the subject. The papers were 14 in number. (See page 116.) The first class related to the amount of Bank paper in circulation in 1817. Now, it appeared, that the average permanent amount of Bank notes which had been outstanding from July last, a period of seven months, exceeded, by more than two millions, the highest amount of Bank notes in circulation during any period of like duration, from the time of the restriction act in 1797 up to the present moment. (Hear, hear, hear.) When he coupled this fact with what was equally notorious, namely, the increase which had taken place, in the same period, in the amount of country bank paper, it was unnecessary to assign any other cause for the increase in the price of the precious metals. The next class of papers related to the amount of public money in the hands of the Bank. Last year the amount was nine millions. They had made a loan of three millions; but there still remained six millions in their hands. The other papers stated the allowances made by the public to the Bank, or charged by the Bank against the public. He should not, however, go into the subject at present, as he hoped that a committee above stairs would settle the charges which the Bank ought to receive.

Mr. Manning said, the balances at present happened accidentally to be much larger than they had been for some time previously; they had seldom exceeded four millions, while government had received three millions without interest. With respect to the amount of Bank notes in circulation, the directors had no desire to push the circulation beyond what was necessary to the country, and he did not believe that any inconvenience had resulted from the amount of notes outstanding.

Sir J. Newport said, the directors of the Bank might not think that their issues had been carried to any inconvenient extent, but the public might think otherwise. Connecting the increased issue of paper with the increased price of the precious metals, it was impossible that any man could doubt that the increase of the latter was owing to the excess of the former. His hon. friend was intitled to the thanks of the country for his meritorious exertions on these subjects, and he trusted, that he would persevere in exposing the enormous profits arising from the monopoly of the Bank. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he should not then enter upon any of the questions relative to the Bank, which had been so often debated in that house. The question now was, whether the army estimates should be referred to the committee of supply.

This question was put from the chair, and it was resolved, that the consideration of the estimates should be postponed till Monday.

BANK DOLLARS AND TOKENS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice, that, on Monday next, he should move for leave to bring in a bill to amend an act passed in the last session, intituled, "An act to prevent the further circulation of dollars and tokens, issued by the governor and company of the Bank of England, for the convenience of the public." The object of the bill would be, to extend the time for the circulation of those dollars and tokens, as he wished to afford every possible convenience to the public.

Mr. Grenfell said, he would take that opportunity of correcting an opinion which had gone abroad, that the Bank had profited by issuing tokens. He believed the very reverse to be the fact. When the directors issued them, the 3s. tokens might have cost them 2s. 10d.; but what was their situation when they came to take them up? They took them up, it would be understood, by tale, and not by weight; and what cost them 2s. 10d. at the time when they were issued, at the present moment would not be of more value than 2s. 5d. or 2s. 4d.; so that they would lose the difference between 2s. 5d., or 2s. 4d. and 2s. 10d., or 2s. 6d., whatever sum it was at which the calculation had been made. If, therefore, any expense should be incurred in recalling the tokens, it ought to fall upon the government, and not upon the Bank.

Mr. Manning said, he had always stated in his place, that the Bank had lost by their tokens.

General Thornton was of opinion, that it would be very necessary to prolong the time for the circulation of tokens. A very short time ago, when he was in the country, he observed that the local tokens were in circulation, which was plainly owing to the want of other silver. He hoped the circulation would be continued, at least till other silver should be issued.

SAVINGS BANKS, (IRELAND).] Sir J. Newport said, he had a motion to submit, to which he did not think there would be any objection. It was relative to the Irish savings banks. The act that had been passed in the last session had been to a certain extent efficacious. It had been productive of most of the results which were anticipated, and was likely to have all the beneficial consequences that the most sanguine had expected.—The right hon. baronet then moved that there be laid before the house, an account of the amount of the money subscribed to the different savings banks in Ireland.—Ordered.

ORDNANCE.] Mr. R. Ward brought up papers containing an account of the expenses in the ordnance department incurred by the army of occupation in France, under the command of the Duke of Wellington.—Ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 2.

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.] At ten o'clock, when their lordships met for judicial proceedings, Mr. Rose, clerk of the Parliaments, appeared in the house, and was sworn into office. He was accompanied by the clerk of the crown, who administered the oath, both kneeling during the ceremony. Mr. Rose then appointed Mr. Cowper to sign the necessary papers during his absence; and Mr. Birch and Mr. Corry were appointed additional clerks.

PETITION OF MR. BUTT.] Earl Grosvenor presented a petition of Richard Gathorne Butt, now a prisoner in the King's Bench prison, on sentences for libels upon Lord Ellenborough and Lord Castlereagh, complaining that he had been refused a habeas corpus to enable him to go up to the court, to plead his own cause in some actions in which he was a party.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.] Petitions were presented, in favour of the bill for prohibiting the employment of climbing boys, by the Earl of Lauderdale, from certain master chimney-sweepers in London and Westminster, and from the inhabitants of Hackney, Homerton, &c.; by Lord Prudhoe, from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Kingsland, Alston, &c.; by Lord Holland, from Clerkenwell; and by Earl Grosvenor, from Chester. The first petition from the master chimney-sweepers stated, that they had introduced the use of machines in their business, and found, that they superseded the necessity of employing boys; that such flues as were most difficult for using machines were precisely those into which it was most dangerous for climbing boys to enter; and that the practice of sweeping with machines would never be carried into effect, unless a bill of the nature of that before their lordships' house were passed.

Earl Grosvenor, in presenting the petition from Chester, made some observations on the evidence, which he considered perfectly sufficient to warrant the passing of the bill.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, the more clear and manifest the evidence was made, the more completely would the public go along with their lordships in passing the bill.

The Bishop of Chester had great satisfaction in stating, that he approved of the petition which the noble earl had presented from the city with which he was connected. The practice of employing climbing boys was fraught with so much inhumanity, that he hoped the bill for abolishing it would soon be passed into a law.

PERSONS ARRESTED FOR TREASON.] The Earl of Carnarvon said, he had come to the house with the intention of moving for some papers, and, in particular, for an account of all persons arrested under the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and all whose houses were searched on charges of tumultuous or seditious proceedings, with copies of the warrants of arrest and search. It would have been most convenient for him to have made the motion to-night, in order that the account might be procured as speedily as possible; and he had trusted that its production would not be opposed, as papers of a more extensive nature had already been granted. None of his Majesty's ministers were, however, present, and as he did not know whether the noble Secretary of State would be disposed to grant this account in the state he wished it, he should postpone his motion until to-morrow.

Lord Holland hoped that the noble and learned lord on the woolsack would, by that time, grant his writ of habeas corpus to bring up the bodies of his Majesty's ministers. (A laugh.)

The Lord Chancellor said, they would be in their places to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 2.

LEATHER TAX.] Petitions against this tax were presented from Enniscorthy, Northamptonshire, Cornwall, Suffolk, Aberdeen, Ellesmere, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Edinburgh, Darlington, South Shields, Bolton, and Manchester.—They were all ordered to lie on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Hart Davis presented a petition from Bristol, signed by 20 persons, praying for a reform in the representation. He stated, that he had received a letter by which he was requested to present it. The postscript to the letter mentioned, that several hundred similar petitions were in preparation, and that it was expected, there would be a thousand of them, each signed by 20 persons. If these thousand petitions should arrive, he could only say that he did not think they would express the sense of his constituents; those whom he best knew had confidence in the wisdom of parliament, and were enemies to radical reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Protheroe presented a petition from Bristol, signed by 20 persons, praying that all male persons (infants, insanes, and criminals excepted) might have the right of voting for members of parliament. He could not undertake to say how many of the people of Bristol were of this opinion; but he thought the petition was short, clear, and perspicuous, and expressed the ideas of the petitioners. He had himself always been a friend to a moderate parliamentary reform, but could not be the advocate of so great an alteration as was prayed for. Yet he thought it right that the petitioners should have a fair opportunity of expressing their opinions to the house.—Ordered to lie on the table.

WATER COMPANIES.] Mr. M. A. Taylor gave notice, that it was his intention to submit a measure to the house for the better regulation of water companies. A dreadful fire had broken out in the Strand yesterday morning, and the want of water, for a considerable length of time after the arrival of the engines, had been fatal to the lives and property of many persons. It was his intention to bring forward some measure to remedy this evil, and to provide that a supply of water should be given to the public in case of fire. At present, he could give only a general notice of his intention, without fixing any particular time.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION.] Mr. Bennet rose, to move for leave to bring in a bill "for repealing such parts of several acts as allow pecuniary and other rewards on the conviction of persons for highway robbery and other crimes and offences; and for facilitating the means of prosecuting persons accused of felony, and other offences." The hon. member said, he could have wished that this subject had been taken up, and introduced, by some legal gentleman, who, by professional knowledge and experience, would have been better qualified than himself; but, having been a member of the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the police of the metropolis; and having lately passed a considerable portion of his time in considering subjects of this nature, and feeling, in common with a great number of individuals, that some measure like that which he intended to propose, was indispensably necessary, he was induced to trouble the house with a bill to repeal certain parts of the law respecting rewards on conviction. The house were aware, that, in order to encourage the apprehending of certain felons, rewards and immunities are bestowed on such as bring them to justice, by divers acts of parliament. By the statute 4 & 5 William and Mary, c. 8., it is enacted, that such as apprehend a highwayman, and prosecute him to conviction, shall receive a reward of 40*l*. from the public; to be paid to them, (or, if killed in the endeavour to take him, their executors) by the sheriff of the county; besides the horse, furniture, arms, money, and other goods taken upon the person of such robber; with a reservation of the right of any person from whom the same may have been stolen.—By the statute 6 and 7 William III. c. 17., such as apprehend a person who shall have counterfeited any of the current coin of the realm, or that for lucre or gain shall have clipped, washed, filed, or in any way diminished the same, or shall bring or cause to be brought into the kingdom, any clipt, false, or counterfeit coin, and prosecute him to conviction, shall receive a reward of 40*l*.—By statute 10 and 11 William III. c. 23., any person apprehending and prosecuting to conviction a felon guilty of burglary, house-breaking, horse-stealing, or private larceny, to the value of 5s. from any shop, warehouse, coachhouse, or stable, shall receive a certificate, which may be assigned over once and no more; and the original proprietor of such certificate, or the assignee of the same, shall be excused from all parish and ward offices within the parish or ward wherein the felony shall be committed.—By statute 5 Anne, c. 31., any person apprehending and prosecuting to conviction a burglar, or felonious house-breaker, in the day-time, (or, if killed in the attempt, his executors) shall have and receive, over and above the rewards by the said act of the 10th and 11th of William and Mary, the sum of 40*l.*—By statute 14 George II. c. 6., explained by 15 George II. c. 34., any person apprehending and prosecuting to conviction such as steal, or kill with intent to steal, any sheep or other cattle specified in the latter of the said acts, shall for every such conviction receive a reward of 10*l.*—By statute 15 George II. c. 28, persons apprehending and prosecuting to conviction any person who shall commit any of the offences thereby made high-treason or felony, relating to the coin, shall receive a reward of 40*l.*; and for apprehending and convicting any person who shall counterfeit any of the copper coin, the reward of 10*l.*—Now, it had been found by experience, that the encouragement given by these several acts of parliament, by way of pecuniary and other rewards, for the apprehension and prosecution of persons guilty of the several crimes and offences therein mentioned, had not produced the wholesome effects of diminishing the crimes and offences thereby intended to be prevented or checked. But, it had been found, that the hope or expectation of obtaining such rewards, had instigated evil-disposed persons to conspire to entrap the unwary and ignorant into the commission of offences, for which they have afterwards been apprehended and prosecuted to conviction by such conspirators, whereby encouragement has not only been given to the commission of such crimes and offences, but the laws of God and man have been violently transgressed. There could be nothing more objectionable than the effect which this system of rewards had, of training up offenders in all the gradations of crime, till they arrived at the last stage, when a reward could be obtained for their conviction. Every person must see, that a punishment, however slight, if certain, was much more efficacious for the repression of offences than more severe punishments, which, it was known, were seldom inflicted. There could be no question, however, that juvenile offenders were permitted to roam at large, and to commit iniquities, till their crimes gave a certain value to the seizing of them; indeed, till, as it was technically called, they weighed 40*l.* (Hear, hear.) The shocking practices to which these rewards led, and which were detailed by many magistrates, and others, connected with the police of the metropolis, might be seen in the minutes of evidence taken by the committee; and, for an elucidation of some of them, he would refer more particularly to the evidence of a most respectable gentleman, Mr. Shelton, clerk of the arraigns. On this subject there was surely enough to warrant the interference of the house. It was stated in evidence, that, on the trial of criminals, the first question frequently put to witnesses was, what would they gain by the conviction? By this means, persons of whose guilt there could be no doubt, were frequently, from the difficulty of obtaining witnesses, acquitted; because witnesses felt their characters assailed by the sort of question that was put to them, and the idea of receiving blood-money hung like a stone about their necks. The criminal, indeed, generally escaped, where a police officer was the principal witness, because, the idea of reward struck the jury, who, therefore, did not give to his evidence the weight which it would have otherwise received. But the great and crying evil of the present system was, that it led to conspiracies, to entrap the unwary to commit crimes, in order to obtain the reward on conviction. The public attention had lately been powerfully called to the subject of such conspiracies; and an investigation respecting one, (the case of two boys, named Kelly and Spicer,) was at this very time on foot. But this was not the first time that men had lent themselves to the purpose of entrapping individuals into the commission of offences, for the sake of obtaining the reward on conviction. As early as 1756, several persons were convicted of having been concerned in conspiracies of this nature. One of those persons, of the name of M'Daniel, acknowledged, that 70 persons in all had been convicted at different times on evidence furnished by him. On one occasion, a man voluntarily submitted to be robbed, but the judge thought, that, to constitute a robbery, force should be proved. Three persons concerned in this business were tried for a conspiracy, but they were so roughly handled by the populace, that one of them was killed, and another died soon afterwards. Unfortunately, these were not solitary instances. In the year 1772, about 20 persons were the victims of such machinations. The conspiracies which were discovered about a year ago, were well known to the house. (He alluded to the case of Brock, Pelham, and Power. See page 568.) The case which lately happened to be discovered in Newgate, (that of Kelly and Spicer,) was one in which the execution of the sentence of the law had been most properly suspended. He did not mean to say, that, in this case, the conspiracy was as clearly made out as in the case of the poor men who were convicted on the evidence of Brock, Pelham, and Power; but there was a well-founded suspicion that Kelly and Spicer were the victims of the same system. How many others might have been sacrificed to these contrivances, it was impossible to say, but the general persuasion was, that the instances had been too numerous.—He should now proceed to state the objects of the bill which he intended to propose. In the first place, he submitted to the house, that it would be highly expedient to repeal so much of the act of the 4th and 5th of William and Mary, as authorizes and directs the receipt and payment of the sum of 40*l*., by way of reward, for apprehending and convicting highwaymen;—so much of the act of the 6th and 7th of William III. as authorizes and directs the receipt and payment of the sum of 40*l*. by way of reward for apprehending and convicting persons who shall have counterfeited any of the current coin, or that for lucre or gain shall have clipped, washed, filed, or any ways diminished the same, or shall bring or cause to be brought into the kingdom any clipt, false, or counterfeit coin;—so much of the act of the 5th of Anne, as authorizes and directs the receipt and payment of the sum of 40*l*. by way of reward, for apprehending and convicting burglars, or felonious house-breakers, in the day-time;—so much of the act of the 14th of George II. explained by the act of the 15th of George II. as authorizes and directs the receipt and payment of the sum of 10*l*. for apprehending and convicting such as steal, or kill with intent to steal, any sheep or other cattle specified in the last of the said acts;—and also, so much of the said act of the 15th of George II. as authorizes and directs the receipt and payment of the sum of 40*l*. by way of reward, for apprehending and convicting persons who shall have committed treason or felony relating to the coin, and the receipt and payment of the sum of 10*l*. by way of reward, for apprehending and convicting persons who shall have counterfeited any of the copper money therein mentioned.—With respect to the act of the 10th and 11th of William III. which directs that a certificate, or, as it is now technically called, a Tyburn ticket, to exempt from parish or ward offices, shall be given to any person who shall apprehend and convict a felon guilty of burglary, house-breaking, horse-stealing, or private larceny, to the value of 5*s*. from any shop, warehouse, coach-house or stable—he did not mean to propose that that part of the act should be repealed; but he thought it would be proper to enact, that such certificate should not be transferrable, or, in other words, that it should not exempt or discharge from parish or ward offices, any other person whomsoever than the person to whom the same was originally granted.—And, with respect to so much of the act of the 4th and 5th of William and Mary, which gives to the executors and administrators of any person who shall happen to be killed, in endeavouring to apprehend, or in making pursuit after, a robber, the reward of 40*l*. besides the horse, furniture, arms, money, and other goods taken upon the person of such robber—and also, with respect to so much of the act of Anne, which gives the reward to the executors or administrators of any watchman, or any other person or persons who shall happen to be killed by any burglar or house-breaker—it was his intention, that such parts of the said acts should remain in force.—In the next place, he meant to make a provision for paying the expenses of prosecution. At present, many persons are deterred from prosecuting individuals guilty of felony, on account of the expense and loss of time attending such prosecutions, whereby the ends of justice are frequently defeated. The bill would, therefore, enact, that the court, before whom any person shall be prosecuted or tried for any grand or petit larceny, or other felony, should order the sheriff or treasurer of the county in which the offence shall have been committed, to pay unto the prosecutor and witnesses, and persons concerned in the apprehension, respectively, as well the costs, charges, and expenses which such prosecutor shall be put to in preferring the indictment, as also such sum of money as to the court shall seem reasonable and sufficient to reimburse such prosecutor and witnesses, and persons concerned in the apprehension, for the expenses they shall be put to in attending before the grand jury to prefer the indictment, and in otherwise carrying on the prosecution, and also compensate such prosecutor and witnesses, and persons concerned in the apprehension, for their loss of time and trouble therein. In furtherance of this object, the bill would contain two clauses: one, that in case the court shall make any order for the payment of any sum of money to the persons concerned in the apprehension of the offender, the same shall be paid by the sheriff of the county in which the offence shall have been committed, in the like manner, and at the same period of time as the rewards are directed to be paid by the said acts of 4th and 5th of William and Mary, the 6th of William III., the 5th of Anne, and the 14th and 15th of George the Second:—the other, that every such order for costs and charges shall be made by the Clerk of Assize or Clerk of the Peace, respectively, upon being paid the sum of one shilling and no more.—These were the sole objects of the bill, which, he hoped, would meet with the approbation of the house. He should, therefore, conclude with moving, that leave be given to bring it in.

Leave was immediately given, and the bill was ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bennet, Sir Samuel Romilly, and Mr. Brougham.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.] Sir Samuel Romilly brought in his bill "to repeal so much of an act passed in the 10th and 11th years of the reign of King William the Third, intituled, 'An Act for the better apprehending, prosecuting and punishing of Felons that commit Burglary, Housebreaking, or Robbery in Shops, Warehouses, Coachhouses, or Stables, or that steal Horses;' as takes away the Benefit of Clergy from Persons privately stealing Goods in any Shop, Warehouse, Coachhouse, or Stable, and for more effectually preventing Crimes."—Read a first time, ordered to be printed. It was as follows:—

"Whereas by an act passed in the tenth and eleventh years of the reign of King William the IIId, intituled, 'An act for the better apprehending, prosecuting and punishing of felons that commit burglary, house-breaking or robbery, in shops, warehouses, coach-houses, or stables, or that steal horses,' it is amongst other things enacted, that all and every person and persons that shall at any time and times, by night or in the day-time, from and after the 20th day of May, in the year 1699, in any shop, warehouse, coach-house, or stable, privately and feloniously steal any goods, wares or merchandises, being of the value of 5s. or more, although such shop, warehouse, coach-house or stable be not actually broke open by such offender or offenders, and although the owners of such goods, or any other person or persons, be or be not in such shop, warehouse, coach-house or stable, to be put in fear, or shall assist, hire or command any person or persons to commit such offence, being thereof convicted or attainted by verdict or confession, or being indicted thereof shall stand mute, or will not directly answer to the indictment, or shall peremptorily challenge above the number of 23 persons returned to be of the jury, shall be absolutely debarred and excluded of and from the benefit of clergy:

And whereas the said act has not been found effectual for the prevention of the crimes therein mentioned; and it is therefore expedient that so much of the said act as is hereinbefore recited, should be repealed:

And whereas it might tend more effectually to prevent the crime of larceny in shops, warehouses, coach-houses and stables, if every such offence were punishable more severely than simple larceny; Be it therefore enacted, that so much of the said act as is hereinbefore recited, shall from and after be, and the same is hereby repealed.

And be it further enacted, that from every person who shall privately and feloniously steal any goods, wares or merchandises, of the value of or more, in any shop, warehouse, coach-house or stable, or who shall aid or assist any person to commit such offence, shall be liable to be transported beyond the seas for or such term, not less than years, as the judge before whom any such person shall be convicted shall adjudge; or shall be liable, in case the said judge shall think fit, to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, in the common gaol, house of correction, or penitentiary house, for any term not exceeding

ELECTION LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. P. Moore presented a petition from Coventry against this bill.

Mr. Wynn moved the third reading, and stated, that he should propose an amendment, to obviate an objection that had been made with respect to the closing of the poll on the second day, if 400 voters should not have polled. The object of the amendment would be, to declare, that all votes tendered should be included in that number, if found to be ultimately good, though they might not have been decided at the close of the poll.

Sir C. Monck observed, that the returning officer was authorized to appoint as many constables as he thought necessary. This was a power that might be used for a particular influence; and it seemed desirable, that such power should not be given so as to serve a political view.

Mr. Allan objected to the provisions of the bill, and moved, that it be read a third time this day six months.

Mr. Marryat said, that from all he heard, it was clear that the more the bill was considered, the greater would be the necessity of amendments. What had been done appeared to him unsatisfactory. He objected to the proposed regulations concerning the poll, which applied the same principle to counties and boroughs. The house ought to pause before they passed this bill into a law. If it might be applicable to county elections, it was not so for all places. It tended to compel a candidate to bring up all the non-resident voters in his favour on the first day of the poll. Yet he might not know that he wanted them. The bill would be productive of an increase in the expense of elections. Besides, the bringing up of all the voters at the beginning of the poll would only tend to increase the danger of riots and disturbances. Its effect might frequently be to deprive a great number of voters of the privilege of exercising their elective franchise. The inconveniences would be very great at a general election. He wished neither to increase the expenses of election, nor to impair the free exercise of the privileges of the electors; but he objected to the transference of any part of the expense to their constituents. Upon this principle, why not transfer the whole? and then, as in America and France, vote next, that members should be paid for their time? He could not approve of the proposal for abolishing the giving away of cockades. That practice assisted a very useful and valuable branch of our manufactures (hear), and which at present stood greatly in need of encouragement. (A laugh.) The disposition to rioting proceeded, not from the cockade in the hat, but from the liquor in the head. He objected also to a clause respecting proof of redemption of land-tax. Persons should submit to the consequences of their own neglect. As to declaring the election in certain cases where there was no opposition, he supposed members knew well enough the maxim of divide et impera. (A laugh.) It was to be observed, that it was proposed to pass this bill just when they were upon the eve of a general election. It would be more decorous to let the measure stand over, and that gentlemen should take the opportunity of consulting their constituents on the effects of the clauses of the bill. If the bill were to be passed now, the house wou'd be rushing in upon a new system respecting the law and practice of elections, just at the time when a general election was about to take place.

Mr. Protheroe objected to the clause respecting cockades. He wished the bill to be recommitted, as he approved of some parts of it; he should otherwise vote for the amendment.

Sir W. Burroughs said, the clause which put an end to the poll at the conclusion of the second day, if 400 voters had not polled, was very objectionable. A candidate might object to his adversary's votes, and thus put an end to the election unfairly; for the bill, on the supposition that every vote would be objected to, allowed only 63 seconds to determine on each. The clause, too, which imposed a penalty of 100*l.* on any one who gave away a cockade, would occasion vexatious prosecutions.

Mr. Hammersley thought, that this was a selfish bill on the part of the house, and he was sorry to see so little disposition to object to it. The inconvenience that had been alleged as the reason for this act, was, that the member for Devonshire had been obliged to stand four days before his constituents, by the opposition of a person who had very few votes. He did not think this a hardship to be complained of by a gentleman, who thereby became the representative of a populous county for seven years. The longer the hon. member stood before his constituents the better for himself, and for them. (A laugh.) He thought this bill tended, by diminishing expense, to introduce into the house persons of less weight and respectability than would otherwise be elected.

Mr. Wilberforce observed, that the bill affixed a penalty to the giving away of cockades—but that member would be thought a very shabby fellow who did not submit to this additional expense. (A member suggested that the penalty was affixed to each offence). If it were meant to apply to the giving of each cockade, it was not so expressed in the bill, nor would it be so interpreted. He remembered the case of a prosecution against a man for exercising the trade of a tailor; he was proceeded against separately for several acts done in the same day: when Lord Kenyon said, that if the man could be prosecuted for different acts in one day, he might as well be sued for penalties on every stitch. It would be better to impose a small penalty, 5*l.* for instance, on any person giving a cockade, for each cockade given, and to avoid the delicate question of agency, which was one of the most difficult to be determined either by a court, or a committee of the house. He did not think the bill could be considered as merely intended for the benefit of the candidates. It was a benefit to the country at large, that persons who would be preferred by the electors on political principles, or from local connections, should not be thrust out by weight of purse, by men less deserving of support, morally or politically. It was the duty of the house to watch over the interests of the country gentlemen, who were the glory and the strength of the country.

Mr. F. Douglas approved of the bill, but thought it better that some of the clauses should not be put in operation for two years, as from their enactment on the eve of an election, they might be twisted for partial purposes, which could hardly be foreseen.

Sir J. Graham objected to the clause which rendered it no longer necessary for freeholders to adduce a proof that their tenement was assessed to the land-tax. It would not be difficult to adduce a proof, by certificate from the tax-office, that the land tax of a tenement had been redeemed; this was a main security against fraudulent voters. He objected to the payment of the expense of the hustings out of the county rates, and to the power given to the returning officers to appoint any number of constables. The returning officers were not always of the highest description, and might make a job at the expense of the county. The magistrates were the proper judges of the number of peace-officers who were necessary.

Mr. Lockhart approved of the general principle of the bill, especially of the part forbidding the distribution of cockades. He had known 30,000 cockades given away at an election, and this signal of party was thus made an engine of bribery, not to the multitude at large, but towards persons of particular trades. It was doubtful, however, whether a simple limitation of the length of polls would not be better than the complicated machinery now introduced, the effect of which it was not easy to foresee.

General Thornton expressed a hope that the bill would not proceed any farther.

Mr. Peter Moore observed, that the effect of some of the restrictions would be to disfranchise one-third of his constituents. The restriction on the use of cockades was, in his opinion, highly inexpedient, as it tended to discourage an extensive branch of manufacture. This view of the subject had excited a smile in the house; but it was a matter of serious importance to many thousands of industrious individuals who derived their support from the manufacture in question. If the bill were amended, so as to do away with these objections, he should feel it his duty to support it.

Mr. Wynn replied. He could not conceive that any new candidates should come forward after the first day, with the least prospect of success. At present, if any one candidate chose, he could keep the poll open to the last moment allowed by the law, which was fifteen days. This he considered as a very great evil, and well worthy of the attention of the house. It had been said, that this was a selfish measure on the part of members. On the contrary, he viewed it as calculated to relieve electors themselves. The very first principle of the constitution was, that freeholders should be represented in that house, free of expense. To give effect to this principle was the leading object of the bill. The first clause objected to, was that respecting the building of booths and polling places. It had been said, that to throw the expense of these erections upon the county, was to encourage ambitious candidates to come forward. But it should be recollected, that, at present, any candidate could avoid this expense. He had only to avoid offering himself, but to get some person to demand a poll for him, and he could not be charged with any part of the expense. The only alternative left to him, therefore, in framing this bill, was, to throw the expense upon the county, or upon the individual demanding the poll; and, as the latter would be a greater alteration of the whole system, he adopted the former. When the expense was laid upon the county, no individual would feel it much. Besides, as the materials of booths and hustings would be sold after the election, the amount would be inconsiderable. The second clause objected to, respected the closing of the poll, if 400 voters had not polled before the end of the second day. The bringing in of electors from a distant part of a county, he thought as great an evil as bringing them from the remotest part of the kingdom. If, therefore, a candidate could not poll 400 on the second day from the place where the poll was held, he thought it would be a great advantage that the poll should be closed. It had been suggested, that the bill should be put off till after the general election. He could not consent to this, as it was brought forward with the view of preventing such evils as it embraced at the ensuing general election. As to cockades, he believed that the penalty imposed by the bill (namely, that the person giving or allowing them, should be disabled to serve in parliament) would effectually prevent the use of them; but he should not have the least objection to a fine for each cockade given away. The clause respecting constables was especially required. At one election he knew that 8,000*l.* had been given to special constables. At another election 1,500 special constables had been engaged at half-a-guinea a day each. The amendment proposed in the bill respecting the land-tax was much wanted in every part of the country, but particularly in Gloucestershire and Yorkshire. If the bill should be read a third time, he would willingly discuss any particular clause that might be proposed to be added to it. The house then divided.

COURTS OF JUSTICE (IRELAND).] Sir J. Newport asked, whether any measures had been taken by the Irish government, in consequence of the reports of the commissioners for investigating the fees and emoluments of the several officers connected with the courts of justice in that country?

Mr. Peel replied, that the three reports of the commissioners had been submitted to the examination of the lord chancellor of Ireland, with a view to collect his opinion for the satisfaction of the Irish government, as to the arrangements proposed, and, from his own knowledge he could state, that that noble lord had, in conjunction with the master of the rolls, devoted a great deal of attention to the subject. The master of the rolls had, indeed, occupied a great part of the last vacation in considering those reports, and the capacity of that learned person to form a correct judgment upon any subject, could not be questioned by any man who had an opportunity of appreciating his talents. When the opinions of those two learned persons were communicated to the Irish government, he could assure the right hon. baronet that it was the intention of that government to adopt such measures as the equity of the case should suggest. With regard to the office of the clerk of the pleas, about which so much discussion had formerly taken place, the Irish government had arranged, that the fees of that office should be invested in the public treasury, until a final decision should be pronounced upon that subject, with regard to which an appeal was now pending in the house of lords. As to the deputy clerk of the pleas, upon whose conduct one of the reports particularly animadverted, the Irish government had felt it a duty to dismiss that person not only from that office, but from another office also, which he had held for many years.

Sir J. Newport declared, that he was much pleased with the reply of the right hon. gentleman. He was, indeed, encouraged to hope that such measures would be taken in consequence of the reports as were essential to the ends of public justice.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.] On the motion of Mr. Calcraft, returns were ordered "Of the effective strength of Officers, Non-commissioned Officers, and Privates in the British Army, on the 1st day of January 1818, with the number of Horses on the same day.

"Of the number of recruits finally approved for the army during each month from the 25th December 1816 to the 25th December 1817; distinguishing men and boys, and those enlisted for life or term of years."

"Of the number of casualties which have occurred in the British Army from the 25th December 1816 to the 25th December 1817." (See the Appendix.)

ARMY ESTIMATES.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the house should resolve itself into a committee of supply; and that the accounts of exchequer bills, presented on the 25th and 27th of February, and Irish treasury bills, presented on the 19th of February, be referred to the said committee; which motions were agreed to.

The house having resolved itself into the committee,

Lord Palmerston rose to submit the Army Estimates. He observed, that the detail of these accounts was so dry and uninteresting, that he should occupy as little of the time of the committee as possible. It was unnecessary, indeed, to enter at any length into the subject, as the finance committee, in the appendix to their report (presented to the house on the 23rd of February) had given a very minute detail of the military expenditure in 1817, and of the estimates for the present year. He should confine himself, therefore, to a general statement of the reduction of expense under this head of the public service. The diminution of charge in the vote for the ordinary services of the army in this year, as compared with that of the last year, amounted to 188,027*l.* 19*s.* 3*d*; but the total reduction of establishment, including all the heads of estimate, was no less than 418,866*l.* The reason of this was, that as the expense of the troops in France and India was not defrayed by this country, the reductions which had been made in those forces, though they diminished our military establishments, did not bear upon the charge to be voted by that house. The reduction of 418,866*l.* arose in the following manner. Upon the 1st class or land forces, there was a reduction of 58,664*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.*; upon the 2d class of troops in France and India, a reduction of 137,886*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*; upon the 3d class which included the half-pay and Chelsea pensions, there was an increase of 109,345*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.*; upon the 4th class of troops ordered home from India, there was a reduction of 92,952*l.* 10*s.* 0*d.*; upon the corps ordered to be reduced within the year, there was a diminution of 242,161*l.* 0*s.* 0*d.* and upon the troops and companies recruiting for India, an increase of 3,451*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* Setting the diminution on some of these classes against the increase on the others, there remained a balance of reduction to the amount he had stated, namely, 418,866*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* and this sum was the true measure of the reductions of military establishment effected within the year.

With respect to the numbers of men to be provided for, the result of a comparison of the two years was as follows:

First, the number (officers included,) voted as the permanent force for 1817 for Great Britain, Ireland, and the colonies, but exclusive of France and India, and exclusive of corps ordered to be reduced, was 92,606 which was proposed to be made from the force stationed in Ireland.
The corresponding number for 1818, was 90,647

Secondly, the number of men, (officers included) voted for 1817 for the United Kingdom and the colonies, exclusive of France and India, but including the numbers intended to be reduced at various periods in the course of the year 1817, was 108,191 which number was composed of the 1959 men before mentioned, and of that part of the 15,585 men intended to have been reduced on the British establishment in the course of 1817, who had been actually disbanded. Upon a more general view, however, of the whole of the military force stated in the estimates, the following appeared to be the result of a comparison of the two years.
The corresponding number for 1818, was 94,847

Leaving a diminution of 13,344

	1817.	1818.	Difference.
Land Forces	92,282	90,285	1,997 less in 1818.
Troops in France	28,429	22,993	5,436 less
Troops in India	19,649	19,899	250 more
Ditto ordered Home from India	7,453	4,299	3,154 less
Corps in Great Britain, Ireland, and her colonies, ordered to be reduced in the course of the year	15,585	4,200	11,385 less
Troops and Companies recruiting for India	324	362	38 more.

More in 1818	288
Less in 1818	21,972
Total of diminution	21,684

This number was the total amount of the reductions which had been actually effected in the course of the year 1817.—With respect to the reduction of charge in the several departments, he had great satisfaction in stating, that considerable savings had been made. In the office of the commander in chief, there was a diminution of 1308*l.* In the office of paymaster-general, including the deputies on foreign stations, a reduction of 6,198*l.* In the war-office, a diminution of 6,436*l.* The office of the muster-master-general had been discontinued, which had produced a saving of 2,918*l.* There would, however, arise from this discontinuance some little additional expense in the war-office, in consequence of the transfer of the business of the former department to the latter, as well as an addition to the charge for superannuation allowances, on account of such allowances to the reduced establishment of the muster-master-general's department. The total amount of savings in the public departments was 16,557*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* In the expenses of the troops in France, there was a reduction of 175,188*l.* In the Military College at Sandhurst there was a reduction of 2640*l.*, which would have been greater by 750*l.*, but for the charge of building an observatory, the expense of which would be 1500*l.*, and half was to be provided this year and half the next. The actual reduction of establishment, therefore, in the Military College was 3390*l.* per annum, a reduction which brought the institution as low as it was possible to bring it without marring the objects for which it was established. Under the head of army pay for general officers, there was a diminution of 2109*l.* arising from casualties; but a regulation had been framed which would prospectively reduce this head of charge within much narrower limits, and would bring it down to the sum of 54,750*l.* It was intended to let the number of general officers, receiving this unattached pay gradually subside to 120 officers receiving the pay of major-general; at which number the establishment would then remain fixed, and the rates now attached to the rank of lieutenant-general and general would be abolished, with respect to any persons who might from the present time be promoted to those ranks.—He would now state the items in which there had been an increase. In the staff, there was an increase of 3,751*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, entirely occasioned by necessary additions to the medical staff in the Mediterranean and West Indies. In the charge for volunteer corps, there was an increase of 16,876*l.*, principally in consequence of an additional allowance to that description of force in Great Britain, agreeably to the recommendation of the finance committee. There was also an increase of charge for medicines, to the amount of 11,265*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.*, not from any increase in the medical establishment, but in consequence of the consumption, in 1817, of the stock of medicines and surgical materials left in store at the conclusion of the war, and the necessity of making a fresh provision of those articles for the present year. But the most material increase was in the charge for the in and out-pensioners of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, which amounted to 101,624*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* It was to be recollected, however, that the contribution from unclaimed prize-money was less in the present than in the former year, by 35,000*l.* This increase was easily to be accounted for, from the great reductions which had taken place in the army, and the consequent increase in the number of men, who, being discharged, became intitled to pensions. The same cause accounted for the increase of charge for half-pay and allowances, not only to our own officers, but to the officers of the foreign troops which had been in our service.—The noble lord concluded with the following comparative statement of the difference between the amount of the estimates of the ordinary services of the army, as voted for 1817, and the amount of the same estimates for 1818:

The noble lord then moved, "that a number of land forces, not exceeding 113,640 men (including the forces stationed in France) and also 4200 proposed to be disbanded in 1818, but exclusive of the men belonging to the regiments now employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company, or ordered from thence to Great Britain, commissioned and non-commissioned officers included, be maintained for the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from the 25th of December, 1817, to the 24th of December, 1818."

Mr. Calcraft rose, and expressed his conviction, that a greater reduction should be made of our military establishment, than the noble lord had stated. He could not, for instance, see the necessity of 26,000 men for the peace establishment of Great Britain, and 20,000 men for that of Ireland. On the numbers proposed for stations abroad (excepting France and India), namely 32,000, he did not feel himself competent to pronounce any decided opinion, though he thought that the amount might have been reduced. It was certainly greater than in any former peace. But, with respect to Great Britain and Ireland, he could not imagine the grounds upon which ministers had deemed it necessary to propose so large an establishment. While we had 20,000 troops in France, he could not see why a smaller number than 26,000 would not be sufficient for the present peace establishment of Great Britain. Was there any thing in the internal condition of England, which called for a greater military force than we had in 1792? That was the largest peace establishment which this country had ever maintained; and, at that period, the numbers voted for Great Britain and Guernsey did not exceed 15,000 men. Surely, it was not requisite to keep up an establishment of 26,000, in order to preserve the peace of England. If he could conceive it necessary to the safety of the country, he would not oppose it. From the present state of the house (very few members being in their places) he should not press any amendment; but he should feel it his duty to do so upon a future occasion. Having asked for some information as to the grounds upon which such an extraordinary peace establishment was deemed necessary for England, he would now take leave to inquire of the Secretary of the Irish government, what were the circumstances which called for 20,000 men in Ireland—a force little less than double the usual peace establishment of that country? As far as he had been able to learn, he understood that Ireland, although by no means in a state of prosperity, was perfectly tranquil. That tranquillity was, indeed, preserved throughout the last winter, while the people were suffering the most severe privations under the pressure of unexampled distress, and the most afflicting disease. What, then, could be the reason for maintaining a large army in that country, especially after the ravages of distress and disease had materially abated? What could justify the expense of such extraordinary establishments, particularly in the present state of our finances? Would the Chancellor of the Exchequer tell the committee, that there was any thing so flourishing in our situation as to enable us to keep up an extra battalion or two? He was convinced that no such statement would be made. In casting his eye over the estimates, it struck him as most extraordinary, that a larger force should be kept in Ireland than was maintained for the preservation of our power in the East Indies. In those countries we had not more, he believed, than 17,000 or 18,000 men, and he hoped that the neighbouring powers were well disposed to us; but Ireland was a country attached to us, and would always afford us her allegiance and affection from interest and natural ties rather than by any power of arms. In his opinion, 10,000 men would be quite enough for that country.—As the noble lord, however, had confined himself to the detail of the estimates, he would not then enter into the discussion of all the topics which were naturally connected with this subject: but, when the report of the resolutions was brought up, he should feel it his duty to move for a reduction of the establishment, to the extent of 8 or 9,000 men.

Sir M. W. Ridley wished to call the attention of the noble lord to one part of the estimates in particular, namely, the maintenance of the royal waggon train. He thought that the business for which they were employed might almost as well be performed by pressing into the service such carts and horses as were found necessary. The whole expense of this part of the establishment was 3,313*l.* This charge upon the country might certainly be considerably reduced. He should next trouble the noble lord and the committee with an observation upon another item which he thought might be considerably diminished: he alluded to the recruiting charges, which were for England 10,000*l.*, and for Ireland 7,000*l.*, making together 17,000*l.*, a sum equal to the amount of the bounties. There was also an item for keeping in order a botanical garden at St. Vincent's; but he mentioned this more for the sake of information than any thing else. In the charge for the Military College, he perceived an item for a grant of pensions to the amount of 740*l.* per annum. In an institution of this nature, and so recently established, such a grant should be an object of great caution, with a view of guarding against an increase. This item certainly required some explanation.

Lord Palmerston said, that, with respect to the waggon train, part of it was employed on the depôt at Croydon, part of it on the military canal, part at Hilsey for the conveyance of invalids, and part of it for the drawing and direction of forge carts. That part which was abroad was chiefly attached to the spring waggons used for transporting sick to the hospitals, and it was well known, that these waggons were of the greatest service, and saved many valuable lives after the battle of Waterloo. With respect to the botanical garden at St. Vincent's, it had been established as long ago as under Sir George Young, and had since remained under the direction of the Secretary at War, though it did not at first sight appear to be very naturally connected with army estimates. It was a garden for scientific purposes (hear, hear,) and was used for the cultivation and propagation of rare and useful plants, and had, he believed, been of much service in introducing such plants into the West Indies; but there was an inquiry now going on on the subject; and unless it should be found to be useful, he was sure he would be the last man in the world to think of proposing its continuance. As to the recruiting staff, it consisted of inspecting field officers, who superintended the performance of the various duties of the district; a paymaster, who attended to the accounts; a surgeon to inspect the recruits, and serjeants to escort them to the respective regimental depôts. He was convinced that the expense attendant on the distance recruits would be marched for inspection, if the number of districts was lessened, would more than compensate the amount of saving procured by the reduction. With respect to the recent grant of a pension on the establishment of the Military College, it had been made in conformity with the original warrant by which the establishment was governed, and which authorized the granting of pensions of a certain amount to such of the professors as might, after 15 years' service, become incapable of further service by age or infirmities.—The hon. gentleman (Mr. Calcraft) had stated, that, on a future occasion, he should feel it his duty to move a further reduction, above the 21,000, as stated in the present estimates. As, however, he had not gone into a statement of his reasons for the intended motion, he (Lord P.) would abstain from any premature discussion. But he must be allowed to say, that the amount of 26,000 men, taken in the estimates for Great Britain, could not be considered as wholly applicable to the home service; a portion must be applied to the relief of the foreign garrisons. These garrisons consisted of a force of 33,000 men; to which must be added the 17,000 men in India, making a total force abroad, exclusive of the army in France, amounting to 50,000 men. Nobody would pretend to say, that the regiments thus stationed should be exposed to perpetual banishment—it would be neither humane nor constitutional. Some period must, therefore, be assigned for the return of these regiments. Ten years were considered the fair limit of service abroad. Now, allowing that the reliefs would amount to one-tenth of the force in foreign garrisons, that amount would take away from the 26,000 men, 5,000 for reliefs to be sent out. A further force of at least 1000 must be deducted for the garrisons of the islands in the channel, and it would not be too much to deduct from 1 to 2000 more on account of non-effectives from deaths, sickness and furloughs. So that with these reliefs and defalcations, the army for home service would not amount to more than between 18 and 19,000 men. The house would, therefore, see that there was no very great excess between the force now kept up and the establishment of 1792, alluded to by the hon. gentleman; and that it was only such a difference as the alteration of circumstances between the two periods fully warranted.

Mr. Warre observed, that the noble lord, in his representation of the amount of force necessary for the home service, had entirely overlooked the large army stationed in the French provinces.

Mr. Peel said, that his hon. friend (Mr. Warre) should have recollected, that the present estimates were demanded for one year only. The country was bound by treaty to keep up, for a time specified, an army in France. As long, therefore, as we were bound by treaty to keep up that force, it was impossible to consider it as applicable to the home service, or to make, under that head, an allowance for it in the estimates. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Calcraft) had expressed dissatisfaction, that the reduction for Ireland was not greater, and that the force considered necessary for the internal tranquillity of that country should still amount to 20,000 men. After the unanimity which marked the greater estimate two years ago, when the force unanimously admitted to be necessary was taken at 25,000 men, he had expected, that the reduction and its causes would have been received with unmixed gratification by all parties. It was impossible for any man to demonstrate with mathematical accuracy the amount of force which the internal tranquillity of a country, situated as Ireland was, would require. It was a matter of grave opinion, and should be taken on the responsibility of the government, whose paramount duty it was to preserve the internal peace. The hon. gentleman had said, that half the force, namely, 10,000 men, would be sufficient. Now, as far back as the year 1767, (under Lord Townshend's Administration), it was resolved, that the force for Ireland should be fifteen thousand men, twelve thousand to be always kept in the country, and three thousand for general service; and so the establishment continued till the year 1792. But the true criterion of the force requisite in Ireland was not to be found at that distant period; it ought to be derived from the years immediately preceding the present. A considerable reduction had been made in the yeomanry corps, and arrangements were in progress for carrying that reduction still further. The number of men already reduced was 2,636, and the saving in money would amount to 211,000*l.* It was well known, that, ever since the peace of Amiens, a large military force had been employed to maintain the public tranquillity in Ireland, and to act in aid of the civil power. He agreed that Ireland had remained tranquil during the winter, and was happy to bear testimony to the patience, fortitude and resignation which the people of that country had exhibited during a season of extraordinary privation and distress. (Hear.) The executive government had advanced a sum of 37,000*l.* to the different local subscriptions, and, he believed, no money could have been better applied, or received with a deeper sentiment of gratitude. Some outrages had, indeed, been committed in different parts of the country, but they were of that nature which might be expected from the present state of society in Ireland. The civil power was, however, undergoing a gradual extension, and this was the cause of the reduction made in the military establishment. It also constituted the ground upon which the government had refused to yield to the applications of many local magistrates for a renewal of the insurrection act. (Hear, hear.)

Sir W. Burroughs contended, that the right hon. gentleman was mistaken in his representation of the ordinary force maintained in Ireland during former years. At one period of the American war, when Ireland was threatened with invasion, it did not exceed 5,000 men, and the consequence was, the arming of the volunteers. He was proud of the account which the house had received that night from authority, as to the fortitude and magnanimity of the people of Ireland under unequalled sufferings. It ought to afford an instructive lesson to the government. At afflictions uncontrollable by man, the Irish people never murmured; but oppressions, springing from ill-treatment and misrule, they ever did, and, he hoped, ever would, resist. With regard to the present estimates, he could not avoid expressing his surprise at their amount. He had heard with astonishment and regret that the force proposed to be kept up was only 2,000 less than that of the last year, upon an establishment which, exclusive of the armies in France and India, amounted to 90,600 men. The question was, had we the means of maintaining such an establishment? The accounts of the revenue for the last year shewed a deficit of 14,000,000*l.*, the income being 51,000,000*l.* and the expenditure 65,000,000*l.*, notwithstanding all the taxation and the sufferings which it occasioned. Where, then, was this system to end? The noble lord had not even held out to them the consolatory hope of additional reductions in the following year;—a suggestion that it might at some time hereafter be possible to lower the establishment by the number of 4,200 men, was all the prospect afforded for the future. Thus the military establishment alone cost the country six millions annually. It was obvious, that such a scale of expense could not be supported without adopting some new measure of finance in the nature of an income-tax, or by breaking faith with the public creditor, and impairing his security, by resorting to the sinking-fund. Even in the case of adopting either of these expedients, what course must be pursued in the event of a fresh war? The proposed establishment appeared to him to be, in every point of view, enormous. The house ought to be aware, that there had been a yeomanry force in Ireland of 44,000 men, and yet great credit was taken for reducing 3,000 of that number; at the same time that a regular army of 20,000 men was maintained to preserve the public tranquillity, in a period of profound peace, and when not a whisper was heard of any probable misunderstanding with foreign powers. The estimates for England, Guernsey, and Jersey, exhibited a reduction of only 279 men from a sum total of about 30,000, whilst there appeared an addition to the yeomanry of 2,968 men.—The hon. baronet concluded by observing, that the estimate of the number of men necessary to supply Gibraltar and the garrisons in the Mediterranean was considerably too large.

Lord Palmerston stated, that the practice of draughting men from one regiment to another having been abandoned, it had become necessary to change the entire regiment whenever relief was sent out.

Mr. Babington expressed a hope, that some method would be adopted, to correct the evils of the present mode of paying pensions at Chelsea: he trusted that some plan would be devised, by which the families of the pensioners might be benefited.

Mr. Long professed his readiness to listen to any suggestion which had for its object the improvement described by the hon. gentleman; but no beneficial change in the present system had hitherto appeared practicable.

Mr. Forbes wished that a list of the officers who received pensions for wounds had been laid on the table; and regretted that, in respect to pensions, the officers of the navy were not placed on an equal footing with the officers of the army. He feared there were many cases of abuse in the granting of pensions to the latter.

Lord Palmerston observed, that it was not usual to lay on the table such a list as that alluded to by the hon. gentleman, but that, if the hon. gentleman thought proper to move for it, he would make no objection to its production; observing, however, that it would take a long time to make out, and could not be submitted to the house in time for the discussions on this subject. He denied that there was any partiality shewn to the army with respect to pensions.—Pensions were granted to the officers of each service by departments wholly unconnected with one another; so that any thing like partiality was out of the question. Partiality was an undue preference on the part of one and the same authority acting unequally by different claimants; but where, as in this case, the claimants made their appeal to different authorities, acting separately and independently of each other, no such preference could, in the nature of things, exist. Complaints of this kind ought always to be taken with some degree of allowance. The officer who failed in obtaining his pension knew, indeed, his own case, but probably did not always fully know the case of the other who had succeeded, and with whom he compared himself; and it was in human nature, that a man should generally be disposed to give their full weight to his own sufferings, with which he was best acquainted, and perhaps somewhat to undervalue the sufferings of others. As to any abuses in the granting of pensions to the officers in the army, he had, in consequence of what had been said in that house last session, investigated the subject minutely, and he had not been able to discover a single instance of such abuse.

Mr. Forbes observed, that he had heard of several cases of gross abuse.

Lord Palmerston requested the hon. member to communicate those cases to him in private, and pledged himself, that, if he found that any pension had been withdrawn which ought to be continued, or that any pension was continued which ought to have been withdrawn, he would endeavour to rectify the error.

Sir F. Flood expressed great satisfaction at what had fallen from the right hon. secretary, with respect to the loyalty and good disposition of Ireland, and the patience with which the people of that country had endured the various hardships and privations to which they had been subjected. No man could be a more sincere friend of Ireland than he was; indeed, whoever was not a friend to both countries, could not be a friend to either. He was as independent a man as any in that house. He had never received any thing, and he looked for nothing, from any party. He would, therefore, be the last man to agree to any act which he considered unjust or oppressive towards his native country. But he was bound to say, that he did not think the vote of 20,000 men for Ireland extravagant. They were dispersed over the country, and the weight of supporting them was not felt. The whole people of Ireland, without any reference to religion, were loyal. Of this fact, the late war afforded abundant proof. Half our marine was composed of Irish catholics; and a great part of our army of Irish catholics and protestants; and no instance had occurred of desertion or disloyalty. The attachment of that country should be fostered. Ireland was the right arm of the empire. If we lost Ireland, what would become of us? We ought to embrace her with both arms, to the end of time, as our nearest and dearest friend.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Lord Palmerston then proposed the following resolutions, which were severally put and carried.

1. A sum of 2,470,142*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* "for defraying the charge of his Majesty's land forces for service in Great Britain and on the stations abroad (excepting the corps stationed in France, and the regiments employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company)," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

2. A sum of 807,231*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of his Majesty's land forces for service in Ireland," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

9. A sum of 92,000*l.*, "for defraying the charge of volunteer corps in Great Britain," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

10. A sum of 31,541*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of volunteer corps in Ireland," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

11. A sum of 855,419*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* "for defraying the charge of his Majesty's land forces for service in France," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

12. A sum of 21,275*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* "for defraying the charge of four troops of dragoons and fourteen companies of foot stationed in Great Britain for the purpose of recruiting the corps employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

13. A sum of 25,514*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* "for defraying the charge of the royal military college," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

14. A sum of 175,672*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* "for defraying the charge of the pay of general officers in his Majesty's land forces, not being colonels of regiments, upon the establishment of Great Britain," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

15. A sum of 1,263*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of the pay of general officers in his Majesty's land forces. not being colonels of regiments, upon the establishment of Ireland," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

16. A sum of 26,239*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* "for defraying the charge of his Majesty's garrisons at home and abroad on the establishment of Great Britain," for the year 1818.

17. A sum of 7,159*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of his Majesty's garrisons in Ireland," for the year 1818.

18. A sum of 129,112*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* "for defraying the charge of full pay for retired officers and unattached officers of his Majesty's forces upon the establishment of Great Britain," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

19. A sum of 3,697*l.* net, "for defraying the charge of full pay for retired officers of his Majesty's land forces upon the establishment of Ireland," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

21. A sum of 50,173*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of half pay to reduced officers of his Majesty's land forces upon the establishment of Ireland," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

22. A sum of 28,506*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* "for defraying the charge of military allowances to reduced officers of his Majesty's land forces upon the establishment of Great Britain," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

23. A sum of 2,353*l.* 16*s.* 10*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of military allowances to reduced officers of his Majesty's land forces upon the establishment of Ireland," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

24. A sum of 136,385*l.* "for defraying the charge of half pay and reduced allowances to the officers of disbanded foreign corps, of pensions to wounded foreign officers, and of the allowances to the widows and children of deceased foreign officers," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

25. A sum of 42,042*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* "for defraying the charge of the in-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

26. A sum of 16,789*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of the in-pensioners of the royal hospital near Kilmainham," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

27. A sum of 872,189*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.* "for defraying the charge of the out-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

28. A sum of 180,133*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of the out-pensioners of the royal hospital near Kilmainham," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

29. A sum of 32,851*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.* "for defraying the charge of the royal military asylum at Chelsea," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

30. A sum of 80,456*l.*, "for defraying the charge of pensions to be paid to widows of officers of the land forces and marines upon the establishment of Great Britain," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

31. A sum of 18,418*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of pensions to be paid to widows of officers of the land forces and marines upon the establishment of Ireland," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

32. A sum of 161,806*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.* "for defraying the charge of allowances on the compassionate list, of allowances as of his Majesty's royal bounty, and of pensions to officers for wounds," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

33. A sum of 20,805*l.*, "for defraying the charge of allowances to the reduced adjutants of the local militia in Great Britain," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

34. A sum of 27,260*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* "for defraying the charge of allowances, compensations and emoluments, in the nature of superannuation or retired allowances, to persons belonging to several public departments in Great Britain, in respect of their having held public offices or employments of a civil nature," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

35. A sum of 7,111*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* net, "for defraying the charge of allowances, compensations and emoluments in the nature of superannuation on retired allowances, to persons belonging to several public departments in Ireland, in respect of their having held public offices or employments of a civil nature," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

36. A sum of 35,000*l.* "for defraying the charge of fees expected to be paid at the exchequer on issues for army services for the British establishment," from 25th December 1817, to 24th December 1818.

37. A sum of 52,216*l.*, "for defraying the charge of corps existing on the British establishment on 25th December 1817, but proposed to be disbanded in the course of the year 1818."

38. A sum of 2,384*l.* net, "for defraying the charge of a corps in Ireland, proposed to be reduced in the course of the year 1818."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the sum of 2,000,000*l.* be granted "for discharging interest on exchequer-bills, Irish-treasury bills, and mint-notes," which was agreed to.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, that a sum of 1,084,615*l.* 7*s.* 8½*d.* be granted "to pay off and discharge treasury bills issued for the service of Ireland for the year 1816, pursuant to acts 56 Geo. III. c. 41, and 56 Geo. III. c. 47, outstanding and unprovided for."

The said resolution being carried, the right hon. gentleman moved that there be granted a sum of 560,000*l.*, "being the one hundredth part of 56,000,000*l.* of exchequer-bills, authorized in the last session of parliament to be issued and charged upon the aids granted in the present session, be granted unto his Majesty, to be issued and paid by equal quarterly payments to the governor and company of the Bank of England, to be by them placed to the account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, for the year ending the 1st of February 1819."

This sum being voted,

Mr. Warre rose and asked, what were the intentions of the right hon. gentleman with respect to the sums to be contributed by this country towards the repair of the fortifications in the Netherlands?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he should have had to propose a vote of one million this year, and one million the next, for the purpose adverted to by the hon. gentleman, were it not that the British government had some counter claims on the government of the Netherlands, which would reduce those sums about 700,000*l.*

Mr. Warre observed, that, by the treaty with France, a sum was specifically assigned by that country, for the repair of these fortifications. Was the grant for which the right hon. gentleman expressed his intention at some future period to move, to be in addition?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that, certainly, such an appropriation was reserved in the stipulations with respect to the French contribution. A great part of it had been already expended. The grant for which he should move would be in addition, and he was persuaded that the hon. gentleman would feel the importance of the purpose for which it was designed.

Mr. Warre fully admitted the importance of the object.

Mr. Shaw wished to know, what amount of the French contribution would be receivable this year, and whether any of it would be applicable to the service of this country?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that he could not hope that any part of the French payments of the present year would be applicable to the service of this country. All that could be expected was, the maintenance of the army of occupation, and a contribution towards the repair of the fortifications in the Netherlands.

It was then ordered, that the report of the several resolutions should be brought up to-morrow.

STEAM-BOATS REGULATION BILL.] On the motion of Mr. Harvey, this bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday, the 13th instant.

BANK DOLLARS AND TOKENS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a bill "to amend an act of the last session of parliament for preventing the further circulation of dollars and tokens, issued by the governor and company of the Bank of England." By that act, the dollars and tokens were not to pass, or to be received in payment or exchange, or otherwise howsoever, after the 25th of March 1818; but a representation had been made of the inconvenience that would ensue, if a quantity of silver should be left on hand, especially in the possession of the lower classes, and that it would be a great advantage, if government could give any facility towards the getting rid of them. The object of the present bill, therefore, was to afford means by which, after the time at which the tokens were ordered to be called in, they might be received for certain purposes, until they could gradually find their way to London. Much might be done if gentlemen going down to the quarter sessions could carry with them large bags of mint silver, and take tokens in exchange, for the purpose of bringing the latter to town: much might be done by this simple expedient. A great part of the expectation of inconvenience was caused by the rapidity and facility of the late issue of silver coin. The public, not considering the difficulty of such an operation, expected the same proceeding to be repeated; but, as government neither issued, nor guaranteed, the Bank coinage, it could not be expected that it should incur any expense in calling it in. In the present bill, however, provision was made, that until the 5th of April, 1819, it should be lawful to utter, offer and tender, Bank dollars or tokens, in payment of any taxes or postage, or in the purchase of any stamped paper, or in payment to any banker, common carrier, or any other person whomsoever, for the purpose of such dollars or tokens being transmitted to the Bank of England. There was a provision also, that they might be paid or received in rent; and he hoped that gentlemen would give their poor labourers the facilities he had before suggested. From the length of time now allowed for the gradual recal of these tokens, he trusted that no material inconvenience would be felt. Time would shew how far these expedients would answer; but he hoped that the bill would allay the ferment and alarm which had hitherto prevailed.

Mr. F. Lewis stated, that the price of silver was gradually rising; and he understood, that 5s. 6d. an ounce would now be given for any quantity; if so, and silver should still rise, to 5s. 8d., for instance, the whole of the new coinage would gradually disappear. Of many modes to re-establish a sufficient circulation, the best would be, to let the Bank establish a currency of its own. The misfortune was, that in all these measures, the house did not see its way, and could scarcely grope along. He had always said, that if the new coinage were put into circulation with the Bank currency, we should lose the former: but, when the coinage appeared, he hoped that its beauty and convenience would be some inducement to people to keep it. This was so far from being the case, that it had been found that the two currencies could not subsist together: so that, if the tokens were called in, we should lose both. He lamented the fatality and darkness which seemed to attend all the measures on this subject.

General Thornton thought, that if the Bank tokens were excluded from circulation, local silver tokens should be excluded also; but he thought it useful, that the local tokens should be kept in circulation. He never heard that any had been forged.

Mr. J. Smith, though not aware that the price of silver was so high as had been represented, thought that, under circumstances, it might rise higher: the loans at Paris might materially affect it, but he derived consolation from another point. He had, in common with others, for many years observed the conduct of the Bank of England, and he thought, that that corporation had the means, and used them, of influencing the state of the currency. He thought they possessed those means now, and could protect the public, by affording a check to the exportation of bullion. He conceived that the present bill might be very useful to the country.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that if the receivers of taxes remitted the Bank tokens directly to London, considerable relief would be given to the public: but if, after receiving tokens for taxes, they paid them in to the country banks, the relief would fall short of the general expectation. He thought there was ground for considerable alarm as to the state of the currency.

Mr. Grenfell thought the effect of the bill would be, to continue the circulation of tokens without restraint, as no penalties were attached to the future circulation of them. They might not only be received for rent, but be also immediately put into use again, unless a penalty were affixed. However, if it should be otherwise, and silver should not rise, in what mode were the tokens to be transmitted to London? It was incumbent on government to bear this expense, and not to thrust it on gentlemen. It had been said, that government was not concerned in the issue of these tokens, and, therefore, ought not to defray the expense attending them. He was of a very different opinion. He thought it the duty of government to assist in carrying on the ordinary exchange of the country. The expense would not, perhaps, be considerable; it might not exceed three fourths per cent. for forwarding the tokens from all parts, but that expense ought to fall on government, and not on the country bankers; for, notwithstanding every precaution, the tokens would find their way into the country banks, and he thought that the country bankers had a right to expect that government should bear the expense, especially as they had been so active, and had afforded such facilities in the distribution of the late coinage.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was ready to admit the merits and skill of the country bankers, as well as of the Bank of England, in the issue of the silver coinage, and the object of the bill was to protect the country bankers from expense. He was not prepared for the observation of the hon. gentleman as to the rise in the price of silver, because, in many instances, he believed it had fallen. If it should rise considerably, he thought there might be some difficulty; but he conceived, that the only way to preserve the mint currency was, to remove this rival currency from circulation. Hitherto it had produced no inconvenience; but he apprehended, that the tokens might drive silver into the melting-pot, if a crisis should occur when such a course might prove to be profitable. As to the receivers of taxes, it was not imperative on them, or on country gentlemen, to receive the tokens; but the bill merely exempted them from any penalty if they should continue to receive them. If the transaction cost no more than one fourth per cent., there were many tradesmen who would be glad to receive them in payment on condition of forwarding them to town at an expense of one per cent. The bill suspended the penalties in certain cases only, and it was intended that the receivers should forward the tokens to London.

Mr. Babington said, he anticipated great inconvenience from withdrawing the Bank tokens from circulation. He, therefore, approved of the intended bill.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill, and it was ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Wellesley Pole, and Mr. Frederick Robinson.

SURGERY REGULATION BILL.] The following petition of the præses, visitor and other members of the faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow, against this bill, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

"That a bill is presently depending in the house, intituled, 'a bill for regulating the practice of surgery throughout the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland;' that, were this bill to pass into a law, the interest of the petitioners would be hurt, in an indirect, but in a very essential manner; by this bill, although the privileges of the petitioners are said to be reserved, yet all medical practitioners are expressly prohibited, unless those holding diplomas from the colleges of London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, and those colleges receive in addition certain valuable and extensive privileges; the petitioners have now existed for upwards of two centuries; they were incorporated by royal charter from King James the Sixth of Scotland, dated 30th November 1599; this grant confers on the petitioners the most extensive and salutary powers of examination and control over all practitioners in physic, surgery, and pharmacy in the west of Scotland; it proceeds on the narrative of great abuses committed by ignorant medical practitioners, 'especially within our burgh and baronie of Glasgow, Renfrew, Dumbarton, and our sheriffdom of Clydsdale, Renfrew, Lanark, Kyll, Carrick, Ayr, and Cunningham;' the petitioners are therefore empowered, in the first place, to call before them for examination all persons practising surgery within those bounds, and to license or discharge them according to their knowledge: in the next place, the petitioners are thereby directed to challenge and discharge all persons practising as physicians without the testimonial of a famous university where medicine is taught; and lastly, apothecaries are restricted from selling drugs unless examined and approved by the visitors of the faculty; the grant authorizes the exaction of severe penalties from offenders, and, besides authorizing the petitioners, 'to make statutes for the common weal of the king's subjects anent the said arts, and using thereof,' it confers on them various other important and salutary powers and privileges; on the 11th of September 1672, the petitioners obtained from the parliament of Scotland an act ratifying and confirming this charter in the whole heads, clauses, tenor, and contents thereof; the petitioners' faculty has been often recognized by the house, and, in all cases where their interference was necessary, their rights have been enforced by the different judicatories of the kingdom; the petitioners, indeed, are the most ancient establishment in Scotland endowed with the same privileges, for, although the surgical establishment at Edinburgh has existed longer as a city incorporation confirmed by royal charter, yet it was only in the year 1694 that there was conferred on them a territorial jurisdiction over the Lothians and five adjoining counties, similar to that which had been enjoyed by the petitioners since 1599; the college of physicians at Edinburgh was only established in the year 1681; these two corporations, along with the petitioners, are the only establishments in Scotland to whose control the medical practitioners in that part of the kingdom are subjected; the petitioners understand that the only other establishments in the empire are the colleges of physicians and surgeons in the metropolis of England and those of the metropolis of Ireland, a circumstance which the petitioners have found to induce a belief that there were in the same way none in Scotland but those of the metropolis of that kingdom; the house must be well aware that while the petitioners have been so long discharging their duties, the city of Glasgow has, in the mean time, become the seat of one of the most esteemed medical schools; Glasgow is now the second mercantile city in the empire, and the first in Scotland in point of trade and population; it is distinguished for its university, and it possesses the great benefit of an extensive well regulated infirmary and lunatic asylum; in consequence of these and other advantages the petitioners are enabled to cope with the establishments in the metropolis, provided the degrees of the others do not now receive at the hands of the house an extraordinary and extensive privilege, from which benefits the petitioners are without any demerit of theirs excluded; students have long been in the habit of voluntarily submitting themselves to an examination, and receiving diplomas from the petitioners to use as a testimonial of their abilities in the most distant parts of the empire and of Europe; should the parliament of Great Britain however now, when the rights and merits of the whole are before them, refuse to the petitioners, as one out of the seven medical establishments, those new prerogatives which it is thought expedient to bestow on the other six, it will be striking a blow at the petitioners, and the medical school of Glasgow, which it may never be able to recover; in the bill it is stated, no doubt, that the privilege in question shall be enjoyed not only by the royal colleges of Edinburgh, London, and Dublin, but by any other royal college to be hereafter legally incorporated, and the privileges of the faculty belonging to the petitioners are in the mean time said to be preserved, such as they are, by a reservation in the bill; the house however will remember that the seven medical establishments now in existence have hitherto been found sufficient for the empire, and there is very little prospect indeed, if any, of an eighth being created; why, however, should the petitioners be excepted in the mean time, merely because they have used the title of faculty instead of college? and why should the remaining counties of Scotland be placed under the police of the whole English and Irish colleges, and only one of those in Scotland? If there were several other faculties similar to the petitioners throughout the empire, the terms of the bill might be unobjectionable, but the case is otherwise; with regard to the reservation in favour of the petitioners in the bill, they must admit, that the bill is in its present terms so far more favourable than as brought forward last year, when by an omission to recognize the petitioners, their privileges and existence would have been totally annihilated; but this very reservation in favour of an individual faculty shews the truth of the statements the petitioners have made; they however do not now come before the house seeking an extension of their privileges, but humbly intreating that the house will consider that to grant additional powers to all the other establishments, and to say that they alone shall be excluded, is to sink the petitioners in the scale of reputation, and to undermine or destroy the flourishing state they now enjoy, by preventing them from competing on the equal and advantageous grounds which they presently possess; the clause is therefore illusory which provides that nothing in the bill shall lessen, prejudice, defeat, or in anywise interfere with the privileges of the faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow, so far as that faculty are concerned: on the general merits of the bill the petitioners think there can be but one opinion, viz. that it is both expedient and necessary, but it is not the business of the petitioners at present to dwell on this subject; they humbly trust that the house will at once see the propriety of encouraging every medical seminary, and will not allow so ancient and reputable an establishment as that of the petitioners to be injured by implication, or in any indirect manner; and that the house will allow the impolicy and hardship of a measure which, like the present, would abridge the facilities of extending medical knowledge, and which would also tend to reduce the ancient university of the city of Glasgow to the level of an ordinary academy, as it cannot be doubted that students will flock to those seminaries alone where they can procure the most efficient diplomas; in short, the petitioners hope, that having so long discharged, as they may safely say they have done, their important duties, with increasing credit to themselves and advantage to the lieges, they will receive that encouragement and protection from the British legislature to which their ancient charter and act of the Scots parliament entitle them, and that these rights need only be stated, at once to satisfy the house of the impropriety of granting an undue preference over them to the other medical establishments; the petitioners therefore most humbly pray, that the house will preserve inviolate their privileges so long enjoyed, or, should the bill pass, that they will amend the same so as to confer upon the petitioners the right of granting diplomas in surgery of equal force with those that may be issued in terms of the said bill by the other colleges, and to allow the petitioners to be heard at the bar, by their counsel, for their interest, if necessary, or to do otherwise, as to the house shall seem meet.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.] The returns ordered (pursuant to an address of the 5th of February) were presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

Tuesday, March 3rd.

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.] The Lord Chancellor stated that George Henry Rose, Esq. (who was sworn in yesterday), had, as clerk of the parliaments, appointed Henry Cowper, Esq. (present clerk assistant), to be one of his deputies, to sign papers, and do all acts in his absence, appertaining to the office of clerk of the parliaments; also, that he had appointed George William Birch, Esq. (the reading clerk), to be another of his deputies, to act as clerk of the parliaments in the absence of himself and Mr. Cowper; and also, that he had appointed Benjamin Corry, Esq. to assist at the table, to attend committees, and to act in the office of clerk of the parliaments in the absence of himself and Mr. Cowper, as occasion might require.

His lordship moved that these arrangements be approved of, which was agreed to. Mr. Corry then came in and took his seat at the table.

Earl Grosvenor asked the noble secretary of state, when he intended to bring forward the subject of the office of clerk of the parliaments?

The Earl of Liverpool said, it was his intention to bring the subject under the consideration of parliament, with a view to some prospective regulations, to take place after all existing interests had ceased.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, considering that the present subject had reference to the regulations of their lordships' house, suggested, that some means should be taken to inform their lordships, prospectively, of the proceedings which were likely to come under their consideration. An hour had been fixed for the commencement of public business, and it would be highly useful if, in addition to that regulation, some method were taken of communicating the nature of the business to be transacted.

The Earl of Liverpool had no objection to any arrangement by which the object of the noble marquis could be accomplished, but he was not prepared to say whether the matter ought, at present, to be made the subject of a regular motion.

The Lord Chancellor also intimated his disposition to concur in some arrangement for the object which the noble marquis had in view.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS.] Petitions, in favour of the chimney-sweepers regulation bill were presented, by the Marquis Camden, from Chelmsford; by Lord Auckland, from Shrewsbury; by the Duke of Sussex, from Stamford-hill and Stoke Newington; and by the Bishop of London, from Walthamstow.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The Earl of Liverpool, in answer to a question from the Earl of Lauderdale, relative to the second reading of the bill, observed, that he did not think that the house, from the state of its information, could be fully prepared to accede to the principle of the bill. He did not, however, think that the second reading ought to be resisted. The bill might be allowed to go into a committee, and the principle could be discussed on the report of the third reading.

Lord Auckland said, that their lordships would have a great body of evidence before them, when the report of the committee of the house of commons was communicated.

PERSONS ARRESTED FOR TREASON.] The Earl of Carnarvon made the motion, of which he had given notice yesterday, for an account of the persons arrested under the habeas corpus suspension act.—The motion was agreed to.

INDEMNITY BILL.] The order of the day being read for going into a committee on this bill,

Lord Holland rose, but not, he said, with the intention of resisting the motion for referring the bill to a committee. There were, however, two or three questions which he thought it right previously to ask, the answer to which might, perhaps, enable their lordships to proceed with more precision and despatch, when in the committee, than they could otherwise do. His present purpose was not to discuss either the principle or the details of the bill; but, as their lordships were about to go into the committee, it was important to know what was the object which they had there to carry into execution; for, after all the discussion which the subject had undergone, there were still some points with respect to which the intention of those who had introduced the bill was very obscure. On one or two of the grounds on which they rested the measure, they seemed to be at variance with themselves. It had been said, that precedent was followed in the present case: but, if it had been the object of the framers of the bill to establish it on precedent, the result of their labour was not consistent with their intention. All former acts of indemnity in this country had acknowledged, or implied, that certain illegal acts had been committed, and, on the ground of illegality, the indemnity was granted; but the present bill, according to the assertions of those who supported it, the report of the committee, and its own preamble, came before their lordships with the allegation that no illegal act had been done. The report which had been made by their lordships' committee stated, that the persons who had been taken into custody had been arrested on oath. According to all the assertions and allegations, there had been no illegality; and if there was no illegality, there could be no need of indemnity: but it was said, that if ministers should be called upon to justify themselves in courts of law, they would be obliged to produce evidence which it would be improper to disclose. He could not say that it might not be possible, that a bill on this subject was requisite; but, then, the object of such a bill could not be indemnity. It was proper, therefore, that their lordships should know before they went into the committee, to which of these objects their attention was to be directed, or whether it was to be expected of them that they should accomplish both objects. What were they to be called upon to do? Surely the same clauses and words would not answer for the different objects he had pointed out. If all the proceedings had been legal, what danger could there be in disclosing the evidence on which the arrests had been made? There was another point which also appeared to him worthy of their lordships' consideration, namely, how far this bill followed as a consequence of the suspension act of last session. It had been asked, how their lordships could suppose that the habeas corpus should be suspended without this bill becoming necessary? He must confess, that he had not seen this natural consequence; but if it really existed, ought it not to be their lordships' business to make out that connexion in the committee? The bill, as it stood, contained no reference to the suspension act from which it was said to spring. The preamble declared, that a traitorous conspiracy had existed, and that divers persons had tumultuously assembled, &c. and stated acts to have been done, which, under the supposition of all the proceedings being legal, were proper to be resorted to. The bill, however, did not declare that those acts had been done in consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus. This bill, therefore, applied generally to all arrests, and was, in that respect, more extensive in its application than the measures which were said to have given rise to it. Another difficulty here arose in considering this bill, which, instead of being founded on precedent, differed in one material respect, not only from all the old bills of indemnity in this country, but from that of 1801, which had been so often alluded to, inasmuch as it granted indemnity, not only for arresting and detaining persons, but for discharging them. Had prisoners, then, been illegally discharged? It would become their lordships to consider, what might be the effect of the introduction of this word into the bill, not merely with respect to the protection of ministers, but to the future security of the persons to whom it applied. If ministers, or the magistrates who, under them, carried the suspension act into execution, had acted legally in discharging prisoners, they would stand in no need of indemnity. They could have no fear of producing evidence, to shew that they had acted according to law, in discharging those whom they had arrested. It was necessary to call their lordships' attention particularly to this circumstance, as it appeared that there were cases in which the discharge of prisoners by the magistrates might be illegal. In stating this, he wished to refer their lordships to a case which occurred in Hilary term, 1788, before Mr. Justice Ashhurst, Mr. Justice Buller, and Mr. Justice Grose. The case was entitled Morgan against Hughes.* The plaintiff having been committed by the defendant for felony, and afterwards discharged, brought his action for malicious imprisonment. The declaration stated, that the defendant, being a justice of the peace, and contriving and maliciously intending to hurt, injure, and prejudice the plaintiff in his character, &c. and to cause him to be esteemed and reputed amongst his neighbours and others guilty of felony, &c. on the 14th of July 1786, wrongfully, injuriously, maliciously, and without any charge or accusation, issued his warrant, whereby the plaintiff was committed to the gaol of Cardigan, where he remained until the 1st of September then next following, when the said plaintiff was released and discharged from his said imprisonment. To this declaration there was a special demurrer, setting forth. that it did not appear in and by the said declaration, that the plaintiff had ever been tried for, or acquitted, or by due course of law discharged of and from the said supposed felony and charge in the said warrant mentioned; and that it did not appear, therefore, that the commitment was without cause.—The declaration, in fact, must state, that the prosecution is at an end; for a person aggrieved cannot bring an action, without shewing that he has been discharged according to due course of law, either by a grand jury throwing out a bill of indictment preferred against him, by acquittal on trial, or by a nolle prosequi. Their lordships would therefore perceive, that the extension of the bill to cases of discharge was, of itself, an indemnity to ministers. That this was the unavoidable consequence of the introduction of that word into the bill, was evident from the judgment given in the case to which he had alluded.—The counsel for the plaintiff, in arguing against the demurrer, admitted, that, in actions for malicious prosecutions, it was necessary to state in the declaration, that the prosecution was at an end, but contended, that it was not necessary in an action like the present, which was merely for a malicious commitment. Mr. Justice Buller said "this declaration cannot be supported. The grounds of a malicious prosecution are, 1st, that it was done maliciously; and, 2ndly, without probable cause. The want of probable cause is the gist of the action: for it should have been shewn on the face of the record, that the prosecution was at an end. Saying that the plaintiff was 'discharged' is not sufficient; it is not equal to the word 'acquitted,' which has a definite meaning. Where the word 'acquitted' is used, it must be understood in the legal sense, namely, by a jury on the trial. But there are various ways by which a man may be discharged from his imprisonment, without putting an end to the suit. If, indeed, it had been alleged, that he was discharged by the grand jury's not finding the bill, that would have shewn a legal end to the prosecution. Neither is there any distinction between a malicious commitment and a malicious prosecution. The present is more like the case of an action for maliciously holding to bail than any other; in which case it must be shewn that there is an end to the suit." The other judges were of the same opinion, and judgment was given for the defendant. After what he had stated, and, in particular, after having recited this decision of the court of King's-Bench, he thought it right that their lordships should be informed on the following points: first, whether a person discharged by the authority of the secretary, a magistrate, without any bill of indictment against him having been thrown out by a grand jury, or acquittal on trial, or on a nolle prosequi, can be held to be discharged according to law? Secondly, Would a discharge by the secretary of state prevent the person from being again arrested on the same charge? Thirdly, Could a person discharged by the secretary of state insert in his declaration, on bringing an action, that there was an end of the suit against him? These were important questions, and he thought them worthy of the consideration of their lordships, on grounds totally independent of the bill before them.*

The Lord Chancellor wished, in the first place, to observe, that he did not consider himself so great an adept in the criminal law as to be always prepared to give their lordships a satisfactory opinion upon every difficulty that might be started. In the present case he must also confess, that he could not recollect the terms of the questions which the noble lord had put with sufficient precision, to enable him to give a full answer, were he in other respects capable of so doing. With regard to what had been said, as to this bill being founded on precedent in all its provisions, he certainly had never so argued it. He had on the contrary observed, that when the habeas corpus was suspended in the reign of King William, it was distinctly acknowledged in the bill of indemnity, that illegal acts had been committed; but it was at the same time declared, that those acts were so necessary for the safety of the country, and the preservation of the constitution, that persons should not be put to the expense of defending themselves in suits which might be brought for their commission. The principle of the act of 1801, though different, was a just principle also. It was this —that the names of persons who had given information should not be disclosed. Whether that principle was to be, bona fide, in any particular instance maintained, depended on those to whom the constitution had given the right of deciding on such questions. What their lordships' decision on this point ought to be, it would be for them to consider in the committee; but if that principle ought to be acted upon, there was another which possessed a claim not less urgent upon their lordships' attention—he meant the protection of the magistrates who had executed the laws. In a case in which there had been a probability of a general rising against the government, it was obvious that great numbers of persons would be arrested. To leave the individuals who had caused these arrests to contend with the multitude of actions which might be brought against them, would be to allow them to be overwhelmed, and crushed with an incalculable expense. As to the chief point in the noble lord's question, he should consider it most contemptible conduct in him were he to withhold from their lordships any information on a legal point which he could give. He would therefore state his opinion, for which such allowances should be made as his practice, confined to courts of equity, required. Though he thought the word discharged highly proper and necessary, he was not aware that it had been inserted in the bill until the noble lord had referred to it. It certainly appeared to him a point of great importance, and in stating what at the present moment occurred to his mind on the subject, he could only say, that he did not think a man discharged in the way described by the noble lord would be discharged according to law. But this formed precisely a case in which the magistrate ought to be protected. If, when a rising against the government was apprehended, a magistrate arrested on information a number of persons suspected to be engaged in such a treasonable design, was he to be punished for discharging those persons when the danger was over, and when he conceived that he had no longer any right to detain them? Surely, no clearer case for granting indemnity could be suggested. He knew what he should have done on such an occasion. He would have pursued the very same course that had been adopted. When persons taken into custody were delivered on recognizances, it had been usual to bind them to answer, from time to time, in the King's-bench. If that were illegal, it had been illegal ever since the law of the country had been administered. He had himself had the honour of filling the offices of attorney and solicitor-general—he should say, perhaps, unfortunately for himself; for no situation was so pleasant as that of a private barrister, and none so full of anxiety as that of solicitor or attorney-general; but he was always in the practice of going from term to term, and respiting recognizances; and no persons had ever sat in the courts of justice who understood the laws better than those who presided during the time he alluded to. He could give no better answer than he had done to the question of the noble lord; but he owed it to the kindness of the house, and to the indulgence he always experienced, to give on all occasions the best answer in his power. If it were explained to him, and he were satisfied he was wrong in what he had stated, he should be ready to give any further information in his power.

* It may not be improper to observe, that, in the case of Morgan against Hughes, which the noble lord cited, it was not held, that the plaintiff was without a remedy for the false imprisonment, but that, in such a case, trespass, and not a special action on the case, was the proper remedy.—The general distinction is this: where the immediate act of imprisonment proceeds from the defendant, the action must be trespass, and trespass only; but where the act of imprisonment by one person is in consequence of information from another, there an action upon the case is the proper remedy, because the injury is sustained in consequence of the wrongful act of that other.

The house then resolved itself into a committee, when

The Lord Chancellor proposed, that their lordships should consider the preamble first, instead of postponing it as usual, because it was closely connected with, and referred to by, the enacting part of the bill.

The Earl of Lauderdale observed, that if the house were to set aside all precedents, and rely on the argument of the learned lord, he must say that that argument had no great weight with him. The meaning of a preamble was, to explain the object of a bill to the public; but how could it assume to do this, before it was decided of what clauses the bill should consist? Here the learned lord, contrary to all usage and meaning, called on the house to consider the title and preamble of the bill, before the various clauses had been agreed to. The learned lord had professed a readiness to explain, and here was sufficient cause to call for explanation, when he must himself consider this a departure from the ordinary rule.

Lord Redesdale denied that there was any thing singular in this mode of proceeding. He had himself, on other occasions, insisted that the preamble should be considered first, because it referred to the enacting clauses.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, the question was, whether the committee should first see the spirit of the enacting clauses, and then frame the preamble in conformity to them, or decide the preamble first, and then be tied down by mere form of words. The bill was of the greatest importance to the country, and their lordships ought not to decide hastily; they ought to exercise great caution on the point, or they might surreptitiously, as it were, be led to sanction enactments, the spirit of which they disapproved; and this would be the case if they were, in fact, pledged to support the words of the preamble.

The Lord Chancellor said, that, in many acts, the preamble was a mere form, reciting the object of the enactments that were to follow; but the present was so materially connected with the substance of the bill itself, as to render its postponement inconvenient. How, for instance, could they decide upon the propriety of the clause which referred to tumultuous assemblies without looking to the preamble to see what was meant by tumultuous assemblies? Every meeting which took place in the course of the last two years was not to be concluded as necessarily of a tumultuous character. The preamble, therefore, in which the precise description was marked out, would seem to come naturally in order before those parts of the bill which would require to be referred back to it, in order to be understood.

Lord Grenville observed, that the committee had a complete discretion, whether they would postpone the preamble or not. When they were called upon to depart from the usual orders of the house, a strong ground should be made out by those with whom such a proposition originated, and, particularly, when it was brought forward in a question like the present.

He was not aware of any advantage that would arise from it in this instance, either with regard to perspicuity or accuracy. Supposing the preamble to be postponed, as was the usual practice, the enacting clauses might, and no doubt would, still be considered with reference to it, though it was not yet agreed to; but supposing it to be agreed to, as they did not actually know what the clauses would be, or how they might be modified in their progress, considerable inconvenience might be felt from having previously agreed to a preamble which affected to describe accurately what was yet undetermined. It would be better, therefore, to adhere to the usual mode of giving time to consider the various enactments, and then, and not till then, to affix the necessary and appropriate preamble.—With regard to the substance of the bill, it was really a matter of very little importance which course they took; but it was of some moment, that the preamble should be so framed, as to lay the general purport and purview of the bill distinctly before the magistrates, and the people at large.

Lord Redesdale said, it was only for the convenience of the committee, that he proposed the immediate consideration of the preamble. If the general feeling were in favour of its postponement, he should not object to the adoption of that course.

The question was then put for postponing the preamble, and carried without a division.

On the first clause of the bill being read, enacting, that the indemnity should commence from the 1st of January, 1817,

The Earl of Lauderdale moved as an amendment, that the 4th of March should be substituted as the period to which the operation of the act should extend. In stating his reasons for proposing this amendment, his lordship observed, that the noble duke who introduced the bill had described it as a species of corollary, dependent on the suspension act. It was true that a noble earl (Liverpool), had attempted to explain away the expression, but not in a manner satisfactory to his mind. What he wanted now to understand was, whether the indemnity bill was a consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus? If the noble earl said that it was, the indemnity should extend only to the period at which the suspension had commenced, and not as the present bill was drawn, to a period long before it. The suspension act was passed on the 4th of March, but this bill was dated from the 1st of January. If such bills were to pass in this kind of latitude, they would render the suspension of the habeas corpus act altogether unnecessary; for here was a bill, which not only legalized all acts done under the suspension act, but many that were not countenanced by that measure.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he should not now enter into the reasons why he differed from the noble lord in his application of the expressions used on a former night; but, with respect to the amendment, he would ask, whether it was not probable, that many acts might have been done while the suspension bill was in progress, to which it might be proper to extend the indemnity now proposed? The habeas corpus act could only be suspended in cases of serious and important danger. The very circumstance of its necessity, the very danger which obliged ministers to come to parliament and ask for such an extraordinary measure, might render it incumbent on them to act, in the interval, on their own responsibility. For this reason, it appeared to be but fair, that the act should have some retrospective effect, that it should not be rendered strictly coeval with the measure, but rather with the necessity. He called upon their lordships to recollect what had passed on the first day of the session, when a dreadful outrage was committed against the sacred person of an illustrious individual. Might it not have been necessary to arrest some persons suspected on that occasion? When also they remembered the subsequent acts on which this measure of suspension was adopted by parliament, would they not admit that it might be necessary to take some steps for the apprehension of those concerned? But, abandoning the particular case, he should make his stand upon the general principle, that government might, upon its own responsibility, under circumstances of imminent danger, take steps for the general security of the kingdom, before parliament had passed the bills which it would afterwards be bound in strict justice to recognize. However, as he was not aware that any acts of this nature had been done antecedent to the meeting of parliament, he should have no objection to limit the operation of the bill to the 26th of January.

Lord Lauderdale replied, that if the suspension act had really been necessary, which was the only reason advanced for carrying the indemnity so far back, parliament might have been called together at an earlier period for that purpose; but this had not been done, though many of the disturbances so much relied on had taken place in the November preceding. This shewed that the supporters of the present bill were afraid at that time to meet parliament on such grounds.

The amendment for limiting the operation of the bill to the 26th of January was then agreed to.

On the clause, indemnifying magistrates for imperfect discharges granted to those who had been apprehended, being read,

Lord Holland suggested, that if the house meant to indemnify those who had granted improper or insufficient discharges, they ought also to frame a clause, providing, that the parties so discharged should be deemed to have been sufficiently discharged, the same as if they had been discharged by due course of law.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that two principles were applicable to the bill: one, to prevent the disclosure of testimony on which the magistrates had acted; the other, to indemnify them for certain steps which they had taken when the country was in a state of insurrection. In Derbyshire, a large body of men had assembled to proceed towards the metropolis. Now, no man, whatever his opinion might be respecting the suspension, could say that it was not the duty of the magistrates, under that act, to prevent such a purpose, and, in furtherance of the act, to detain individuals, and afterwards to release as many as they could without danger to the public tranquillity. The question, therefore, was, whether, under such circumstances, they could properly discharge such as had been arrested, without further proceedings, though, perhaps, such discharge might not be strictly legal? If any question were more clear than another, he thought it was the propriety of the apprehension of these persons in a moment of considerable danger, and the release of them as soon as was consistent with the public safety. For this reason, he considered the clause in question to be the least exceptionable part of the bill.

Lord Holland agreed, that this was the least exceptionable part of the bill; but the house had now heard it avowed, for the first time, that this bill was not passed for the sole purpose of preventing unpleasant disclosures of evidence, but really to cover acts in themselves strictly illegal. The noble lord announced his opinion, that the magistrates, in these discharges, might have acted illegally (and there he (Lord Holland) perfectly agreed); but if they had done so, parliament, it was alleged, ought to bear them out. This was no answer to the question he had put respecting the situation of persons so illegally discharged. Those persons could not bring an action for damages, without averring on the record, that they had been duly discharged, so that they were at present deprived of the very right of seeking for redress. If they were discharged at all, they ought to have received their discharge in a way that would give them the rights that all Englishmen ought to possess. If these rights could be secured to them by any clause, he (Lord Holland) was ready to indemnify the magistrates; but if not, he thought the magistrates ought not to be protected at the expense of those who had been aggrieved. The only way in which the latter could regain their rights, was by an action in a court of law, to question the regularity of the proceedings in their committal; and, if they were not regularly discharged, a clause must be introduced to give them the benefit of such a discharge before they could proceed at law. Should such a proviso be framed, would the noble lord object to it?

The Earl of Liverpool said, that, when the clause was framed, he should be more competent to give an opinion on it.

Lord Erskine expressed his conviction, that the magistrates had acted in the late instances, as those respectable persons had in all other instances, with the greatest lenity towards the unfortunate men who were arrested—that they had discharged many, whom they might have detained longer, and, therefore, that they were entitled to the protection of parliament. All his noble friend wished to know was, whether the individuals who were thus irregularly discharged from custody, were, in all respects, in the same situation as if they had been discharged in due course of law? If that were not the case, he proposed to relieve their disadvantages by the adoption of some proviso, which should have the effect of placing them in that state—a proposal in every respect entitled to the deliberate consideration of the house.

The Lord Chancellor, after re-stating the nature of the grievance explained by the noble lord (Holland), agreed, that if that noble lord would frame such a clause as he had suggested, it must meet with the concurrence of the house. (Hear, hear.)

The Marquis of Lansdown moved the omission of those words in the bill, which went to extend indemnity to magistrates for having arrested persons in tumultuous assemblies. The principle of the bill was, to indemnify for acts dangerous in themselves, but justifiable for reasons of state, which could not be disclosed in evidence. Could any of the arguments that rested on this necessity of secrecy, be applicable to the case of persons taken in tumultuous and disorderly meetings? Why should the magistrate be prevented from proving his own justification in this case? He would admit that the magistrates who acted last year were entitled to protection, but he was sure that they would rather defend themselves in an open and avowed manner, where it could be done with safety to the public, than shelter themselves behind that pall which the act proposed to throw over them.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that such an exemption might expose the magistrates to 10 or 12,000 actions, for so many persons had been collected at some of the meetings. Besides, the magistrates would have a right in their defence to enter into the information they had received as to the objects of the meeting, which would lead to improper disclosure.

The Marquis of Lansdown observed, that very few persons had been committed for such an offence; the cases, therefore, could not be so numerous as was apprehended, and the mere proof of the fact that it was a tumultuous assembly, would be a sufficient justification of the magistrate, without any further disclosure.

The Lord Chancellor said, that many might represent more force to have been used than was necessary to disperse the meeting, the only means of rebutting which would be to enter into a disclosure of its nature and objects.

Lord Holland observed, that if the argument of the noble and learned lord were good, whenever a tumultuous assembly was dispersed, the magistrates by whom they were so dispersed must have recourse to parliament for an act of indemnity. He denied the principle, as it would go to overturn the whole law of the country.

The Lord Chancellor said, that the bill before their lordships was not general, but contemplated a case of an extraordinary and special nature, and it was indispensable to protect the magistrates who were connected with it.

Lord Holland allowed, that an extraordinary and special case ought to be decided on its own merits, but maintained, that the former argument of the noble and learned lord was applicable to the case of all magistrates who dispersed tumultuous assemblies.

The Earl of Liverpool admitted, that, in the act of 1801, there was no provision of the nature under consideration, the reason of which was, that, although many persons had been taken up on suspicion of high treason, and not afterwards brought to trial, parliament thought right to pass an act of indemnity to protect ministers; yet, in that period, there was nothing like insurrection which demanded a measure of this nature with reference to magistrates. In the late occurrences, not only had persons been apprehended under the warrant of the secretary of state, but insurrections of a formidable nature had taken place, which required the interposition of magisterial authority. Large bodies of people were taken up by order of the magistrates—in one place no less than 250— with a view to prevent the further progress of the meetings of the 10th of March. This having been the state of the country, would parliament act fairly by the magistrates, if it did not protect them from vexatious suits? Their lordships should never forget that the preservation of the public peace depended on the voluntary efforts of those respectable gentlemen, who were generally unpaid, and who came forward independently to discharge duties of the highest importance, attended in many cases with great personal risk, and which, therefore, entitled them to the protection of the legislature.
